"5. We oppose and condemn the action of the Democratic Convention in sponsoring a civil-rights program calling for the elimination of segregation, social equality by Federal fiat, regulation of private employment practices, voting, and local law enforcement.

"6. We affirm that the effective enforcement of such a program would be utterly destructive of the social, economic, and political life of the southern people, and of other localities in which there may be differences in race, creed, or national origin in appreciable numbers."

FAVOR CHECKS AND BALANCES

"7. We stand for the checks and balances provided by the three departments of our Government. We oppose the usurpation of legislative functions by the executive and judicial departments. We unreservedly condemn the effort to establish Nation-wide a police state in this Republic that would destroy the last vestige of liberty enjoyed by a citizen.

"8. We demand that there be returned to the people, to whom of right they belong, those powers needed for the preservation of human rights and the discharge of our responsibility as Democrats for human welfare. We oppose a denial of those rights by political parties, a barter or sale of those rights by a political convention, as well as any invasion or violation of those rights by the Federal Government.

"We call upon all Democrats and upon all other loyal Americans who are opposed to totalitarianism at home and abroad to unite with us in ignominiously defeating Harry S. Truman and Thomas E. Dewey, and every other candidate for public office who would establish a police state in the United States of America."

States' Rights and Civil Rights

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRY FLOOD BYRD

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 3 (legislative day of Wednesday, July 28), 1948

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD an exceedingly informative article written by Mr. Ralph T. Catterall, a constitutional lawyer of the Richmond, Va., firm of Williams, Mullen, and Hazelgrove. Mr. Catterall is a former president of the Richmond Bar Association.

This article is entitled "States' Rights and Civil Rights," and should be read by everyone interested in this question.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATES' RIGHTS AND CIVIL RIGHTS

(By Ralph T. Catterall)

Governments exist for the purpose of making laws to keep people from harming others. Every regulatory law diminishes the freedom of some people and increases the freedom of others. A law forbidding A to murder B curtails the freedom of A and increases that of B. There is a certain maximum amount of possible freedom, and the function of government is to use power to distribute freedom. Freedom is the ability to do what you want to do.

In a dictatorship all freedom is concentrated in the top officials. The avowed purpose is to glorify the state. In a democracy, freedom is more widely distributed, and the avowed purpose is to give each individual a fair share of the available supply of that commodity.

Within the geographical boundaries of Virginia (and every other State in the Union) two governments are operating simultaneously. If two governments are to operate at the same time in the same place, means must be devised to keep them from conflicting with each other. To provide those means is the function of the Constitution of the United States. Its purpose is to distribute between the two governments the power to distribute the available supply of freedom. In doing so, the Constitution divides all possible power (that is, all the power that could be exercised by an absolute dictator) into three parts: one part is given to the central government, one part is reserved to the State government, and one part is abolished (for example, neither government can pass a bill of attainder).

HOW POWER IS DIVIDED

The scheme by which power is divided between the Central and the State Governments is to describe the power that is given to the Central Government and provide that all the residue of all possible power (except the part that is abolished) is reserved to the States. The result is that the United States can do only what the Constitution permits it to do, and a State can do everything that the Constitution does not forbid it to do.

The powers given by the Constitution to the United States are vast in scope but small in number. Apart from a few odds and ends like patents, copyrights, weights, measures, and the post office, the Central Government has only three great powers: (1) The power to deal with foreign affairs, (2) the power to raise and spend money, and (3) to power to regulate interstate commerce.

The doctrine of States' rights is founded on the belief that the States are better fitted than the Nation to decide how freedom should be distributed among individuals. Americans repudiate the totalitarian doctrine that the glorification of government is an end in itself, and subscribe to the view that the purpose of government is to help the individual in the pursuit of happiness. The doctrine of States' rights is not that the State as such should be glorified, but that the individual should be protected.

The States' rights creed has three tenets: (1) The Constitution should give the Central Government few powers, (2) the powers so given should be strictly construed, and (3) the powers so given should not be exercised any further than necessary.

The doctrine of States' rights has two kinds of supporters. Thomas Jefferson was for it because he thought the States would distribute freedom more widely than the Central Government would. Those who, during the days of the New Deal, called themselves Jeffersonian Democrats were for it because they saw that they themselves would enjoy more freedom if business were regulated by the State and not by the Nation. It is the freedom of the individual that counted, both with Jefferson and with the Jeffersonian Democrats, and with each person the freedom of that person is apt to count for more than theories of government. If the State gives him more freedom than the Nation does, he will probably be for States' rights, and vice versa.

WHAT ARE CIVIL RIGHTS?

The freedoms that the individual enjoys under the protection of civil government are his civil rights. The term has, however, come to have a secondary and more specialized meaning. After the successful conclusion of what the Supreme Court used to call the War of Rebellion, the fourteenth amendment was forced on the country by northern bayonets. Describing that amendment, the Supreme Court said in Strauder v. West Virginia (100 U. S. 303, 1880):

"This is one of a series of constitutional provisions having a common purpose; namely, securing to a race recently emancipated * * * all the civil rights that the superior race enjoy."

Hence the peculiar usage of the term "civil rights" in our recent political history has applied it to the civil rights of the Negro.

The fourteenth amendment requires the States, in exercising their power to distribute freedom, to make no distinction on account of race. The fourteenth amendment says no State shall discriminate. It does not forbid individuals to discriminate. Therefore a series of acts of Congress attempting to compel individuals to accord privileges to Negroes, such as the freedom to stay at a hotel or enter a theater, have been held unconstitutional. The power to distribute freedom among individuals remains within the States.

Congress cannot, for example, make and enforce in the States any law forbidding A to murder B. Consequently, a Federal anti-lynching law would be constitutional only to the extent that it forbade State officials, exercising the power of the State, to lynch people for the purpose of avoiding a court trial. A Federal anti-poll-tax law would be completely unconstitutional.

A majority in Congress seems determined, however, to diminish the liberties of white persons in order to increase the liberties of Negro persons by passing a law to curtail the freedom of an employer to select his employees. The law, of course, would not in terms apply only to white employers; but it is aimed only at white employers: Congress is not going through all this turmoil because it thinks that Negro employers on any large scale unfairly refuse to employ white workers. The freedom of an employer to employ any person he wishes to employ is very important to the employer.

That the framers of the Constitution did not think they were giving Congress power to regulate this relationship is certain. That the fourteenth amendment does not authorize Congress to pass such laws has been held by the Supreme Court many times. Knowing these things, Congress proposes to pass this law disguised as a law to regulate interstate commerce. The effect on interstate commerce of a "fair employment practices" law is somewhat remote. It is so remote that a Congressman mindful of his oath to support the Constitution, ought to be ashamed to vote for it; but it is not so remote that the Supreme Court will hold it unconstitutional. The Supreme Court, out of respect for the legislature, will not hold a law unconstitutional unless it is so beyond a reasonable doubt.

THE LEGISLATURE AND THE COURTS

Just as many criminals escape being convicted because the jury, although believing them guilty, entertains a reasonable doubt on the subject, so many statutes escape being held unconstitutional because the court, although believing them to be unconstitutional, entertains a reasonable doubt on the subject. The duty of the legislator is different from that of the judge. The duty of the legislator, enforced only by his oath of office, is to vote against any law that he believes to violate the Constitution. He cannot morally pass the buck to the court, because the court has a different kind of duty.

For the court the question is not whether the law is constitutional or unconstitutional, but whether it is or is not unconstitutional beyond a reasonable doubt. And in approaching the question the court is bound to presume that every member who voted for the bill believed that it would in fact tend to improve commerce among the States. The court cannot question the motives of Congressmen, but is bound to presume that they are what they purport to be.

The doctrine of States' rights opposes such a law. The question of whether the freedom of an employer should be so curtailed that he cannot employ all white people or all Negro people or all Baptists or all Methodists if he wants to is a question that can be most wisely answered by a State legislature. In proposing such a law, the Congress is ignoring the most fundamental concept of our Constitution, and is using the power given it to promote the free flow of interstate commerce for an entirely different purpose.

The fact that Congress classifies the measure as a civil-rights bill shows that it is not really concerned with promoting the efficiency of businesses engaged in interstate commerce. The arguments advanced by the proponents of the bill would be equally applicable to laws having no connection with interstate commerce; and everybody who supports the doctrine of States' rights as a sound principle of government will oppose this civil-rights law.

The Special Session

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. STYLES BRIDGES

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 3 (legislative day of Wednesday, July 28), 1948

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD two editorials, one entitled "Truman Tries To Debauch Congress," published in the New Hampshire Morning Union of July 17, 1948, and the other entitled "A Desperate Device," published in the Concord Monitor of July 16, 1948.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New Hampshire Morning Union of July 17, 1948]

TRUMAN TRIES TO DEBAUCH CONGRESS

President Truman's call for a special session of the Eightieth Congress has been correctly labeled "cheap politics." The motive behind this call was plainly revealed by the unprecedented announcement of his decision at the Democratic national convention in his acceptance speech as the Democratic Presidential nominee. It was clear then that the demand for a return of Congress was a political move and it was so recognized by the convention.

This kind of political manipulation of the high office of President in the attempt to use Congress for political ends in a time of world crisis, when the unity and dignity of that body should be preserved at all cost, is a fair measure of the caliber of the present incumbent of the White House, and calls for stern denunciation by all Americans irrespective of party affiliation.

This is not a move to achieve necessary legislation. Let no one be deceived in that matter, it is an attempt to force one man's political program on Congress by political pressure in the effort to win the support of dissident leftists in the Democratic camp.

Many Americans felt at the time of adjournment that Congress should come back and complete some of its unfinished work. But now the whole situation is changed. Congress has been turned into a political rostrum in the Presidential campaign. The injection of political animosity into the session is sure to lead to bitter ill-feeling and paralyze all seasoned judgment. This decision of the President to fight the political campaign on the floor of Congress is so unprecedented and so flagrant an attempt to debauch the Nation's governmental machinery, that no American can fail to see its serious implications.

It is virtually certain under existing conditions that little good can be accomplished by the session. The high light of Truman's program is the contentious civil-rights issue and everyone knows what the outcome on that issue will be. It will be bitterly fought, not by Republicans but by Southern Democrats, who will filibuster to the last ditch if necessary to prevent its enactment. As for the problem of high prices, they are rooted in Truman's own gigantic budget and his failure to use methods at his disposal to provide some correction.

In fact, it is possible that as a political move, this new Truman tactic will turn out like so many of his half-baked, bungling decisions in the past, that have misfired so seriously and forced him to reverse himself. It is not improbable that the session will develop into an exposé of the bungling and incompetence of the President's leadership that will throw everything else in the shade. If this is to be a political fight, not all the Republicans are asleep.

It is not wholly unexpected that Truman should put this finishing touch on a record that for misjudgment in foreign matters in a time of world crisis, narrow partisan handling of domestic problems, and general downright stupidity, is unparalleled in American history. It is not unexpected that in the hour of defeat with nothing to lose by its failure, Truman should resort to desperation. But no more urgent and compelling reason has yet been furnished for a complete house cleaning in the Executive, than this last desperate, dangerous decision.

[From the Concord Monitor of July 16, 1948]

A DESPERATE DEVICE

President Truman's calling of Congress back into session July 26 can be interpreted only as campaign politics. The one situation which might warrant the special session would be international complications of extreme seriousness. The President does not indicate the foreign situation is any worse than it has been right along and, presumably, because the Eightieth Congress passed the legislation which he recommended on foreign affairs, it should be better.

The issues on which the President says he wishes Congress to act are all domestic problems. In effect, what he says is that if he, the President, can't have his own way then the Eightieth Congress must be bad, and because it has a Republican majority the Republican party must be bad.

The issues which the President cites can wait. None of them is pressing. In January a new Congress will meet, and its membership will be what the election makes it. In the meantime every Member of the House of Representatives must stand for reelection, unless he voluntarily retires from office, and a third of the Members of the Senate must stand for reelection. Because Congress has remained in such nearly continuous session in recent years there is not too much time between now and November for Members of Congress to get back into their home States and to tell the people what they know and to listen to the reactions of their constituents on national and world affairs. Such intermingling of the people and their candidates will pay more dividends in better government than any special session.

Perhaps the President or his advisers did some calculating before he decided on the special call. They might have figured that a special session will keep many more Republicans in Washington than it will Democratic candidates. This is especially true of the House of Representatives, where every Member must be a candidate every 2 years, and where the Republican majority is considerable.

The only really critical situation which could impel the President to call the special session, we fear, is the disaster which threatens the Democratic Party itself, the party of which the President is the titular head, and whose candidate he is. Because he has split his own party with his recommendation of civil rights legislation, he insists that the Congress in special session enact Federal laws relating to the poll tax and lynching. He couldn't duck on this one, because, as he said, everybody knows he made such recommendations.

The President is making a bold attempt to impress the Nation with his courage. Actually he has had his decisions made for him, by his own previous ineptnesses. He had to be a candidate for reelection. He had to take the stand he has on domestic issues. Roosevelt committed him to them. The Democratic Party policy committed him to them. And his own voting record in the Senate committed him to them. He isn't bold. He is merely cornered. He is performing only as a man in his position must perform.

The Eightieth Congress, at one time and another, has been accused of trying to pass legislation in such form as to embarrass the President. The President has repeatedly used the veto power, and the Congress has repeatedly overridden his vetoes. To do this required a considerable vote by Democratic Members, for defeating vetoes requires a two-thirds vote and the Republicans have only a very slight margin in the Senate, and not too large a margin in the House. Thus, in being critical of the Congress, the President is being critical of a considerable segment of his own party in the legislative branch. His call for a special session, moreover, is a more barefaced attempt to embarrass Congress than most of the legislation which the Eightieth Congress passed was designed to embarrass the Chief Executive.

The Eightieth Congress was not idle. There were submitted to it several thousand bills and resolutions. It actually enacted about 900 of these. It took care of the really pressing business, and a lot of detail. Even on most of the domestic issues on which the President wants the reassembled Congress to act there are laws on the books. There is a labor law, there is a social security law, there is an immigration law and special exceptions to permit entrance of refugees, etc. These matters have been attended to and Congress isn't going to change its mind on them, at least until there is a new Congress.

Congress might devote the special session to some more investigating of the Democratic administration of the Federal establishment, we suppose, but the best interests of the Nation would better be served by Congress meeting and adjourning again, keeping itself in readiness to meet if some real crisis develops abroad, but ignoring the crisis of the President and his party.

A History of Progressivism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GLEN H. TAYLOR
OF IDAHO
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, August 3 (legislative day of Wednesday, July 28), 1948

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an article entitled "A History of Progressivism," by W. K. Kelsey, which appeared in the Detroit (Mich.) News of July 31, 1948.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE COMMENTATOR
(By W. K. Kelsey)
A HISTORY OF PROGRESSIVISM

Russell B. Nye, head of the English department of Michigan State College, Pulitzer prize winner with his biography of George Bancroft, and now working on a "history of progressivism from the Grangers through the New Deal," contributes this interesting tale of the use of the term "progressive" in American politics.

It "seems to date from the political battles in Congress during Taft's administration, when a group in the Senate fought Old Guard dominance in the person of Aldrich, and a parallel group in the House fought the dominance of Speaker Cannon. The usual term for these recalcitrant groups, both of whom were predominantly Republican and Midwestern, was 'insurgent' but they were also called 'progressive.'

"After 1909 the latter term began to be used more frequently than the former in the press, to indicate a positive program of liberal legislation rather than simple rebellion against boss dominance within the party, which the connotation usually carried by the term 'insurgent.'

"The first real use of the term to indicate an organized political group came with the establishment of the National Progressive Republican League in January 1911, a group composed of most of the 'insurgents' plus several prominent people not in political life. This group's aim was to further progressive legislation in Congress and to promote the candidacy in 1912 of a 'progressive' Republican candidate—probably La Follette.

"Theodore Roosevelt, however, edged out La Follette and took over most of the backing of the NPRL, taking the name Progressive Party for his Bull Moose group in the elections of 1912.

"The name remained the property of the party until its break-up in 1916 when Roosevelt refused to run. A short-lived National Progressive Party retained it in the 1916 elections and merged with the Prohibition Party in 1917."

PROGRESSIVES ALWAYS "SUBVERSIVE"

Professor Nye continues:

"The next appearance of the name comes in 1922, when 15 railroad brotherhoods called a conference for progressive political action to be held in Chicago in February. The CPPA was named by Morris Hillquit. The CPPA set up plans for an as yet unnamed party, and it did not run as a third party in the elections of 1922, but did endorse candidates in several States.

"A second CPPA convention in Cleveland adopted the platform and endorsed La Follette as its nominee in 1924, but it still did not have a party name. The CPPA convention of July 1924, held in Cleveland, nominated La Follette, and to this convention the executive committee of the Progressive (Bull Moose) Party gave the name officially.

"It is interesting to note, however, that La Follette, while he received the Progressive nomination, ran as an independent.

"The National Progressive Party's organization remained until 1927, when it dissolved, leaving the name unbequeathed. Philip La Follette's National Progressive Party picked it up again in 1938 and dropped it in the following year. The Wisconsin La Follette group adopted it as a name for the State party in 1935.

"It is interesting to note in passing that both the Roosevelt Progressives and the La Follette Progressives (especially the latter) were condemned as subversive groups and attacked as un-American. Current History called the 1924 Progressive Party an anti-American party, alien and unhyphenated.

"Coolidge declared that the big question of 1924 was whether America will allow itself to be degraded into a communistic or socialistic state or whether it will remain American. General Dawes said the greatest section of the Progressives fly the red flag.

"Remembering the Bull Moose Progressives of 1912, the press said the party of 1924 was the instrument of a radical movement masquerading under a stolen title. Previously in 1912 the Taft Republicans had accused T. R. of aiming at subversion of the Government, and General Miles that year said the election was a struggle between constitutional government and communism. I am not a Wallaceite, but I find it interesting to find history repeating itself so accurately."

Republican Congress Provided Cash Payment of Enlisted Men's Terminal Leave Bonds, Formerly Denied by Democratic Congress and President

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE B. SCHWABE
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 2, 1948

Mr. SCHWABE of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, on July 9, 1947, just after the Republican-controlled House of Representatives had passed the law authorizing veterans who had been enlisted men to cash their terminal leave bonds, I delivered a radio address to the people of my district explaining the history of the situation. Later, the bill was passed by the Senate. After the two Houses had passed the bill overwhelmingly, it was signed by the President and became a law. It was the Republican Congress which provided cash payment of enlisted men's terminal leave bonds, formerly denied by the Democratic Congress and President.

My radio address, above referred to, clearly explains the situation, and was as follows:

I want to talk to you at this time on a subject that affects as many people and is of interest to as many of my constituents as any other subject I could mention.

I have reference to terminal leave pay for enlisted men.

I think you will be interested in a review of the history of legislation on this topic.

In the first place, the administration, through the heads of our armed forces, paid the commissioned officers their terminal leave, something that had never been done before. Many good lawyers have questioned the authority of the Government to have paid terminal leave to the commissioned officers of World War II, which amounted to a considerable sum of money. The heads of the Armed Forces based their authority to make terminal-leave payments to the officers on a law that was passed by Congress before most of us were born. Strangely enough, it was not used after World War I as the basis of payment of terminal leave to commissioned officers.

Those who were responsible for the payment of terminal leave to commissioned officers, even under the somewhat strained construction of the old law, claimed that that law was not sufficiently broad to enable them to pay terminal leave to the enlisted men. You understand that all servicemen under the rank of second lieutenant are classified as enlisted men and second lieutenants and all above that rank are classified as commissioned officers. Just why the administration was so anxious to pay terminal leave, in large amounts, to the officers and not to the enlisted men, has been a mystery to many of us. It served to emphasize the criticism so frequently leveled at our military organizations that a caste system was developing.

Many of us Members of Congress bitterly resented the attitude of the administration on this subject and a number of bills were introduced shortly after the close of World War II, authorizing the payment of terminal leave to the enlisted men.

But the New Deal Democratic administration, then in complete control, refused to let these bills come to the floor for consideration by the Members of Congress. Finally, the required number of Members of the House signed a petition to discharge the committee to which these bills were referred and a bill was brought out on the floor for consideration and action. This bill passed the House unanimously early in the spring of 1946, and went to the Senate.

The House bill provided for cash payments to enlisted men for the entire amount of terminal leave payable to them, but the Senate refused to pass the bill authorizing the cash terminal leave payments to enlisted men. The Senate provided for payments to be made in bonds which were not redeemable, cashable, or negotiable for 5 years.

With this difference between the two Houses of Congress, it became necessary for conferees to be appointed by both Houses. The House conferees reported on July 31, 1946, just 2 days before Congress adjourned, that the President considered that cash payments to the enlisted men would be highly inflationary and a veto was threatened, if the payments should be ordered made in cash. Of course, we had no time to pass the bill over the President's veto, even if the Senate had agreed with us.

On July 31, 1946, the Democratic chairman of the House conferees, who by the way has recently been appointed by President Truman as a Federal judge in Texas, reported to the House that it was simply a question of voting for the bonds or not getting any terminal-leave payments at all for the enlisted men. I quote the following from that gentleman's statement, appearing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of July 31, 1946, at page 10581, as follows:

"The Director of the Budget, or, to be more exact, his representative, who spoke with his authority, appeared before the conference and reminded us of something we already knew, that we are in an inflationary period in this country, and that the Director of the Budget would not approve the immediate expenditure * * *. And I might add that he said this—of course, neither he nor any other person was authorized to speak for the President, but he did make the authorized statement to the committee that this bond proposal had been submitted to the President, who approved it with the further statement that he would not approve anything more than that at the present time.

"To be perfectly frank about it, at the present time, I think it is this or nothing."

The same spokesman for the administration reported further to the House on the same day, shown on the next page of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, President Truman's attitude in the following language:

"I will try to quote the representative of the Director of the Bureau of the Budget who appeared before the conference. He said this plan had been submitted to the President, and that the Director of the Budget and the President had approved the plan but that they would not at this time approve anything more than that. Nobody is authorized to speak for the President. Nobody can say he would veto a cash payment. I pressed for a statement that I could quote, and the representative of the Bureau of the Budget said that the President would approve this plan but he would not approve of any more at this time, and the Director of the Budget then added that he thought it would be a very bad thing for the country to turn 3,000,000 loose on our economy at this time on such short notice. A lot of that money would be recklessly spent. It would add to our inflation problems."

The opening day of this session of Congress, January 3, 1947, I introduced a bill to provide that all of the terminal leave pay bonds, issued to the enlisted veterans of World War II, might be redeemable in cash at their full face value, plus accrued interest. There were 30 Members of the House who introduced similar bills. Finally, the bill was reported out by the committee and passed by the House of Representatives last Monday, July 7, 1947, by a vote of 388 to 0.

It is to be hoped that the Senate will follow the example of the House and pass the bill without a dissenting vote, and that the President will sign and approve the bill. The President should realize by this time that the people have spoken through their representatives in no uncertain terms. The people demand that the rights of a "buck" private shall be protected as much as those of commissioned officers. The President should know that this is the American way and that no favoritism should be shown, but all should be treated alike and paid on a comparable basis, and that the enlisted men should not be forced to accept bonds, while the commissioned officers were paid in cash for terminal-leave time. Our bill provides that the veterans holding these bonds shall have the option of cashing them at any time after September 1, 1947. Our boys are entitled to this money, and I want to see them get it as, if, and when they want it and without discrimination.

Dollars, Prices, and You

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LEVERETT SALTONSTALL
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 3 (legislative day of Wednesday, July 28), 1948

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement embodied in a circular issued by the Equitable Life Assurance Society of New York relative to inflation, which I think presents an interesting point of view with relation to the support of Government bonds and the effect of such support upon returns to insurance policyholders.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DOLLARS, PRICES, AND YOU

The cost of life insurance and its value depend on the quantity of money and its effect on prices.

Federal Reserve support of Government bond prices inflates our money supply—now $170,000,000,000 compared with $150,000,000,000 on January 1, 1946.

The effects of this policy for you are:

1. Low interest rates which decrease your dividends and increase the cost of your insurance; and

2. High prices which increase the cost of administering your society and decrease the purchasing value of the dollar paid to beneficiaries.

You can do something about it.

THOMAS I. PARKINSON,
President, the Equitable Life Assurance Society of the United States.

BIG GOVERNMENT DEBT PLUS FEDERAL RESERVE SUPPORT OF BOND MARKET EQUALS INFLATION OF CURRENCY AND HIGH PRICES

Our debt, total $250,000,000,000, divided according to type and holders, consists of:

1. Savings bonds (E, F, and G, etc)	$60,000,000,000
2. Held by Government funds (Social Security, etc.)	35,000,000,000
3. Holdings by Federal Reserve banks	20,000,000,000
4. Short terms due within 5 years	45,000,000,000
5. Held by insurance companies	20,000,000,000
6. Long terms held by savings banks	10,000,000,000
7. Long terms held by individuals, corporations, State and local funds	30,000,000,000
8. Long terms held by the commercial banks	30,000,000,000

SUPPORT FOR SOME

Most of these bonds do not have support or do not need it. Holders of some of those in classes 7 and 8 benefit from support, but everybody suffers from the high prices which result from the increased money supply which support produces.

Support results from the Federal Reserve policy of paying a pegged price—still above par—for any Government bond—except of course the savings bonds—offered for sale.

INFLATIONARY EFFECTS OF SUPPORT

The banks still hold $65,000,000,000—long and short term—of Governments. When the Federal Reserve buys these from the banks and the banks use the proceeds to make loans or to purchase other bonds they increase our money supply. That's one of the reasons we now have $170,000,000,000 of money instead of the $150,000,000,000 we had just after the end of the war.

OUR DEBT IS DOWN—OUR MONEY SUPPLY UP

Prices and cost of living are—? Well, look:

	January 1946	January 1948	Change
Total debt.....billions..	$278	$256	−$22
Marketable debt..do....	$198	$165	−$33
Money supply....do....	$152	$172	+$20
Price index	107	165	+58
Cost of living	129	168	+39

How, you may ask, do we have a larger money supply now when the Government debt has been reduced? That's largely because of "support" of Government bonds; and though the debt is down $35,000,000,000 since January 1, 1946, the money supply is up $20,000,000,000.

MORE MONEY MEANS HIGHER PRICES

Real beneficiary of support of Government bond prices is the United States Treasury.

The increased money supply which results from support maintains low interest rates, but it also increases prices and the cost of living.

Penny-wise and pound-foolish: The people's Treasury saves a little, and the people lose a lot.

One percent less interest on Equitable assets costs Equitable policyholders more than $45,000,000 a year. That's more than our dividends in 1948 on all our ordinary life policies.

Yes, you can do something about it.

Production in Wisconsin

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALEXANDER WILEY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 3 (legislative day of Wednesday, July 28), 1948

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, in the Wisconsin Centennial Exhibition Book, which has just been released for distribution at the Badger State Centennial Exhibition, there appears a very interesting table regarding the outstanding production role of my State. The table shows the great industrial and agricultural position of Wisconsin in leading the Nation in a wide variety of fields.

Besides what is shown in this table, Wisconsin is first in the production of casein and canned peas, and second in the production of cranberries, and cans one-third of all the vegetables canned in America.

I ask unanimous consent that this table be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WISCONSIN'S INDUSTRIAL MIGHT

Wisconsin ranks first in the Nation in the manufacture of internal-combustion engines; woodworking machinery; aluminum goods; hospital, laboratory, and professional furniture; household appliances; enamelware.

Wisconsin ranks first in the Nation in the processing of condensed, evaporated, and malted milk; cheese; malt.

Wisconsin ranks second in the Nation in the manufacture of paper, paper-mill machinery, wood pulp, leather gloves, planing mill products, tractors, plywood.

Wisconsin ranks third in the Nation in the manufacture of farm machinery, beer, butter, leather, leather and sheep-lined clothing.

Wisconsin ranks fourth in the Nation in the manufacture of steel castings, food-processing machinery, batteries, books, sheet-metal goods, wooden boxes.

Wisconsin ranks fifth in the Nation in the manufacture of iron and steel forgings and castings; motor vehicles, bodies, and parts; luggage.

The Decline and Fall of the U. S. A.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR G. KLEIN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 2, 1948

Mr. KLEIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave, I am inserting in the RECORD the remaining portion of the article from May Coronet, The Decline and Fall of the U. S. A.:

THE DECLINE AND FALL OF THE U. S. A.

(By Joseph and Stewart Alsop)

(Pt. 2)

"What are your plans for the future, Mr. Secretary?" asked a reporter.

"I'm going home," he replied. "I'm tired." He slammed the door of his car and disappeared from public life until the people's court trials in 1953. String had won.

Even the tabloids momentarily dropped the Television Murder Mystery then occupying their attention, and published big headlines, Van Quits. James Reston, widely respected diplomatic correspondent for the New York Times, was the first to interpret the full significance of VANDENBERG's resignation in a story headlined:

UNITED STATES TO WITHDRAW FROM EUROPE—RETURN TO ISOLATIONISM SEEN

WASHINGTON, March 22.—Behind the resignation of Secretary of State VANDENBERG was a momentous administration decision to withdraw from Greece and to reduce all American commitments abroad. It is expected that forthcoming commitments under the European recovery program will either be limited to a fraction of European requirements or abandoned altogether. There is general speculation that Secretary of Commerce String, widely known for his isolationist views, will succeed VANDENBERG as Secretary of State.

On the evening of March 25, in an all-networks broadcast eagerly awaited by millions of people throughout the world, President Winsome made it clear that Reston's interpretation was correct. Yet he did not state flatly that ERP was to be abandoned.

"As always," he roared, "this country stands ready to answer the call of real suffering!"

But the President left no doubt that the effort to reconstruct war-ravaged Europe was to be replaced by a policy of minimum relief, on a charity basis.

"We have poured America's wealth into Europe," he shouted, "and we have learned what the wisest of us have known for a long time. We have learned that the best answer to totalitarianism abroad is to make the free-enterprise system work at home. My message to all of you fellow Americans is just this—get behind the green-light program and push."

The most succinct of all the newspaper headlines announcing this basic reversal in American foreign policy appeared in a New York tabloid which used initials to announce: "ERP out; GLP in."

Promptly, Melvin String became Secretary of State.

At first, nothing untoward seemed to happen. By May 1, to be sure, the Greek Communist leader, N. Zachariades, was installed as Premier in Athens. But Greece had been written off anyway, and there was a general disposition to hope that now that the Soviets controlled all the Balkan States, they would surely be satisfied. Henry Wallace wrote a signed article for the New Republic, I See Peace, and the Washington Times-Herald published an editorial, Greece—So What?

Moreover, television was at that time wholly occupying the attention of the country—especially the new, three-dimensional television in color. This boom in television, some economists claimed, had made it possible for Winsome to boast that his green-light program was a smashing success.

"Under GLP," the President announced in the first national telecast on August 8, 1949, "we have marched forward to a permanent new high plateau of national prosperity. And under GLP, we shall continue to march forward. That is my answer to the calamity boys and the gloom merchants among us."

One of the gloom merchants was the noted political columnist, Walter Lippmann. The week before Winsome's speech, Lippmann had written: "We are all babbling about television because we do not want to face the truth of what is happening, and what may soon happen, abroad. By a kind of spontaneous, half-conscious effort, we have all buried our heads in the sand."

Certainly the gloom merchants could point to portents, like the incident reported in Time magazine. It concerned a French under secretary, previously a stanch anti-Communist, who appeared at French Communist headquarters the day after the Vandenberg resignation and requested a "carte d'admission."

All too soon, it became clear that such trivial incidents were symptomatic of a larger weakness. On July 15, British Foreign Secretary Ernest Bevin called a conference of 15 western European nations—those nations which, less Greece, had originally responded to the Marshall plan. The conference met in London on August 1.

In Bevin's opening speech, he referred to the about-face of the United States foreign policy and called for a "world third force," a European combination of powers capable of demanding respect both from the Soviet Union and the United States. He was cheered resoundingly. Yet an Italian delegate to the conference, quoted in a dispatch to the New York Times, was undoubtedly more realistic.

"This English bullfrog," the Italian said, "like us, he has no bread to feed his people. Like us, he has no money to buy the bread. Unlike us, he has no Togliatti.[1] That is the only difference."

On August 9, the day after Winsome's GLP speech, Togliatti's march on Rome began. The Red leader marched at the head of some 20,000 partisans, armed by Yugoslavia's Tito, but like Mussolini, he met little resistance. The softening-up process had been too complete.

Tito had thundered threats, with the tacit support of the Kremlin. When American aid ceased, the bread ration, already below wartime standards, had been cut in half. The lira was suddenly reduced to a tenth of its former value. Although the Italian industrial comeback had been remarkable in late 1948 and early 1949, bread riots and strikes had made a shambles of this recovery. And worst of all, the Italian people had lost hope.

In London the fall of Rome caused Bevin's conference to collapse in a welter of meaningless resolutions. Simultaneously, the iron currency controls imposed by the British Treasury at last broke down. There was a run on sterling, which ended with the announcement that the Bank of England could not meet its foreign obligations, and this was followed by the fall of the Labor government.

It was replaced by a national government, headed by the aging Winston Churchill. Then, as the British economic situation became wholly desperate, it was in turn supplanted by a curious patchwork Cabinet, in which large representation was conferred on the tiny British minority of advocates of a deal with the Soviet Union. Simultaneously, the evacuation of the British forces from Germany was ordered. After a meeting with Churchill, Secretary of State String had already recalled the American occupation armies. As the troops of the Western Powers withdrew, the Soviet military government quietly extended its zone westward, until all Germany was included.

Shortly thereafter, the push for France began. It was not as easy as it had been in Italy. The fighting lasted all of November and most of December. By Christmas Eve, 1949, blustering, ruthless Maurice Thorez was established as Premier of the New French People's Democracy, and the terror and the trials had already begun. Former Foreign Minister Georges Bidault was quoted on his arrival in New York: "To the east, there was power. In Paris, there was no bread. To the west, there was talk. My poor people had little choice."

Life went on in the United States. Christmas sales were high, and night clubs were crowded on New Year's Eve. Yet newspapers and magazines of that time gave ample evidence that beneath the gaiety there was a sense of anxiety, if not yet of fear. "What's gotten into everybody?" asked a New York tabloid in an editorial titled, "Who's Afraid of the Big Bad Wolf?" The editor warned: "Don't forget this, brother, we're the strongest country in this world, and nobody can touch us. And don't forget the atom bomb either. So take it easy, brother."

But the anxiety persisted. Before the year 1950 was far advanced, it had become clear that the fall of France and Italy to the Communists was the beginning of a process which would not soon end. Everywhere the pattern was the same.

In Holland, a People's Democratic Government was established with a minimum of bloodshed, since the Dutch, surrounded on all sides by Soviet and Communist-dominated states, realized that they had no other choice. In Egypt, the riots in Cairo and Alexandria reached an unprecedented pitch of wolfish ferocity; the bodies of pleasure-loving King Farouk and of a number of pashas who had failed to escape were found horribly mutilated before the new government was installed.

Everywhere the Soviet and Communist power expanded inexorably, first because the peoples of the democratic countries had lost hope, and second because no counterpressure was brought upon the bulging Soviet sphere.

The greatest shocks came in August 1950. Chiang Kai-shek fled China, and a British mission negotiated a treaty of peace and mutual assistance between the Soviet Union and Great Britain. An editorial in the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette in September 1950 well expresses the mood of America at that time:

[1] Palmiro Togliatti, secretary of the Italian Communist Party, was considered to be one of the more "western-minded" leaders of the Comintern. In 1954, he was recalled to Moscow, ostensibly to receive the Order of Lenin from Stalin. Since then, nothing has been heard of him.

"We are frightened, all of us. It has been painful to awaken from our dream of a television set in every living room to find ourselves suddenly alone in a hostile world. Perhaps we are the more frightened because the experience is a new one to Americans. Always in its history, the United States, with its allies, has been far more powerful than any possible combination of enemies. That is so no longer. Today the manpower and resources of the whole world outside the Western Hemisphere are being organized under the auspices of Moscow and the International Comintern. And the Comintern alliance is our potential enemy."

The fear spread into the White House, where, according to gossip columnists, President Winsome was complaining to Mom that String had let him down. It spread also—the record suggests—into the handsome offices of the Secretary of State. As the Louisville Courier-Journal pointed out, there was something of the bluster of a frightened small boy in the national telecast which String made, after great preliminary fanfare, in September 1950.

"Do not allow the calamity howlers to mislead you, my fellow Americans," String shouted. "The U. S. A. is the most powerful nation in the world. The U. S. A. can stand on its own two feet, alone if necessary. And, fellow Americans, we have the atomic bomb. Let those of faint heart here, or those who may think to threaten us from abroad, bear that in mind."

Three weeks later, on September 28, 1950, Capt. Archer M. Pease, of the Intelligence Corps, United States Army, made a routine check of his Geiger counter in Nome, Alaska. As early as 1947 thousands of Geiger counters had been spotted about the world, on battleships, in American embassies and legations, at naval and military bases, to detect the explosion of an atomic bomb anywhere on the earth's surface by registering increased radioactivity in the atmosphere.

"When I saw the counter," Pease later reported in a national magazine, "I whistled."

After midnight on September 29, President Winsome was awakened and informed that the Secretary of Defense wished to see him at once. By 8 a. m. an impromptu Cabinet meeting had been convened to discuss the fact that an atomic bomb or bombs had been exploded somewhere in northern Asia.

String immediately demanded—and Winsome as usual supported him—that the news be kept secret from the American public. Secret orders to this effect were being drawn up when they were made unnecessary. Simultaneously, every newspaper and radio in Europe and Asia announced the perfection of a people's democratic atomic bomb, jubilantly claiming at the same time that a vast stock already existed, and that the new missile was several times more powerful than the American imperialist atomic bomb.

Something of the quality of that period in American history is reflected in an excerpt from a popular newspaper column written in November, 1950:

"Life goes on as usual in the United States. High-school boys and girls drink Cokes and play the juke boxes. Farmers till the soil, stockbrokers sell stocks, people go to work in the morning and come home at night. We talk about three-dimensional television, or about the Helicar, and whether it is really foolproof both in the air and on the road. Life does not really seem very different from what it has always been. But there is a difference. We are all afraid. We are all afraid of sudden terrible death."

Such was the setting for the last phase in this complex sequence of American events. The few sources are singularly unsatisfactory in the picture they draw of the initial reactions of String and his coterie to the catastrophic series of happenings abroad. There is no doubt, however, that what had occurred was utterly unexpected by them. They had believed their own propaganda. When it turned out to be false, they seem at first to have resorted to familiar escape devices.

On the basis of the evidence, one must conclude that President Winsome himself remained befuddled and passive until he was formally supplanted by String in 1952. The main point is thrat the shock of the "people's democratic atomic bomb" and its subsequent disclosure seem to have forced String to face facts at last. When he had faced the facts, he began to form a policy for dealing with them.

As for the American people, they sensed that there was no satisfactory escape from the terrible situation in which they now found themselves. Congress and the press rang with nostrums. But on one point only was there general agreement. National mobilization and a maximum defense program were now urgently necessary.

Secretary String, in whose hands the unfortunate Winsome increasingly concentrated all executive power, went before Congress to present the famous String emergency program. Its main points (which the New York Herald Tribune bitterly contrasted with the green-light program in an editorial headed, "We told you so") may be summarized as follows:

1. The defense budget was increased to $60,000,000,000 annually, to provide an unparalleled Air Force and Navy, a large Army, a $10,000,000,000 defense research program, a vast intelligence and a continental radar warning net, and other sundries, such as reinstallation in caves of the most crucial defense industries.

2. A new universal service law placed under the Federal Manpower Administration every able-bodied citizen over 17 and under 65. The services made huge drafts upon the Nation's younger manpower, the FMA filling the vacancies in industry with "directed labor." Any form of labor protest, strike, or subversive agitation was concurrently outlawed.

3. Control of the national economy was conferred upon the Federal Resources Mobilization Administration, empowered to regulate all prices, allocate priorities for all raw and manufactured materials and to change the management of any noncomplaint industry or company.

4. Internal security was confided to a new Department of Home Security with unlimited powers of arrest, internment, and secret trial. For Secretary of Home Security String nominated James C. Rowden, president of Rowden Associates, a firm devoted to industrial espionage and one of the String advertising agency's principal clients.

So troubled and confused was the country that the first three parts of the String emergency program passed Congress almost without debate. Only point 4 aroused protest. A minority of Senators and Representatives of both parties, including it was noted at the time most of the men of character on Capitol Hill, united in a fight to the death against this legislation.

Senator TAFT, one of the leaders of the group, had just defied Winsome and String and promised a Senatorial filibuster that would last all session when a great explosion occurred at the atomic energy plant, at Oak Ridge, Tenn. The cry of sabotage went up all over the United States, and demands for the congressional investigation were quickly drowned out. Then the waverers deserted in the Senate, cloture was applied, the bill was passed, and Rowden was confirmed.

There ensued a brief and curious interlude. In the United States, this period was marked by the rapid mobilization of the national economy for war, and by the widespread arrests of dissidents and potential dissidents by Rowden's Roughies, as the security police were rapidly nicknamed. Abroad, there were some alarming indications of Soviet penetration into Latin America. More important, there were indications that, in Europe, the Kremlin was having difficulty in digesting its enormous meal of conquest. An iron censorship had been applied throughout the whole Soviet world.

Yet information trickled out and was appraised with desperate attention. Word of the existence of a British underground had just reached New York (brought by a party of British yachtsmen who had sailed straight out of Cowes regatta held in honor of the resident Commissioner of the Comintern) when the interlude of doubt was ended.

No documents have ever been published disclosing the diplomatic preliminaries of this extraordinary event. The historian must simply record that Secretary String flew to Moscow on October 11, 1951, was there received by Stalin and negotiated with him the Soviet-American Treaty of Peace and Nonaggression. Stalin and String simply divided the world, as two small boys might split a rotten apple.

The main clause of the Treaty of Peace and Nonaggression is well known: "The high contracting parties do hereby mutually agree and assert that the exclusive sphere of influence of the United States of America shall henceforth comprise the Western Hemisphere, and that the exclusive sphere of influence of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics shall be the continents of Europe, Asia, and Africa, the subcontinent of India, and the island dependencies of these areas."

On String's return to the United States, he made a Nation-wide extemporaneous telecast before a large crowd (organized by the Department of Home Security) which greeted him at LaGuardia Airport. This speech constituted, in effect, the last turning in the short, strange road which he and the country had traveled:

"Well, friends, thank you, thank you from the bottom of my heart for that ovation and I don't mind saying that it has moved me to the bottom of my heart. And I don't mind saying that if ever in my life I have done something to deserve an ovation, I have done that something now, for I have brought you the greatest boon which any statesman or leader can bring with him, and that, my friends, is peace.

"Our good friends over there on the other side and myself have sat down together in all friendliness and we have made a pact which will endure forever—and let me tell you it wasn't easy, because those fellows there are tough hombres, as we used to say. And that reminds me of that old saying that the price of peace is eternal vigilance and watchfulness, because as I say those boys are tough hombres, so we have got to watch our step all the same, and not relax, so the String emergency program has got to stay in force. In fact, it has got to become permanent, and there is no doubt that there are still plenty of Americans, or I'd say rather un-Americans, who might like to try to sabotage this great boon of peace, and my friend, James C. Rowden has got to have the power to take care of these un-Americans.

"And, moreover, the String emergency program which has brought us peace still has its work cut out for it, since we Americans are now recognized as the sole and only leaders of this Western Hemisphere, and our little brothers down there to the south in Brazil and Mexico, and so on, they are going to come to know and admire us more and more, and they will only admire and respect us if we are strong. So, my friends and fellow Americans, I just want to close by saying we shall march together behind the String emergency program to the new vigilant peace, and to anyone who wants to sabotage that peace, just watch out brother, that's what I say, just watch out!"

The sequel is well known. Perhaps, even then, String did not envisage the true outlines of what later came to be called the New America. Yet so vast an engine of governmental power as he had put together, responsive only to his hand, operating always in the so-called state of permanent emergency, could lead to only one result.

Not long after String's Report on Moscow, the Department of Home Security brought to trial, on charges of subversion, the first of those publishers and editors who had most enraged String by their criticisms. Shortly thereafter, charges of subversion were also brought against members of the political opposition whose gibes had been most telling.

Gradually, the number of subversion cases mounted. Gradually, the remaining independent spirits were terrified into silence. In 1953 came the great series of Peoples Trials, the institution of the Alaskan camps and the law for the regulation of the press. The constitutional amendment to improve the electoral process was passed just prior to the opening of the second South American campaign. And in 1954, String, now President, announced the formation of the New America, in a telecast from the White House. Thus freedom died.

It is not the aim of this study to carry the history of the United States beyond this death. Perhaps two incidents from the state trials deserve, however to be preserved in this record. The editor of an obscure literary magazine was indicted and condemned for having printed without comment two lines from the decadent Anglo-American poet, T. S. Eliot:

"This is the way the world ends.
Not with a bang but a whimper."

And one of the chief charges against former Secretary of State VANDENBERG (who always enjoyed a large-sounding phrase) was his alleged remark: "It is a challenging contemplation that the emblem of the United States of America, which was once the eagle, must now be changed to the jackal."

Was there any other road that American history might have taken? Such speculation is clearly outside the purview of the cautious historian. Some observers may say that the tide of American progress was reversed by a mere series of political blunders. Others may calculate that some sudden cancer had eaten into the character of the American people, so that they lost strength to carry the burden that freedom had placed on their shoulders.

Yet, whatever the cause, historical evidence overwhelmingly suggests that in 1948, even as late as 1949, true peace was yet possible. The conclusion is inescapable that had the Americans continued on the road on which they had first set their feet, had they maintained the great effort to reconstruct a war-shattered world, had they pursued a policy of dispassionate firmness toward Russian expansionist ambitions, they would have achieved in the end that real settlement with the Soviet Union and that peace with freedom for which the whole world so longed.

UN an Open Door for Communists

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 29, 1948

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, the use of the United Nations headquarters as a wide-open entrance for subversive elements from foreign countries is an appalling revelation. I have assumed from all of the propaganda that has gone out to the people of this country that the United Nations was for the purpose of creating good will, brotherly love, and peace among nations. Now we find that it has become the agency for the Red element and there are even some officials in high places who claim nothing can be done about it.

I wonder what other nation would permit an organization to exist within its boundaries to encourage subversive elements to enter and operate upon its institutions. I know of none that would be so easy. Why should the taxpayers of the United States finance an agency which lends itself, not to providing for the security of this Nation, but rather as a means to a dangerous end for those who would overthrow our Government.

Under leave to extend I am inserting in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an article which appeared in the New York Herald Tribune on Wednesday, July 21, 1948:

STATE DEPARTMENT CHARGES RED NATIONS USE UN TO SLIP SPIES INTO UNITED STATES—OFFICIALS AT LAKE SUCCESS SURPRISED—CHIEF OF UNITED STATES VISA SECTION TELLS SENATE INQUIRY OF FUTILE EFFORTS TO END IMMUNITY OF SUBVERSIVES

WASHINGTON, July 20.—Communist countries are using the United Nations headquarters in New York as a gateway to slip hundreds of subversive agents into this country to roam unwatched under cover of diplomatic immunity, a State Department official said today.

In New York, United Nations officials expressed surprise and indicated that the State Department should submit proof of its charges.

William Harlow, Chief of the State Department's Diplomatic Visa Section, told a Senate Judiciary Subcommittee the Government is "stymied" in its efforts to control the situation, and the problem is becoming more acute all the time.

He expressed his personal belief that every representative of an iron-curtain country attached to the UN headquarters is a threat to the Security of the United States. "That is their purpose here," he said.

Under the treaty which the United States signed with the United Nations when the world organization picked its headquarters site in New York, Mr. Harlow said, this country cannot deny entry to any person sent to the UN by a foreign government unless it can be proved that his entry would harm the public safety.

He revealed there had been a behind-the-scenes battle at the State Department over invoking this clause, with his visa section urging that entry be refused to some "known subversives." But, he said, the United Nations activities division of the Department overruled the suggestion, and won its way.

Mr. Harlow said the State Department has, and exercises, the power to grant limited visas to UN personnel who are suspected of being subversive foreign agents. Such visas forbid the holder to go outside the immediate vicinity of the UN headquarters site.

But, Mr. Harlow added, the State Department is unable to enforce the restriction in actual practice. It would cost millions to trail persons with limited visas to make sure they didn't wander outside the restricted zone, he said. Some such persons have turned up in Buffalo and Atlantic City, to the Department's knowledge, he said.

One man turned up at a press conference of Secretary of State George C. Marshall, he said.

Mr. Harlow didn't know whether the Justice Department, which includes the Federal Bureau of Investigation, was keeping an eye on limited-visa holders.

The FBI declined to comment on the situation, but it is known that the FBI, by longstanding policy, never places a watch on diplomatic personnel of other countries.

Senator CHAPMAN REVERCOMB, Republican, of West Virginia, chairman of a Senate Judiciary subcommittee, was not present at today's hearing. Reached at his home in Charleston, W. Va., he disagreed with the contention that the Government is powerless to do anything about the situation.

"Not even a visitor's visa should be issued to a subversive under the law," he said. "Our authorities are supposed to keep Communists out of this country."

He predicted the Mundt-Nixon Communist control bill, passed by the House last spring, would be enacted by the Senate when it reconvenes for the special session, and it would be amended to cover the problem aired by Mr. Harlow.

While avoiding a direct statement on Mr. Harlow's charges, Benjamin Cohen, of Chile, Assistant United Nations Secretary General, remarked that the United Nations has "no authority over diplomats brought in as members of delegations' staffs."

"That is the business of the United States and the diplomatic mission concerned," he said.

Official delegations of foreign nations to the UN have the same diplomatic rights and immunities in this country as ambassadors and other diplomats in Washington. Any complaint the United States Government had to make against their conduct would have to be made directly to the government concerned, and would amount to a serious international incident.

Mr. Harlow told the Senators that he was "speaking of delegates and the people attached to their delegations" when he said that "every person from an iron-curtain country is here for one purpose—to disseminate propaganda contrary to the interests of the United States."

"Otherwise they'd never have been permitted out of their own countries," he said.

But he emphasized that some employees of the United Nations headquarters secretariat and foreign press and radio correspondents accredited to the UN also were represented in the allegedly subversive group.

"There are a number of persons for whom the immigration service has been looking a long time," he remarked. "All of a sudden they pop up as accredited to the United Nations."

He declined to say how many subversive aliens had escaped deportation from the United States by getting themselves accredited as press, radio, film, or information representatives at UN headquarters.

Mr. Cohen said when questioned on that score that Soviet citizens on the UN staff are exceedingly few.

He said there also are only a relatively small number of Soviet and eastern European correspondents at UN headquarters.

Latest figures show that of 2,944 UN secretariat members, the following are from Communist countries: Russia, 31; Poland, 39; Yugoslavia, 7; Bulgaria, 2; Hungary, 1; Czechoslovakia, 28; Ukraine, 3.

Among 300 accredited correspondents at the headquarters there are 176 who work for foreign publications and information agencies. Of these, 15 are correspondents for Communist papers or agencies.

PREVIOUS TESTIMONY REVEALED

WASHINGTON, July 20.—The subcommittee is making a general study of immigration laws. The previous testimony of State Department officials was made public today.

Robert C. Alexander, Assistant Chief of the Department's Visa Division, told the legislators, in describing one case: "We had one person who was a newspaperman, and he was conferring with other persons here who were trained in terrorist activities in Moscow."

Mr. Alexander said he believed either the UN or its affiliates should assume the responsibility for getting such persons out of this country when their employment has ended.

R. Clyde Larkin, Chief of the State Department's Public Safety and Security Division, said he has no recommendations for meeting the situation.

Mr. Larkin said some of the agents have been moving about freely "trying to collect intelligence data which will be of benefit to their own country, whoever they may be serving, as well as for the enlightenment of various groups in this country."

Mr. Alexander said one of the greatest sources of concern, in addition to the UN, was the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration. "There are people still here who came in under UNRRA and we can't send them anywhere," Mr. Alexander said.

It was recalled at Lake Success today that last winter the United States arrested two correspondents accredited to the UN—one a Greek, the other an Indian. UN Secretary-General Trygve Lie protested on the ground that the arrests violated a United States-United Nations agreement. The Greek, who said he was a Communist, later was released and again was accredited by the UN as a correspondent.

Small Business Participation in National Defense Procurement

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER C. PLOESER
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 2, 1948

Mr. PLOESER. Mr. Speaker, when the Draft Act of 1948, now Public Law No. 759, was under consideration, I offered two amendments, of prime importance to small business, which were incorporated in the law. They require that small business be permitted to participate equitably in national defense procurement programs, and that adequate quantities of steel be allocated to small business holding contracts with the armed forces to satisfactorily execute such contracts.

These amendments were called especially to the attention of the Honorable James V. Forrestal, Secretary of Defense, by my letter of June 28, 1948, which, together with his reply, are here included in the extension of my remarks. They follow:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES,
SELECT COMMITTEE ON SMALL BUSINESS,
Washington, D. C., June 28, 1948.

Hon. JAMES V. FORRESTAL,
Secretary of Defense,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: In support of the interests of small business, while the draft bill was under consideration on the floor of the House of Representatives, I offered two amendments which were unanimously adopted and are now a part of Public Law No. 759.

The first amendment generally provides that small business shall be permitted to equitably participate in all procurement programs under national defense needs. The second amendment provides that the President, acting through the Secretary of Defense, is empowered to require the producers of steel to allocate to holders of contracts with the armed forces quantities of steel or steel materials necessary for the expeditious execution of such contracts. This amendment was designated for small business and will make it possible for small business, frequently unable under present conditions, to obtain sufficient steel to participate in Government defense contracts. This authority will encourage small business to bid for Government business and insure them a fair share of the over-all defense procurement.

The House Small Business Committee has been advised by many firms over the last several months that because of their present inability to obtain steel, they have a large percentage of idle open plant capacity which could be utilized for defense contracts. I have every hope with these new provisions of the law that procurement officers will carry out the emphasized intent of the Congress to work with these small units of our economy.

There need be no abuse of the steel amendment such as has been suggested in several recent newspaper articles speculating on the effect of these and other amendments under the utilization of the industry section on the draft bill. Neither should there be reason to believe, as some of these same articles point out, that such amendments will tend to return our economy to across-the-board controls. It should have just the opposite effect inasmuch as steel and the items covered by the Second Decontrol Act constitute the real scarcities.

When cooperation is had upon the part of the producers of steel, these sections will have little effect on the general economy and upon the total steel production except to expedite the defense program and protect against injury to the regular civilian business of the smaller firms.

I feel, and the Congress has endorsed my belief, that if small business is treated fairly under the defense program, the economy as a whole will be benefited. The all-important issue now, as it has been for some time, is to strengthen the position of small and independent business in the economic life of the Nation.

Sincerely,

WALTER C. PLOESER.

THE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE,
Washington, July 2, 1948.

Hon. WALTER C. PLOESER,
Chairman, Select Committee on Small Business, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I wish to acknowledge receipt of your letter of June 28, 1948, concerning the steel allocation and small-business provisions of the Selective Service Act of 1948 (Public Law 759).

You may already have seen the attached letter, dated July 1, 1948, from the President to the Secretary of Commerce setting forth his decision not to issue an Executive order invoking the steel allocation authority contained in section 18 (h) of the act at this time. Instead, the President has decided to rely for the present upon a voluntary allocations program to be worked out by the Secretary of Commerce, which will be designed to attain the legislative objectives of (i) providing the armed forces with the necessary amounts of steel and (ii) making it possible for small-business firms having defense orders to obtain their steel requirements.

Representatives of my office have already commenced discussions with the appropriate officials of the Department of Commerce to assist as much as possible in carrying out the voluntary program. In our procurement activities, we shall, of course, continue to enforce our new procurement regulations, which, as your earlier letter to me of May 28 points out, contain adequate safeguards to assure competitive bidding and to enable small business to get a fair share of the total procurement.

As I am sure you are well aware, I share the desire of your committee to maintain the strength of our small-business firms, and you can be assured that I shall give my full support in cooperating in the administration of the program designed to carry out the intent of Congress.

Sincerely,

JAMES FORRESTAL.

Education and Public Affairs

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD J. DEVITT
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 2, 1948

Mr. DEVITT. Mr. Speaker, Walter T. Ridder, chief of the St. Paul Pioneer Press Washington Bureau, wrote an interesting column the other day in his paper about the relationship of educators to public affairs. The column is written as a back drop to Governor Stassen's recent acceptance of the presidency of the University of Pennsylvania. The article brings to light several historical facets to the life of our early statesmen which I believe will furnish interesting reading to the membership. I include the column as part of my remarks:

STASSEN MOVE EYED

(By Walter T. Ridder)

WASHINGTON.—When Harold E. Stassen stepped into the academic world by accepting the post of president of the University of Pennsylvania, he took a job which many American politicians have taken as a place of refuge—or as a springboard.

The figures of future Presidents and past Presidents of the United States have not been uncommon on American university campuses. The tradition dates back to the earliest days of our history.

When Thomas Jefferson, third President, died, he wrote his own epitaph: "Here was buried Thomas Jefferson, author of the Declaration of Independence, of the Statute of Virginia for Religious Freedom, and Father of the University of Virginia."

Jefferson had very definite ideas on education (strangely enough some of them were considered quite undemocratic) and he nursed with loving care the fortunes of the university which he founded during his final years. From his home in Monticello, it was but a 5-mile journey to Charlottesville, site of his beloved college.

Another Virginian, John Tyler, used academic life as a means of propelling himself into the political scene. Tyler was rector and chancelor of William and Mary College (the Nation's second oldest college). Subsequently he became Governor of Virginia, Vice President, and succeeded to the Presidency when the incumbent, William Henry Harrison, died after but a month in office.

John Quincy Adams, Millard Fillmore, and William Howard Taft were all members of university staffs before achieving the Presidency—the first as a professor at Harvard, the second as chancelor of Buffalo University, and the last-named as dean of the law school, Cincinnati University.

Most spectacular of the leaps from the cloistered life of a university to the turbulence of national politics was that of Woodrow Wilson. He first gained national fame in his fight against exclusive clubs at Princeton and through his insistence as university president, that it be "democratized." The uproar over his moves pitched him into newspapers all over the country, and threw him into the national arena when he campaigned successfully for Governor of New Jersey on a reform ticket. From there he stepped into the White House.

Others have used the quiet of colleges to rest from their toils as President. Grover Cleveland retired to Princeton upon completion of his second term, and remained in scholarly seclusion to the end of his life.

William Howard Taft likewise sought rest in a university atmosphere. After losing to Wilson, he became professor at Yale's law school, until elevated to the post as Chief Justice of the Supreme Court.

Thus, when Stassen throws in his lot with a university, he takes a position which does not necessarily take him out of the public eye. Indeed, as head of a large school, he has the opportunity to present his views at chosen moments and still, at the same time, keeping aloof from the in-fighting of politics. He has, in short, done nothing to harm his political future.

Pensions

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HELEN GAHAGAN DOUGLAS
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 29, 1948

Mrs. DOUGLAS. Mr. Speaker, is it possible this Congress will adjourn without having passed a fair and adequate pension program?

The high cost of living is hard on all of us but think what it means to people living on meager pensions. How can we in all decency adjourn without taking the necessary action that would really allow the fathers and mothers of America to retire into an old age free from want and anxiety?

The rising cost of food, clothes, rent, and utilities and everything else has made it impossible for all those on fixed incomes to maintain a decent standard of living.

Is it possible that the leadership of this Congress proposes to adjourn without having made any effort to check these rising prices that are shrinking the value of the dollar and eating up the savings of the American consumer—throwing him into debt, and making it more difficult day by day to live?

Corporations, after taxes, enjoy the highest profits in history. Yet this Congress has labored day after day to reduce their taxes—not only in Mr. KNUTSON'S famous tax bill—but in bill after bill that has come before Congress, with the result that they have lifted the burden of the war debt from the shoulders of the rich and placed it on the backs of those not now able to make ends meet.

Are the corporations the ones who need help? Are those in the high-income bracket counting their pennies, nickels, and dimes to see whether or not they have enough for a decent meal—enough to pay the rent?

Shame, Mr. Speaker, shame that the Republican leadership of this Congress has refused to concern itself with the desperate economic plight of our mothers and fathers who in their last years have a right to dignity and security.

The Equal-Rights Amendment

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WAYNE MORSE
OF OREGON
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, August 3 (legislative day of Wednesday, July 28), 1948

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD two editorials endorsing the equal-rights amendment.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the National Woman's Party magazine, Washington, D. C.]

RAYMOND GRAM SWING ENDORSES THE EQUAL-RIGHTS AMENDMENT

The guaranty of full equality to women would complete the historic catalog of the first freedoms which are embodied in the concept of Americanism. The grant of equality to women has been delayed by complex and secondary considerations, chiefly the effect it would have on legislation designed to protect working women from exploitation. Democratic society tends to tie itself into such knots, where the major principle is tangled up with the consequences of well-meant compromises. Then comes a time when the compromises themselves, however well intentioned, hold back the acceptance of a vital principle. That time has come in this question of full equality for women. It needs to be affirmed and established as the basic law of the land. The inconvenience of readjusting past compromises is insignifiant. The principle is vital. America cannot be a vigorous democracy while withholding any fraction of full equality from half of its citizens.

RAYMOND GRAM SWING.

[From the Saturday Review of Literature of July 17, 1948]

THE WOMEN ARE COMING!

Unknown to the majority of the women in this country, a steadily mounting feminist campaign is under way for equal rights for women under the Constitution. The average man will regard this statement with bewilderment. They have the vote, haven't they? They are omnipresent in almost every business and industry; they are slowly entering professions from which they were formerly rigidly excluded. A quarter of the entire labor force of America is now made up of girls and women. They are supposed to own a good deal more than two-thirds of the wealth of the Nation, due to the long habit of men of endowing their wives with an insurance policy, a legacy, and in some cases, with alimony. What more do they want? An occasional apprehensive male looks over his shoulders at an advancing tidal wave of restless and perhaps menacing women and mutters "matriarchy" under his breath.

Nothing would have served the feminist cause better than the attacks that were leveled on the American woman during the last 18 months. The old form of feminism which won women equal suffrage in England and America was almost inevitably founded on competition with male workers. During the war women flooded into industries and the armed services, were applauded as self-sacrificing heroines. They were startled when the inevitable attempt to send them back where they came from took the form of ridicule or a psychiatric study of their inadequacies and their neuroses in the public press. A book by a well-known woman psychiatrist, "Woman, the Lost Sex," became a best seller and a storehouse of arguments for the antifeminist crusade. Since most of this literature was both logical and apparently scientifically sound, it was effective in persuading many women to lose confidence in themselves and in what they may have unconsciously conceived as their destiny.

This attack was answered in the end in women's magazines and in innumerable women's clubs. Since it was leveled against the American mother as well as the working woman, it was absurdly contradictory. They couldn't both be dangerous to the American way of life. It became obvious that the working woman was living in a home of some sort that she had created for herself or her family, and there was no room for her back on the farm or in her parents' city apartment. The "career women" who received the brunt of the assault turned out on reflection to be simply a woman who had succeeded in business. Therefore, ambition and success were supposed to be right for a man, but wrong for a woman. It could be shown that as many men as women were consulting psychiatrists, and that men were more susceptible to stomach ulcers.

The attack failed, but it succeeded in giving a new impetus to the cause of woman's rights and to a growing enthusiasm for the new feminist program that had been quietly taking the place of the old rivalry with the male sex. The goal is now partnership with men in the economic, political, and domestic life of the country. But before this program can become a vital and even resistless force, certain existing legal, economic, or educational inequalities in several states must be done away with one by one, or destroyed in one blow by the proposed equal-rights amendment to the Constitution. This amendment could hardly be stated more simply. "Equality under the law shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of sex."

Three months ago the Senate Judiciary subcommittee recommended 7 to 1 that the amendment "do pass," and it may again be a part of the Democratic and Republican platforms. The ladies who besieged the embattled and doubtless embarrassed Senators in April may find out again that this is an election year promise. It is notable that Senator TAFT has proposed what was oddly called the biological status bill, as if women had to fight in defense of their biological functions. This bill was the reverse of the medal. Senator ARTHUR CAPPER, of Kansas, sponsor in the Senate of the equal-rights amendment, was the first witness against the Taft proposal that it should be made "the declared policy of the United States to permit in law and its administration distinction on the basis of sex * * * such as are reasonably justified by differences in physical structure, biological, or social function." You do not have to be a feminist to see to what prejudices and discriminations this might lead in the future, since even in an atomic age, women will fortunately remain women.

It is still true that as women they have little protection under the law, since what rights have been given to them can as easily be taken away by legislative action in the various States. An embittered woman writer has recently said, "The only right that women actually have is not to be lynched for their sex."

Most fair-minded men and women must approve of this fight for equality of opportunity under the Constitution. But when the equal rights amendment has been passed, what will women want next? The answer is simple. They will want politics to be opened to them freely as a career. It is absurd that we should have only seven women, including the widows of former incumbents in our House of Representatives, while newly organized states such as India and the nations behind the Iron Curtain have many times that number as legislators, and have women as ministers of government and even as ambassadors. That one of our Representatives who took her husband's place is certain in November to be the second woman ever elected to the Senate merely emphasizes the inadequacy of feminine representation in our Government. This year marks another milestone in this direction. For the first time it has been seriously proposed, then accepted by a likely candidate of one of the major parties, that Mrs. Roosevelt might be acceptable as Vice President of the United States.

To equip themselves to enter politics women must be trained for the rough and tumble of partisan strife from the ground up. They must be present at party meetings, besiege the electorate, and fight their way through town councils and local political appointments to state and national legislatures. They must learn how to think and speak eloquently, though it is to be hoped that they will not practice their speeches at home. If we insist that women are not people but only a biologically and legally differentiated sex, let us take the consequences when they vote as women. A matriarchy? There might at least be fewer wars.

Bill To Provide Farms for Veterans and Others in the Central Valley of California

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHET HOLIFIELD
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced a bill in the Eightieth Congress to help meet the distressing situation in California where there are vast acreages in the Central Valley owned by corporations, an unsolved problem of homeless migrant peoples, and a great number of returned servicemen with farm backgrounds who cannot find farms for themselves and their families.

The bill authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to operate a revolving fund of $50,000,000 for the purpose of purchasing the excess private lands in the Central Valley project and reselling them to small farmers. Veterans are to have first chance at such lands, with a special preference to any veterans who have been tenants or workers on these excess lands since the end of the war. A condition of sale is that the purchaser must work the farm he buys.

In the Central Valley of California, where agricultural practices are intensive, land and operating costs heavy, and yields high, the overwhelming number of farmers successfully operate holdings of less than 50 acres. But there are great corporation farms, literally "factories in the fields" of 12,000 and even of 300,000 acres, in which much of the land must be provided with water to be profitably cultivated. At the same time there is a land hunger so great that returned servicemen with farming backgrounds are working as farm laborers, and many thousands of farmers are in industrial employment in our crowded cities who would make excellent farm operators if the land were available.

As the great Central Valley project nears completion with its multi-million-dollar investment of taxpayers' money developing a vast irrigation system for the parched lands of the valley, so the big landholders are doing everything in their power to secure water without abiding by the reclamation law which has been the basis of our land policy ever since it was enacted in 1902. My bill will enable them to comply with that law which has given us the kind of family-sized farming operations that have made us an independent, virile American people. It will insure them an immediate market for their land and a fair return for those excess lands which they must dispose of, if the land is to secure its rightful share of publicly developed water. More than that, it will reestablish on the land, and in rural communities, many thousands of ex-servicemen and their families to grow up with the country and make their great contribution to its economic and social welfare.

The bill provides a sound procedure for filing on lands, acceptance of applications and sale to veterans. For, judging by the filings on the limited acreage made available to veterans having farm backgrounds at Tule Lake in northern California, the land hunger is so great that applications may far exceed the number of farms available.

My bill allows for long-term credit at low interest, with provision for deferment of interest and payments during periods of prolonged depressions of farm prices. It also includes provisions for loans to be made on favorable terms to individuals and cooperatives to purchase farm machinery and stock, and to install wells and pumping equipment. The purpose of these provisions is clearly to make reasonably sure that the veteran will have a fair chance to succeed in his farm operations.

This bill contemplates no cost to the Government or the taxpayers. For, the fund and services made available to the farmers will be entirely self-supporting. Present-day experience with farm and home loans made by the Federal Government has amply proved that this is no pipedream. Sound business practices used have resulted in making available the needed funds at low rates of interest and with absolute assurance of return of the capital loaned.

No one who has studied the situation prevailing in many countries where great numbers of farm-backgrounded people are denied access to the land can help but conclude that this has been one of the most aggravating social issues of modern times. Land hunger is a real and terrible thing. It stalks this country. It is especially noticeable in the Central Valley of California. To have thousands of our finest people who know farming, and who have gone through the great sacrifice of war service to protect our land and liberties, going landless while great corporations are allowed to take profits on thousands of acres of land made productive by the waters developed by costly public projects in the Central Valley is manifestly un-American. It is not in the public interest. My bill is intended to correct this situation. It is introduced in behalf of the hundreds and thousands of veterans and farmers of my State of California.

Under permission heretofore granted, I shall have the verbatim copy of my bill printed herewith:

A bill to promote the development in the area of the Central Valley Federal reclamation project, California, of reasonably sized owner-operated farms

Be it enacted, etc., That, promptly upon the effective date of this act, there shall be established in the Treasury of the United States a revolving fund, not exceeding $50,000,000, to be known as the "Central Valley project, California, excess-land purchase fund," in which moneys appropriated for the purposes of this act and proceeds and revenues derived from the administration of this act shall be deposited from time to time. Moneys in said fund shall be available, on order of the Secretary of the Interior from time to time, for the purposes of this act.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to acquire by purchase and shall, as promptly as shall be practicable after the effective date of this act and the provision of necessary funds therefor, offer to purchase, in the name of the United States and at a price not exceeding its market value, ascertained as hereinafter provided, any land which he determines to be within the general area of the Central Valley project, California, which is now irrigated or which he deems irrigable, whether by surface delivery or by pumping or for which, in his judgment, supplemental water for irrigation will be supplied, either by surface delivery or through the recharging of underground supplies. The purchase price paid by the Secretary of the Interior for any land acquired under the authority of this act shall not in any event exceed the current market value thereof and of the improvements thereon or the market value thereof and improvements thereon as of July 31, 1948, whichever is the lesser: Provided, That the market value, as specified in this act, of any parcel of land and improvements thereon proposed to be thus acquired by the Secretary of the Interior shall be determined by a board of three qualified real estate appraisers, appointed by the Secretary of the Interior, at least two of whom shall be citizens of the State of California. Said board shall select its own chairman and shall act by majority vote.

SEC. 3. Lands acquired under the authority of this act and public lands of the United States within the said general area of the Central Valley project, California, shall be administered by the Secretary of the Interior. The said Secretary is hereby authorized to sell, exchange, or lease such public or acquired lands; and to accept donations of real or personal property for the purposes of this act. Contracts, exchanges, and leases made under the authority of this act shall be on terms that are in keeping with sound project development and business principles. Leases of lands shall be for periods not exceeding 10 years. Contracts for the sale of lands shall be on a basis that, in the Secretary's judgment, will provide the return in a reasonable period of years, not in any event exceeding 25, of the purchase price, to the United States, of the lands in question and of the improvements thereon, plus interest thereon at a rate not exceeding 1 percent more than the average cost of money to the United States at the time of the Secretary's acquisition of the land and improvements in question. Lands acquired pursuant to the authority of this act and public lands of the United States covered by this act may be disposed of in farm units of such sizes as the Secretary determines to be sufficient to provide an adequate standard of living, having in mind the character of the soil, its topography, its location with respect to irrigation systems, and such other factors as the Secretary deems relevant. Sales to any individual shall be of no more than one farm unit. All contracts of sale of farm units and all conveyances thereof made under the authority of this act shall contain suitable provisions designed, among other things, to assure reversion to the United States of equitable or legal title, as the case may be, in the event the purchaser thereof, or any of his successors in interest, shall fail to reside thereon and to use the same as a farm home: Provided, That, in the event of such reversion to the United States any amounts theretofore paid to the United States by such purchaser or his successors in interest, on account of the purchase of any such farm unit and found by the Secretary to be in excess of the reasonable value of the use of the unit in question from the date of its sale to the date of such reversion, as determined by the Secretary, shall be returned without interest to such purchaser or his successor or successors in interest. Provided further, That, in any event, the amount thus returned to such purchaser or his successor or successors in interest shall not exceed the then current market value of the unit in question.

SEC. 4. (a) The Secretary may enter into agreements to pay annual sums in lieu of taxes to the State of California or to political subdivisions thereof with respect to any real property after acquisition pursuant to the authority of this act and before execution by the United States of a contract of sale covering it, out of funds derived from the leasing of any such real property so acquired. The amount so paid for any year shall not exceed the taxes that are assessed currently by the State or subdivision on adjoining acreages.

(b) Any public lands within the said general area of the Central Valley project, California, and any lands or interests in lands acquired by the United States under this act, beginning at such date or dates and subject to such provisions and limitations as may be fixed or provided by regulations of the Secretary, shall be—

(1) Subject to the provisions of the laws of the State of California, relating to the organization, government, and regulation of the respective irrigation, reclamation, conservancy, drainage, or similar district in which the lands are included; and

(2) Subject to legal assessment or taxation by any such district and to liens for such assessments and taxes and to all proceedings for the enforcement thereof, in the same manner and to the same extent as privately owned lands of like character.

The United States does not assume any obligation for amounts so assessed or taxed; and any proceedings to enforce them shall be subject to any title then remaining in the United States, to any prior lien reserved to the United States for unpaid installments under land-sales contracts made under this act, and to any lien for any other charges, accrued or unaccrued, under and by virtue of such contracts or any contract between the United States and the district in which the land is located. Regulations to carry out this subsection shall be effective when promulgated by the Secretary.

(c) In addition to taxation or assessment under subsection (b) of this section, upon execution by the United States of a contract of sale of any lands covered by this act, the lands under contract may be taxed by the State of California or political subdivisions thereof in the same manner and to the same extent as privately owned lands of a like character. All taxes legally so assessed may be enforced in the same manner and under the same proceedings whereby said taxes are enforced against privately owned lands, subject to the limitations in favor of the United States that govern the enforcement of district assessments or taxes as provided in subsection (b) of this section. If lands under any such contract or conveyed under the authority of this act shall at any time revert to the United States, all liens or tax titles resulting from taxes levied pursuant to the authority of this subsection upon such lands shall thereupon be extinguished; and the levying of any such tax by the State of California or a political subdivision thereof shall be deemed to be an agreement on its part, in the event of such reversion, to execute and record a formal release of such lien or tax title.

SEC. 5. (a) For a period of 10 years following the effective date of this act, veterans shall have a 90-day preferred right of purchase as provided in this section, with respect to lands when made available by the Secretary of the Interior for purchase on projects constructed, operated, or maintained by the Bureau of Reclamation, Department of the Interior.

(b) When the Secretary determines that any tract or tracts of land acquired or administered under the authority of this act are available for purchase for irrigation farming, he shall announce their availability, and shall immediately furnish copies of the announcement to veteran agencies.

(c) The Secretary shall, in accordance with the provisions of subsection C of section 4 of this act of December 5, 1924 (43 Stat. 672, 702), determine the qualifications to be required of veterans and other applicants for the purchase of acquired or public lands covered by this act. In determining whether a veteran applicant possesses funds sufficient to meet the capital requirements prescribed pursuant to said act, moneys advanced to veterans as operating capital shall be deemed acceptable as a substitute for all or a portion of the capital requirements so prescribed.

(d) The Administrator of Veterans' Affairs and the heads of other Federal agencies which are now or hereafter authorized to make provision for the reestablishment of veterans in civil life (herein called veterans' agencies) shall inform veterans of settlement opportunities. The veterans' agencies are further authorized and directed to exercise the authority with respect to veterans' assistance now or hereafter conferred upon them by law, to the fullest extent consistent with the general policies and procedures governing the exercise of such authority in the case of other veterans, for the extension of such assistance; subject to the applicable legislative or administrative restrictions, in furtherance of the following ends:

(1) That qualified veterans desiring to settle on lands within any project constructed, operated, or maintained by the Bureau of Reclamation shall be afforded through such agencies financial assistance for the purchase of land, for the acquisition or erection of housing, farm buildings and adjuncts, improvements, equipment, chattels and operating capital, and for transportation to the project; and

(2) That banks and Federal agencies so authorized shall be encouraged to make loans on reasonable terms to veterans, groups of veterans, cooperatives, and others, for the purchase of land within any such project, and the acquisition or erection of housing, farm buildings and adjuncts, improvements, equipment, chattels, and other operating capital.

The veterans' agencies and the Secretary of Agriculture shall, to the fullest extent practicable, cooperate with the Secretary of the Interior in all activities now or hereafter authorized by this act or other applicable law that are related to the accomplishment of the foregoing ends. Nothing contained in this act shall be deemed to confer upon the Secretary jurisdiction over the operations of the veterans' or other agencies in extending financial or other assistance to veterans.

SEC. 6. The Secretary is authorized to perform such acts, to make such rules and regulations, and to include in the contracts hereinbefore authorized such provisions as he deems proper for carrying out the provisions of this act. In connection with sales or exchanges of lands acquired by purchase, he is authorized to effect conveyances without regard to the law governing the patenting of public lands. Wherever in this act functions, powers, or duties are conferred upon the Secretary, or the head of any veterans' or other agency, these functions, powers, or duties may be performed, exercised, or discharged by the duly authorized representative of the Secretary or the head of such other agency, as the case may be.

SEC. 7. As used in this act, the term "veteran" means any person who during World War II was entitled to the benefits afforded by the Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act of 1940, as now or hereafter amended, and who has been honorably discharged or otherwise honorably separated from the service entitling him to such benefits. "Veteran" does not include any person who was entitled to such benefits solely by reason of being ordered to report for induction under the Selective Training and Service Act of 1940, as amended.

SEC. 8. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such moneys as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act. All revenues received in carrying out the provisions of this act shall be covered into the fund known as "Central Valley project, California, excess-land purchase fund" and shall be available for the purposes for which said fund is available.

Why Is Meat Scarce?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUBERT S. ELLIS
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, in these days when all of us are concerned with the high cost of living, a lot of people blame the farmer particularly regarding meat.

If you examine the record, you will find that the Department of Agriculture and other administration authorities are largely responsible for our present difficulty. An examination of the record of the Department of Agriculture for the past 10 years and their recommendations will disclose that with the start of OPA the number of cattle, hogs, and sheep have declined on our farms and this was with the recommendation of the Department of Agriculture.

WHY LESS CATTLE?

The cattle population of 1944 was 85,573,000. Two years later it was 81,207,000. The President and the Department of Agriculture recommended they be reduced 2,707,000 in 1947 and it was done. Today, according to their report, we have 78,564,000 head of all kinds of cattle in this country. Now listen to this, you consumers who are paying good prices for meat. The Department of Agriculture recommends that the farmers reduce their breeding herds by 517,000 head for this next year. It is almost unbelievable but that is the Department's recommendations.

WHAT IS THE RECORD ON HOGS?

In 1943 the spring pig crop was 74,223,000. The fall crop was 47,584,000. Now what was the Agriculture Department's goal for 1946? Well, they recommended 51,651,000 spring pigs, a reduction of nearly 23,000,000 head.

The Department in one instance was telling the people there would be a shortage of pork and the next instance asked the farmer in 1948 to produce 2,780,000 less head of pigs than in 1947. This year the goals are raised but it takes at least a year to produce pork and from 2 to 3 years to produce beef.

Now what about sheep? The records show that in 1942, 55,120,000 head of sheep and lambs in this country and then came OPA with regulations and careful planning with recommendations until today the sheep and lamb population is about 35,332,000, a reduction of nearly 20,000,000 head.

The same story from the Department's own records could be told about poultry and eggs. It must be recognized, Mr. Speaker, that the professional planners of the Wallace days still believe you can have prosperity through scarcity. We all remember the famous Luckman's order to reduce poultry to save grain. Marketing livestock at light weights, etc.

In these days of increased demand for meat and the population increasing almost a million a year, it is difficult to understand why the Department of Agriculture asks for fewer breeding cows. Do they actually want a shortage so that they can again force wartime controls upon the people? Every school child knows we want more production and not less.

It is recognized by everyone that our enormous exports for European aid plays a tremendous part in the high prices and scarcities in our commodity market.

The following table, computed from statistics received from the Office of Foreign Agricultural Relations, United States Department of Agriculture, shows the large exports of pork and pork products. These exports were obtained by reducing hog numbers and were obtained by killing off the seed stock. The imports of lard and pork were very small.

The table of exports is as follows:

Pork and pork products: United States exports

[Quantity, 1,000 pounds]

1940	295,148
1941	660,999
1942	1,302,728
1943	1,828,356
1944	1,989,033
1945	1,044,101
1946	714,785
1947	440,192

I do not have the export statistics on beef at the moment but the amount is enormous. It is very easy to see who has messed up the production of meat and produced scarcity.

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am inserting the following news release issued by the Committee for Justice and Peace in the Holy Land relative to expressed fears on the part of the Arabs toward encroachments of Zionism in Jerusalem:

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 29.—The executive board of the Committee for Justice and Peace in the Holy Land, meeting in New York, expressed grave concern over recent statements by Foreign Minister Shertok and other spokesmen for the Israeli provisional government. These statements indicate Israel's intention of expanding by conquest the borders of the state beyond those recommended by the United Nations General Assembly, and including Jerusalem which the UN had designated as an international zone.

The executive board declared:

"Arab opposition to Zionism has grown from the fear that Zionism planned, by aggressive immigration and eventual military action, to wrest more and more of the Arabs' lands from them. Recent assertions by Moshe Shertok and others make these fears seem thoroughly justified and add fuel to the flames of war. The Security Council should warn Israel that her position constitutes a threat to peace."

The executive board also declared:

"The Committee for Justice and Peace in the Holy Land urges the United States Government to change its stand regarding the reference by the Security Council of the Palestine question to the Court of International Justice. So close was the vote that the abstention of the United States prevented the matter being referred to the Court. The American people have always considered a court of final appeal as an essential part of the fabric of democratic government. It is hard to imagine our own federation of States working without our Supreme Court. The Court of International Justice must come to occupy a similar key position in the structure of the United Nations. Distinguished authorities differ as to interpretation of the United Nations Charter in matters affecting the Palestine dispute. Forty millions of people of the Arab world feel that their case has not had a fair and just hearing. Surely this is precisely the sort of case which should be referred to the Court. In refusing to support this course, the United States has struck a serious blow at the structure of the United Nations. We appeal to our Government to change this stand.

"The committee also urges the Congress of the United States to revise the legislation concerning displaced persons passed at its last session so as to eliminate the un-American discrimination against certain religious and racial groups. The committee has always been warmly in favor of the admission of our full and fair share of displaced persons. It is disturbed by the rising tide of antisemitism of which the recent displaced persons legislation is one manifestation. The situation in Palestine has been made even more difficult by this legislation. It could be considerably eased by the passage of a displaced persons bill which would be generous and in the American tradition."

The People Are Interested in Performance—What Will the Eightieth Congress Do About Housing and Inflation?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN D. DINGELL

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of July 26, 1948:

AS CONGRESS MEETS

Congress meets today in one of the most unusual sessions in history. It will amount to a dress rehearsal of the Presidential campaign. Mr. Truman has been bitterly criticized for the special session call on the ground that it is a political stratagem, designed to improve Democratic chances in November. Moreover, the manner of his announcement, in the midst of his acceptance speech at Philadelphia, has been characterized as beneath the dignity of the Presidential office.

Mr. Truman can reply, and no doubt will do so when he appears before Congress tomorrow, that the last session left much unfinished business and that the urgency of some of the problems before the country cannot be postponed until next January. He can also say that the Republican platform pledges the majority party to actions which might have been completed last session, but were not; the special session, then, can test the sincerity of those pledges.

The average independent citizen, however, is not so much interested in the jockeying for partisan advantage and in the charges and countercharges of the two parties as he is in performance. If the special session is barren of achievement, it will leave Mr. Citizen with the feeling that the country's well-being has been neglected in a futile political sparring match.

It is up to the Republicans, therefore, to make it more than that, and they have the votes to do so. Moreover, while Governor Dewey is without direct responsibility, everyone knows that congressional leaders will be looking to him for guidance as the party's standard-bearer. If the session writes a record of statesmanship, Mr. Dewey will inevitably be given credit—and vice versa.

Good statesmanship is always good politics, too. Let the grumbling Republicans, called from their homes in midsummer, realize that Mr. Truman, whatever his motives in calling the session, has presented them with a challenge and an opportunity. It will yield no dividens if they follow a course of inaction and obstruction; if they, on the other hand, pass a sheaf of excellent legislation, great advantage will accrue to them.

The country is desperately in need of action to halt the rising price trend, as is evident every day as housewives go to the grocery store. It is desperately in need of such housing legislation as the Taft-Ellender-Wagner bill, which passed the Republican Senate in the last session only to be smothered in the House. If these two problems alone were tackled in the special session, it could be a big success.

Nothing could be more disillusioning than for the civil-rights issue to be used as a roadblock. Both parties are pledged to pass civil-rights bills, but the southern Democrats promise a filibuster, a troublesome tactic in any case, and a particularly troublesome one in a short session. Therefore, Congress should give priority to other legislation. If a filibuster does develop, the rule of cloture should be invoked.

We urge the Republican majority to distinguish itself in the sesison, to rise above petty political considerations, to accept the gage that Mr. Truman hurled and use the occasion for the national welfare. Then the Republicans can go into the fall campaign with a powerful appeal for public support.

Distributing the Poverty

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUBERT S. ELLIS
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include an editorial from the Parkersburg News, published in Parkersburg, W. Va., and edited by Francis P. Fisher, of August 3, 1948. The editorial follows:

DISTRIBUTING THE POVERTY

Writing in American Affairs, Dr. M. J. Bonn presents an objective and thoughtful discussion of socialism in England. His last paragraph sums up his conclusions: "It would be a great pity were the Socialist Labor Party to be released from power and responsibility before a majority of its followers has learnt the lesson that leisure is the result of plenty and plenty is the result of work."

The favorite catch-phrase of socialism in all countries is its pledge to divide the wealth. This at once conjures up heavenly visions of a society in which everyone will live in luxury with a minimum of effort. What actually happens—and, England today is a living, breathing example of that—is that the wealth is destroyed, and what is distributed is the poverty. When we arbitrarily attempt to lift all men to the top we succeed in pushing all men down toward the bottom.

The capitalist system, by contrast, is based on the principle of incentive. There is a minimum of government meddling in our affairs. A man can go as far as his energies and abilities allow. And if the proof of the pudding lies in the eating, this system has produced more leisure, more wealth, more luxury for the masses of people, than any other since the world began. In Russia, for example, we have the socialized state in the extreme. And the average Russian's income, measured in terms of what it will buy, is about 10 percent of the average American's.

Furthermore, the class distinctions and abuse of special privilege the socialists are always talking about are far more flagrant in the socialized state. Again, Russia is the best example. The ruling class and their favorites live in luxury of Czarist proportions. Everybody else lives in comparative squalor.

Lastly, and most important, the abuses of capitalism can be corrected—as the whole history of the United States illustrates. The people are top dog, and when they become enraged they get remedial action. The abuses of socialism, once they are firmly entrenched, can be corrected only by revolution—the state is all-powerful and it is ruthless when it comes to perpetuating itself. That is just another way of saying that the total state must be a police state, making full use of guns and clubs and concentration camps to hold the people in line. It always happens when a nation trades freedom for dubious promises of security.

Nazi Farben Criminals Given Light Sentences—Judge Criticizes Leniency—Only Five Convicted of Abusing Slaves

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE G. SADOWSKI
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. SADOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, the trial of the officials of the I. G. Farben chemical trust which started 11 months ago ended on July 29, with a verdict that none of the 24 on trial were guilty of backing Hitler's war of conquest. Some of them were merely found guilty of looting industries in subjugated countries and of mistreating slave labor. Yet everybody knows that these big monopolists were the real warmakers and were working hand in glove with Hitler and his despicable Nazis.

Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include an AP dispatch on the I. G. Farben trial at Nuremberg and the editorial comment that appeared in the Detroit News on Saturday, July 31, 1948.

ONLY FIVE CONVICTED OF ABUSING SLAVES

NUREMBERG, GERMANY, July 30.—Thirteen directors of the giant I. G. Farben chemical trust were convicted of war crimes and sentenced today to serve jail terms ranging from 18 months to 8 years.

One of the four American judges promptly filed a dissent, contending that the decision of the majority was too lenient.

The dissenting judge was Paul M. Hebert, of Baton Rouge, La., who declared that he felt that 20 of the 23 defendants should have been convicted of mistreating slave labor. Only five actually were convicted on this count.

The penalties against the 13 men convicted were the mildest ever imposed in a war-crimes trial in this war-crimes capital of conquered Germany.

ESCAPE MAJOR CHARGE

The sentences meant that actually only 7 of the 24 Farben directors who went to trial 11 months ago will stay behind bars for any length of time. All were credited with time already served.

The defendants all were acquitted Thursday of the stiffest charge in the indictment—plotting and waging aggressive war.

Carl Krauch, chairman of the board of the once great billion-dollar firm, was sentenced to serve 6 years. The specific charge on which he was convicted was the misuse of slave labor.

Hermann Schmitz, 67, private counselor to the Farben board of directors, got a 4-year sentence for plundering occupied countries.

OTHER SENTENCES

Other sentences on the charge of misusing slave labor: Fritz Ter Meer, 7 years; Otto Ambros, 8 years; Heinrich Buetefisch, 6 years; and Walter Duerrfeld, 8 years.

On the charge of plundering and despoiling countries occupied by the Nazis the following sentences were imposed: George von Schnitzler, 5 years; Ernest Buergin, 2 years; Paul Haefliger, 2 years; Max Ilgner, 3 years; Friedrich Jaehne, 18 months; Heinrich Oster, 2 years; and Hans Kugler, 18 months.

As a result of the defendants being given credit for time already served, Ilgner, Jaehne, Oster, Buergin, and Kugler will go free at once.

Ter Meer and Duerfeld were linked closely to the Farben synthetic rubber plant at Auschwitz (Oswiecim) concentration camp. Ter Meer was the only defendant convicted on two counts.

THE MEN ACQUITTED

The court acquitted on all counts Fritz Gajewski, Henrich Hoerlein, August von Knieriem, Christian Schneider, Hans Kuehne, Carl Lautenschlaeger, Wilhelm Mann, Karl Wurster, Heinrich Gattineau, and Erich von der Heyde.

Max Brueggerman was severed from the case because of illness.

The slave labor judgment was read today. The spoliation and plunder conviction was handed down Thursday.

The tribunal acquitted Schneider, Buetefisch, and von der Heyde of membership in a criminal organization—the SS (Nazi elite guard). It was acknowledged that they had membership, but the court ruled it was somewhat honorary and had no real significance.

[From the Detroit News of July 31, 1948]

CHEERING THE COMMIES

When the 24 I. G. Farben industrialists were put in the dock at Nuremberg on August 28, 1947, the American chief of counsel, Brig. Gen. Telford Taylor told the court: "These are the men who made war possible and they did it because they wanted to conquer."

There followed a long and costly trial, the practical results of which now make it seem like a case of bringing up the heavy artillery to shoot at a clay pipe.

Eleven directors went scot free. The remaining 13 were given sentences equivalent to those doled out to a first-time pickpocket or shoplifter.

Not having heard the body of the evidence, we cannot say that this is a miscarriage of justice. Possibly General Taylor failed to prove his case. Possibly the judges concluded that for industrialists to league with politicians and soldiers in the carrying out of mass murder and other outrages is a very little crime.

One dissenting judge at least impugned the judgment of the majority in that particular.

But the effect of it, and the disparity between Nuremberg's harsh judgments of soldiers and its soft judgments of businessmen, will not be lost on the world, least of all the Communist world.

They will say of it: "That is justice for a capitalist in a capitalist court."

They said it once before when Schacht was allowed to go, almost with our blessing.

Special Session Should Help Voters Make Up Their Minds

OF
HON. JOHN D. DINGELL
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an article entitled "Why the Special Session Is Useful" from the Christian Science Monitor of July 19, 1948, and another article "Special Session Puts Voters in the Saddle" from the July 21, 1948, issue of the same newspaper:

WHY THE SPECIAL SESSION IS USEFUL

(By Roscoe Drummond, chief, Washington bureau, the Christian Science Monitor)

WASHINGTON.—So far, most of the discussion about the special session of Congress called for July 26 has revolved around whether it will help or hurt President Truman, whether it will embarrass or benefit the Republicans.

This is quite secondary, quite unimportant.

What is important is whether it serves the country, not whether it serves the politicians.

There is a very good prospect that whatever the special session may do to Mr. Truman or to Gov. Thomas E. Dewey, it will be eminently useful to the voters.

Of course, there's politics in the President's action, and there's politics in the Republican response to the President's action.

Mr. Truman well may lose the advantage he is trying to gain in this maneuver. And if the Republicans aren't a little wiser and a little cooler than their first pained screams indicate, Governor Dewey may find that his Congress has put him at a disadvantage.

But it is hard to see how the country can lose, how the voter can be put at any disadvantage.

However political the President's purpose, the summoning of the special session on the eve of the campaign can make the 1948 election exceptionally meaningful and realistic. Quite unwittingly, it combines one of the best features of parliamentary government with the special advantages of the American system of national elections at regular intervals:

1. The American voters in a Presidential campaign ordinarily are asked to choose between two candidates and two parties mostly on the basis of what each promises to do if elected.

This fall the voters will have a chance to choose between two parties on the basis of what those parties actually do in a session of Congress which will end as the campaigning begins.

This time there is a good chance—at least the special session makes it possible—that the voters can make their decision on the basis of action, not merely on the basis of words; on the basis of performance, not merely on the basis of pledges.

2. Usually in Presidential elections, the record of the Congress is so distant and often so confused that it is only an incidental factor in the campaign. This time the special session undoubtedly will convene into the very heart of the campaign. The effect will be very near to the parliamentary system, wherein parliament is adjourned and goes immediately to the country upon specific and overriding issues.

When Congress adjourns at the end of the special session, both parties will be forced to go to the country on the basis of the record which each has made at the very time each party knew it had to submit itself to the electorate.

3. The central issues of the campaign will be made more than usually vital and visible by having Congress function before the very searchlight of voter opinion and conscious that it will be subject immediately and conclusively to voter decision. Congressional action—or inaction—is a far better and more realistic guide to what any party will do in office than are the speeches of the Presidential nominees.

For all of these reasons, however hard the special session may be on the politicians, it can be an incalculable boon to the voters.

Quite simply and completely nonpartisanly, I should like to ask:

Why shouldn't the Republican Party be asked by the voters, if not by a partisan President, to show that it can make good upon its platform before the election rather than after it? It is committed in its platform on virtually every issue which will come before the session. Why shouldn't it act upon a few of the most urgent?

And why shouldn't the Democratic Party be asked to show to its potential supporters whether it intends to make good upon its platform before rather than after the election? The platform praised President Truman for his civil rights program. Will his party, which has opposed it in the past, support it this summer? The platform pledged repeal of the Taft-Hartley law. Will the members of the Democratic Party in Congress, most of whom voted for the Taft-Hartley law, reverse themselves in order to honor the platform? Mr. Truman's potential labor supporters have a right to know.

The special session puts both parties on the spot and it's a good thing—good for the voters, healthy for the country, and it will make for a more vital, realistic, and intelligent election.

SPECIAL SESSION PUTS VOTERS IN THE SADDLE

(By Roscoe Drummond, chief, Washington bureau, the Christian Science Monitor)

WASHINGTON.—It is by no means certain, it is certainly not inevitable, that President Truman is going to pick up the marbles at the end of the precampaign special session of Congress.

The President has gained an opening advantage by seizing the initiative.

But what will really count is not who has taken the initiative but who uses the initiative better after it has been taken.

In other words, it is entirely within the grasp of the Republicans to take the special session into its own hands, use it constructively regardless of why Mr. Truman called it, and go to the country with a solid record of promises turned into performance.

There is some evidence already that the cooler heads in the Republican Party have this in mind. Governor Dewey is aware that just screaming "politics" is no effective answer to politics, and the fact that the Republican Presidential nominee is calmly silent suggests that he is looking for ways by which the GOP Congress can meet the President's challenge other than by epithets.

Thus far three arguments have been advanced against the special session of Congress. They deserve to be looked at.

One is that the domestic controversies which will be generated will endanger the bipartisan support of foreign policy and that the handling of the Berlin blockade crisis may be rendered more difficult. The fact is that no issue of foreign policy is raised by the special session; and if the bipartisan foundation of foreign policy will not stand the heat of the special session, it will not stand the heat of the campaign. The sooner we know it the better.

A second argument is that somehow Mr. Truman ought to recognize that he is going to be retired from the White House and begin acting accordingly. This would mean that he should accept the quiet role of caretaker of the Government until next January and conduct only a polite and diffident campaign with no more than a dash of partisan strife. Well, that's pretty unrealistic. Mr. Truman believes honestly that his policies are nearer right than his opposition; he is persuaded that he can prove it to the voters that he is nearer right; he sees no reason he should accept defeat as a foregone conclusion. Presidential campaigns are partisan in their nature and they never are fought without partisan strife; 1948 is no exception.

Finally, the view is held in some places—first expressed, I believe, by Representative CLARENCE BROWN, Republican, of Ohio—that Congress "is not under any particular obligation" to carry out the 1948 platforms. Mr. BROWN'S contention is that neither party has any responsibility to its national platform until the election has decided which party will control the Government; that only after the winning party has a new mandate from the people should it begin to put its promises into reality.

Now that, if I may put it mildly, is bland and guileful deception. That is the statement of a politician busy at his work. It is impure "bunk," containing just enough adulterated truth to get by the laws of nonsense.

Mr. Brown has the gall to say—you will note that Governor Dewey, Governor Warren, Senator Vandenberg, and other responsible Republican leaders are not joining in any such whim-wham—that neither party should be expected to honor its platform commitments until it wins the election.

What does this mean? It means that here is a politician who wants to defend both parties against having to do anything to alienate a vote until all the voting is over. It means that neither party should ever have to go before the voters on performance, only on promises.

The fact is that President Truman, as the Democratic leader, and Governor Dewey, as the Republican leader, have announced their unqualified acceptance of the pledges in their respective platforms. If party government means anything, it means that the Republican Party and the Democratic Party, through the voices of their conventions, have accepted the pledges of their respective platforms. The Democratic and Republican Members of Congress are the instruments of their parties, and they are as honor-bound by their platforms now as they are after November.

The special session doesn't put Mr. Truman in the saddle—it doesn't put Governor Dewey in the saddle. It puts the voters in the saddle. Here is one Presidential campaign in which the voters can see that Congress redeems its promises or is dealt with accordingly.

Russia—Don't Be Too Optimistic

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRY D. LARCADE, JR.

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 2, 1948

Mr. LARCADE. Mr. Speaker, under authority to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include newspaper articles, I am submitting views of several newspapers and columnists, all of which, it is my opinion, will be of interest at this time. The articles follow:

[From the Washington Sunday Star of August 1, 1948]

UNITED STATES OUTPOSTS ARE SMALL BUT POTENT—OBSERVERS FEEL THAT OUR ACTUAL AND POTENTIAL POWER, RATHER THAN THE SIZE OF OUR UNITS ABROAD, IS RESPONSIBLE FOR CHECKING LARGE-SCALE AGGRESSION BY RUSSIA

(By Robert N. Cool)

Though President Truman recently declared that the chances for world peace are excellent, the armed forces of the United States stand guard throughout the world.

Compared with the mighty deployments of wartime, their present strength is not impressive, but many observers believe that it is the actual and potential power of the United States—represented abroad by comparatively small military units and skeleton facilities—which prevents large-scale aggression.

The Soviet Union, regarded as the only possible antagonist in a major war, frequently has complained about the armed "imperialism" of the United States. American troops, ships, airfields, and military equipment are to be found facing Russian expansion on evrey hand. The Chinese Government, warring with scant success against Chinese Communist armies, is powered by United States supplies. Far across the map, European nations within the sphere of the European recovery plan are waiting to find out whether they too are to be armed by America. Greece and Turkey already have been so equipped.

SKIRMISH LINES OF "COLD WAR"

In the Middle East, Britain arms the Arab world.

These weapons in the hands of possible allies represent the skirmish lines of the "cold war." It long has been accepted in the relationships between nations that supplying weapons does not constitute a breach of peace when there isn't a war on. Such weapons are considered to be for defense.

Behind them stand the warships, planes, guns, and soldiery of the potentially hostile powers.

In the present situation the Soviet Union is operating on interior lines. Its "allies," except for the more nebulous forces of international communism, are grouped on her immediate frontiers.

The United States, however, like England in the nineteenth century, is geographically isolated and possessed of the biggest navy. It has wide-ranging interests, plenty of money.

Its outposts are spread all over the world. Should war come, United States strategy would be to keep the fighting overseas while striking at the enemy from bases on his doorstep.

The map above shows where the United States has airfields, bases, troops, and ships. Many of these installations and forces represent obligations left over from the last war. American personnel in Germany and Japan, for instance, are engaged in occupation duties. A large United States airfield at Mellaha, Tripoli, recently was reactivated. It is used as a war station on air-supply routes between the United States and Germany and Saudi Arabia.

In any war, of course, other bases built during World War II would again be used by the United States. Brazil, where Americans built bases in the last war, is closely linked in hemisphere defense agreements. The status of wartime bases in Greenland and Iceland has been the subject of negotiation. Should war ever come they would almost certainly be used again.

SOMETHING THE MAP DOESN'T SHOW

When a group of United States B-29 Super Fortresses arrived in Britain on a visit during the height of the Berlin crisis the world saw how quickly the map of strategic force can be changed in an air age.

Most authorities attribute America's dominant world military position to something which is not shown on this map. That is the possession of the atomic bomb.

It was almost exactly 3 years ago that the first experimental atomic blast went off, under conditions of the greatest secrecy, a few miles west of Carrizoso, N. Mex. Soon the second and third atomic bombs shriveled Japanese resistance and astonished the entire world.

Though the nations have not found a way to control the atomic threat to civilization, they recognize its grim significance. Some believe that the awfulness of atomic war is going to help preserve peace.

Currently the United States alone is equipped to wage such a war, but last winter President Truman's Air Policy Commission warned that the United States could not assume immunity from a possible atomic attack on this country after January 1, 1953.

[From the Washington Daily News of June 19, 1948]

REDS ON MARCH AGAIN THIS SUMMER

While politicians fiddle—

Look for all-out, world-wide Red political offensive this summer, accompanied by violence.

Intelligence reports indicate that central, western, and southeastern Europe, the Middle and Far East, Indochina, Indonesia, Malaya, China, Burma, and Latin America all will be targets.

Red timetable is being speeded to take advantage of American confusion in election year, to paralyze world recovery efforts before they get well under way.

United States is committed deeply in each of these areas. Moscow figures by causing anarchy abroad, economic collapse here could be guaranteed. And that would be signal for Communist drive against us.

Inside reports to United States Government reveal steady Communist progress in China. Same is true of Indochina, nominally French, and Netherlands East Indies, nominally Dutch.

London reports Communist drive in Malaya to force British out; credits recent political murders to this source.

In Latin America, British secret service and our FBI work together against Red network. In Colombia, several British secret service men have been murdered. Investigators say one Communist aim there is control of Colombian oil.

Economically, war hit South America almost as hard as Europe or Asia. With widespread poverty, and hunger in some places, it's fertile ground for seeds of trouble.

It all adds up to backstage talk among high Government officials here and in London and Paris that this summer is almost certain to bring worst war scare since VE-day.

And that explains why Congressmen have bad case of jitters about their votes on draft bill.

[From the Washington Sunday Star of August 1, 1948]

ATLANTIC COAST OF EUROPE IS KREMLIN'S GOAL OF YEAR—SOVIET BELIEVES UNITED STATES WILL NOT PROVOKE WAR AND SHE MAY SUCCEED WHERE HITLER FAILED ON THE "RIMLAND"

(By Constantine Brown)

Some ranking military men in Washington, who have followed Soviet policies since Moscow was given the green light in 1943 to take over eastern Europe and the Balkans, have come to the conclusion that the Kremlin is determined—regardless of the price—to achieve control over Europe as far as the Atlantic.

Furthermore they believe that Russia intends, after destroying the regime of Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek, to establish Red supremacy over China, India, Siam, Indochina, and Indonesia.

The Kremlin hopes to carry out its plans without war, but is prepared and willing to unleash a conflict if we attempt to interfere. Moscow feels confident that it will succeed where Hitler failed. The Western Powers were capable of determined resistance to Nazi Germany in World War II, but this strength has been destroyed as far as Europe is concerned, the Soviet planners believe, while the United States will not, single-handed, challenge the vast power of the U. S. S. R. and her satellites.

As an indication of our timidity, according to those who maintain some contacts with the countries behind the iron curtain, the Kremlin points out that the United States, after having shown its willingness to spend billions for Europe's recovery, balked when the western European nations asked that military equipment be made available to aid their self-defense.

LESSON FROM HITLER

The German geopoliticians, who, headed by the late Professor Haushofer, advised Hitler before he embarked on his fatal adventure, expounded the doctrine of the "heartland" of Europe and Asia which must be in the hands of any power which seeks to dominate the world. It was in accordance with this doctrine that the Germans tried to conquer the heart of Europe before they attempted to win the shore lines of the continent.

Soviet geopoliticians, who realize that today most of Europe's heartland is in Moscow's hands, go a step further. Taking a lesson from Hitler's sad experience, they believe that the heartland is useless unless the "rimland" of the continent is in their hands.

This makes it imperative for the U. S. S. R. to be in physical possession of the Atlantic coast from Norway to Spain, and, if possible, to Gibraltar. If such an operation can be carried out without a shooting war, so much the better. If there is physical resistance, however, it must be crushed. The present western governments must be liquidated and replaced by faithful stooges of the Kremlin.

EXPLAINS BERLIN ATTITUDE

This program explains the Soviet attitude in Berlin and its insistence on creating a centralized Germany after the allies have evacuated German territory. America at the present time is the only power in the world capable of challenging the grandiose Russian plans. Hence, America either must be placed in a position where it cannot interfere with the Kremlin's plans or be persuaded to give up all interest in Europe and Asia.

It must be remembered that until Prime Minister Stalin was "bribed" to participate in the United Nations, by important concessions in China and new territorial acquisitions from Japan, he advocated the division of the world into three zones: (1) Eastern and central Europe and a portion of the Middle East to be the responsibility of the U. S. S. R.; (2) western Europe and a portion of Africa, together with the Indian Ocean area of Asia, for which Britain should be responsible; and (3) the Western Hemisphere, including the Philippine Islands, which would be the exclusive interest of the United States.

Prime Minister Stalin was following the old power politics pattern which eventually would lead to more major wars, for one of the great powers could be expected to infringe on the bailiwick of one of the others.

If today the United States can be persuaded to give up all interest in Europe and the Far East, Russia soon will be in a position to control both the Atlantic and Pacific shores of the Continent of Europe and Asia and will not have to consider what America may do in the future.

BOMB EFFECT NEGLIGIBLE

Moscow's determination to reach the Atlantic this year is considered to be the only certain thing in the present confused European picture.

Many diplomatic and military observers in Washington contend that Russia is reluctant to unleash another war because she is not fully prepared yet. Furthermore, it is said, she does not yet possess the atomic bomb. This destructive instrument, which is still an American monopoly, unquestionably would be important in an offensive war. But the knowledge of this monopoly is producing the same effect on the American people as the Maginot line produced on the French between the two world wars.

The atomic bomb is a powerful weapon in our hands, if we decide to use it to stymie Russia's present obvious plans. But it will become of questionable importance if Russia is permitted to establish herself along the Atlantic and Pacific and begins to produce her own atomic bomb.

The belief that Russia is not fully prepared to wage war at this time is pure wishful thinking. It is true that the Soviet armies are not prepared to fight such a powerful army as we had in Europe between 1944 and 1945. If the powerful American divisions which broke the back of the Nazi armies and the powerful air groups which smashed Germany existed today between the Rhine and the Channel instead of the present weak skeleton formations, there is no doubt that the Russians would not have a chance against us, no matter how many divisions they had.

FORCES ARE WEAK

But our fighting strength in Europe right now is less than three divisions. Our Air Force is nowhere near what it was on VE-day. The French and British forces are lamentably weak and dispirited. There is more national unity in those countries today than there was a year or two ago, but still Communist agents have succeeded in creating a state of mind which does not lend itself to long-range resistance.

The French have manpower enough to organize immediately 45 divisions, but they must rely on American factories to provide them with the necessary equipment. We cannot provide them with it. We are figuring on increasing our own national forces by eight new divisions. This will require at least 18 months under present conditions. How can we assume the responsibility for providing war material for 45 new French divisions?

While it should be admitted that the Red armies are not equal qualitatively to the forces of the West as they existed on VE-day, there is no military force now in existence which is able to stand before the masses the U. S. S. R. can throw into a campaign at a moment's notice.

The sheet weight of Russia's more than 250 divisions would annihilate the weak forces which exist in western Europe. This explains why the French Government is swallowing its pride and urging the American and British Governments to negotiate—and appease Russia if necessary—rather than provoke a Soviet attack.

PROPITIOUS MOMENT

The Kremlin is fully aware of conditions in the West—much more so than we are about conditions behind the Iron Curtain. The Kremlin also is aware that in addition to our unpreparedness for a major war, a bitter electoral campaign will be waged in America during the next 3 months. The members of the Politburo assume that no political leader will be popular and get the vote if he advocates involvement of the United States in another war.

No moment has been more propitious for the Kremlin to put into effect its policies of reaching Europe's and Asia's "rimland"—as protection for the heartland—than the next few months. The Soviet leaders have made their calculations and believe that while there is slight danger of provoking the American people to another bitter fight, the chances that this will not happen are very great, indeed.

"SIT TIGHT" POLICY

Their present policy is to sit tight and let Washington exhaust itself with diplomatic gestures and notes. After a while, our diplomatic observers believe, when this Government is faced with the alternative of a shooting war or a withdrawal from Europe, the Kremlin is confident that we will withdraw.

Meanwhile, the Russians are holding tight to their policy of squeezing us out of Berlin—which is regarded by those in that city as another potential Bataan. The air lift which we are using to bring supplies into that beleagured city is spectacular and impressive. But like many spectacular displays of strength, it cannot go on indefinitely. The days of heavy fogs and frequent bad weather are approaching and our planes will be grounded for considerable periods. Then what? the Russians ask.

The German people are watching our efforts with admiration, for American planes are performing a remarkable feat. But the question in their minds is whether there is enough strength in America to challenge the Russians when they decide to start their march to the channel. They doubt it.

The Berlin affair, which has set the international pot boiling, is a premeditated incident on the part of the Russians. We have to make a choice in the near future whether to abandon the city—which means that we would have to leave all of Germany before the year is up—or to accept the Russian challenge and assert our rights to remain there.

The Russians feel confident that in either case they will succeed in reaching the Atlantic by the end of the year, and secure the "rimland" which they believe will help establish Asiatic domination over the world.

[From the New York Times, August 3, 1948]

LIGHT ON RUSSIAN AIMS

At the moment when the envoys of the United States, Britain, and France were being admitted to the presence of Premier Stalin to submit their proposals for ending the Berlin crisis and settling the problems of Germany and of Europe, the Russian delegation at the Belgrade Conference published its draft for a new Danube pact, which is highly revealing of Russian purposes and policies. This draft pays lip service to the principle of free and open navigation of Europe's central waterway, as provided in the Balkan peace treaties; but it also proposes to vest control over such navigation in a commission consisting solely of representatives of the Danube states, which means control by Russia and its satellite governments. How Russia employs such controls for its own ends is amply demonstrated by the Russian blockade of the German capital.

What the Russian proposal amounts to, therefore, is that a conference called to establish a new international administration of the Danube, such as has been maintained for many decades, is in effect being called upon to abrogate such an administration and to convert the Danube into a private Russian river. The Western Powers, who took the initiative in calling a conference packed by Russia with its puppets, are being asked either to submit to the Russian demands and bar themselves from any part in carrying out an important provision of the peace treaties they have signed or face being shown the exit door.

Such a development can scarcely be called a triumph for western diplomacy. But it also demonstrates several other things which it will be well to keep in mind. The first is that Russia is still pursuing power politics for its own self-aggrandizement. The second is that it is following in Hitler's footsteps and is trying to expel from central and eastern Europe what the Nazis used to call area-alien elements, such as the Western Powers, in order to establish its own unchallengeable domination. And the third is that where Russia finds itself in the majority, the minority is accorded not only no veto rights but no rights at all, which provides a preview of what would happen in the United Nations if Russia should ever succeed in dominating a majority in it.

Beyond that, if Russia should succeed in applying the principle of its proposed pact to the Danube it can be expected to press with increased vigor for the application of the same principle to an even more important waterway—the Dardanelles. Having been refused control of the straits by Hitler under the Nazi-Soviet pact, it returned to the same demands after Hitler's defeat. After winning western consent to a revision of the international regime established by the Montreux convention, it demanded in a note to Turkey dated August 7, 1946, that control over the straits should be vested solely in Turkey and the Black Sea powers to the exclusion of the west, which would put real control in Russian hands, and that this control should be backed by a joint defense giving Russia military bases on the straits. This, of course, would make Turkey another Russian puppet. The Truman doctrine put up a bar against such a development, but a victory of the Russian principle at Belgrade would go far in strengthening Russia's case in any future conference on the Dardanelles.

Spare Us From OPA

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HUBERT S. ELLIS

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include an editorial from the New York Daily Mirror of July 27, 1948. The editorial follows:

SPARE US FROM OPA

President Truman is scheduled to continue picking his political quarrel with Congress today and it is widely believed he will ask for inflation controls, including the establishment of another OPA.

Heaven knows, prices are high enough—because Mr. Truman forced them there.

But deliver us, we cry, from another OPA reign of terror, with its accompaniment of empty shelves in the stores and its legion of fat-bellied "blacketeers" taking the trade and the profits away from legitimate business.

Mr. Truman—with a great deal of Republican aid, it must be admitted—set out to save the world with the Marshall plan.

So, while Americans desperately need houses, autos, heavy goods of all kinds, food and clothing at fair prices—$7,000,000,000 worth of our national energy and wealth is being channeled off to Europe and elsewhere.

And it is blandly assumed that we can provide these goods without any shock to our economy; that they can have our cake and we can eat it, too.

Probably we will never get over being national suckers.

We even expected gratitude from Europe for our help, and we have just been given a sample of that lovely quality by the once great Republic of France.

France is a main beneficiary of the Marshall plan.

And the principal purpose of the Marshall plan, as it was sold to the American people, was to combat the spread of communism by helping western Europe to become strong.

But when French Premier Schuman tried to put through a modest billion-dollar budget for France's military defense, he was voted down and his government fell.

Communist and other elements of the radical left were in part responsible. Also to blame, we think, was the feeling that is natural and general over Europe, a sentiment than can be described as "What the hell, let Uncle Sam do it."

We are going to have to pay—and that means every individual United States citizen—for the world paternalism of the New Deal.

The reckoning cannot be avoided by artificial regulations which would, by their employment of myriads more bureaucrats, only intensify the burden.

Federal spending, past and present, beyond the means of the country to underwrite that spending, is the primary cause of inflation. Until that cause is removed by rigid governmental economy, no palliative OPA pill can undo the evil.

The Congress should hammer home these truths to the people over and over. We are paying the price of folly. Our only real relief can come by cutting out the foolishness.

President Truman's Message Presents a Test of Republican Leadership

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN D. DINGELL
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 27, 1948

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of July 27, 1948:

A FORTHRIGHT MESSAGE

Mr. Truman's message to Congress, for the most part, is strong and directly to the point. It contains no surprises. The President merely reiterates a program of legislation which he has often urged upon the Eightieth Congress. If the message were read in a vacuum, without knowledge of the events of the last month, it would be difficult to detect political motivation. Of course, the message has political motivation, but it also coincides with the national welfare.

The major part of the address deals with the two most pressing domestic problems—inflation and housing. Mr. Truman sketches, in succinct phrases, what high prices are doing to the family budget, and how they continue to rise month after month. Increased prices for food, clothing, and fuel are accompanied by rises in industrial prices, such as the recent increase in steel. Correctly, the President warns that a major depression here would prevent the recovery throughout the world basic to lasting peace.

Last November, Mr. Truman asked Congress to pass a 10-point anti-inflation program. He now presents a revised and strengthened 8-point program. He would re-enact the excess-profits tax (thus correcting one of his own mistakes); restore consumer credit controls; harness bank credit; regulate speculation in commodities; allocate scarce commodities; strengthen rent controls; set up stand-by rationing and price control on products in short supply, and provide limited control over wages.

The weakness in this otherwise good program is the gingerly way the President deals with wages. He made a bad error just after the war ended in removing controls from wages. He expounded the Alice-in-Wonderland theory that wages could rise without necessarily causing price rises. Apparently he is still living partly in that dreamland. He says the Government should have authority to limit wage adjustments which would force a break in the price ceiling. It would take Merlin the magician and a million accountants to determine just when the Government should step in under that formula. This is especially true since the President adds the clause—"except where wage adjustments are essential to remedy hardships, to correct inequities, or to prevent an actual lowering of living standards."

The President makes the good point about inflationary measures that, if they are not passed by the special session, it may take the Eighty-first Congress many months to prepare legislation, hold hearings, and pass a program and the country cannot wait that long. He makes the same point about a housing law, which he said might be delayed a full year if held over for the next Congress. In housing, Mr. Truman asks for the passage of the Taft-Ellender-Wagner bill, which has already passed the Senate but which has been bottled up in the House at the urging of the real-estate lobby. There is good reason to believe that if the bill should get to the House floor, it would receive sufficient Republican votes for passage.

In addition to inflation and housing, the President renews his plea for aid to education, increasing the minmum wage from 40 to 75 cents, increasing and extending social-security benefits, a more generous and less bigoted displaced-persons law, etc. He calls attention to the shortage of power, and asks for appropriations for the Johnsonville, Tenn., steam plant and other projects. The highly controversial civil-rights program he mentions last among matters to be acted upon in the special session.

Now comes the test of Republican leadership. It can spurn the President's recommendations and call them, if it will, an attempt at political blackmail. That would be the petty attitude and for them a dangerous one. The public is not going to be deceived by such a tactic and it would cost the GOP prestige and votes. Or the Republican leadership can regard the President's address as a challenge and as an opportunity. It can pass a sheaf of legislation to meet the Nation's immediate problems and thus heighten its already bright chances for victory in November.

The Administrative Practitioners Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. GWYNNE
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. GWYNNE of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced a bill to protect the public with respect to practitioners before administrative agencies. The present bill is a revision of H. R. 2657, introduced on March 20, 1947.

Extensive hearings were held on H. R. 2657 by Subcommittee No. 2 of the House Judiciary Committee. At those hearings many representatives of interested groups throughout the country appeared and gave the committee the benefit of their views. A brief statement of the history and purpose of the bill, together with an explanation of its provisions, is as follows:

HISTORY, STRUCTURE, AND PURPOSE OF THE BILL

For many years legislation has been proposed in one or both Houses of the Congress respecting admissions to practice before administrative agencies. More than 20 bills have been introduced in recent years.[1] When the administrative procedure bill (now the Administrative Procedure Act) was before the House in 1946 there were demands that it contain provisions on this general problem. But the subject was then deemed too large and important for fragmentary treatment as a mere part of the Administrative Procedure Act. Experience during the present Congress, with H. R. 2657, has demonstrated the wisdom of leaving the matter for separate consideration and more comprehensive provision.

From the earliest times, those who represent other people in the courts and before Government bodies have been subjected to regulation. A lawyer is simply a person who has complied with traditional requirements for a license to practice law. In this country the Government of the United States and its agencies leave the granting of these permits, at least in the first instance, to the courts of the several States, Territories, dependencies, possessions, and District of Columbia. But, at the same time, there has been a gradual growth of a system in the Federal executive branch for the administrative admission to practice, and the administrative control, of both lawyers and nonlawyers. This has come about because, in the creation of new governmental agencies to exercise new powers of regulation in new fields, there has been a natural development of specialized callings as in the realm of rates and accounting. These new specialists, who operate exclusively before administrative bodies, have been necessarily subjected to some control in the matter of their practice there.[2]

This dual system of control—one by the courts and the other by some Federal administrative agencies—has produced a number of perennial problems. (See the elaborate study entitled "Admissions to and Control Over Practice Before Federal Administrative Agencies," report of the committee on administrative practice, Bar Association of the District of Columbia, 1938.) Lawyers, although duly licensed and subject to discipline by the courts of both the Federal Government and the several States, have been unnecessarily required to obtain many special licenses from administrative agencies to do what the courts have already authorized them to do. (See the Final Report, Attorney General's Committee on Administrative Procedure (1941), S. Doc. No. 8, 77th Cong., p. 124.) In matters of discipline, lawyers have thus been subjected as well to the divided control of both the judicial and administrative arms of government. In addition, agencies often either license nonlawyer specialists or abandon all pretense of specialization by dealing with all representatives, regardless of their qualifications or standing.

Lawyers are also subjected to various professional and ethical requirements and disabilities, while nonlawyers are generally either not subject to them at all or are less stringently regulated. Regulations which the centuries have found advisable for the one should surely apply as well to others who undertake to perform similar functions. A nonlawyer who is disqualified from practice before one administrative agency is still left his specialized calling in its nonadministrative aspects or before other administrative agencies. But in the court of his admission to practice, a lawyer, subjected to the same type of discipline, normally loses his right to practice his profession anywhere and everywhere. Even more important, however, is the daily subjection of lawyers to extensively stated and judicially expounded canons of professional ethics for which there is no real or effective counterpart among nonlawyer specialists. This lack not only leaves the latter free to disregard accepted ideas of good professional conduct but, in the administrative field, tends to undermine the application of standards of conduct to any practitioner whether he be lawyer or nonlawyer.

If special training and licensing are necessary for practice by lawyers, it is reasonable to suppose that there are similar reasons for controlling practice by nonlawyers in the Federal Government. Modern government is so intricate that no man should be permitted to hold himself out as a professional unless he has met professional requirements. To say this is not to disparage the nonlawyer specialist but to place him upon a real professional footing. Moreover, the public is entitled to representation by persons not only of good moral character but equipped with the necessary technical skill and understanding of professional responsibilities. Practically all of the States have such legislation,[3] which their courts have executed and expounded "for the better security of the people against incompetency and dishonesty."[4] The Federal Government can afford nothing less for the due protection of the people of the whole United States in their dealings with national administrative agencies.

The present bill, after extensive hearings on H. R. 2657 of the present Congress, has been drawn with a view to setting up a system for administrative practitioners which shall be adequate to the needs of today but, at the same time, utilize past experience and preserve the necessary authority of individual administrative agencies. Section 1 contains only the short title. It is followed by seven operative sections. Section 2 contains definitions. Section 3 provides for a Credentials Committee. Section 4 deals with the regulation of practice. Section 5 simplifies the admission of lawyers to Federal administrative practice. Section 6 provides for the issuance of credentials to nonlawyers. Section 7 relates to disciplinary proceedings. Section 8 contains miscellaneous provisions necessary to effectuate the system proposed.

In short, the bill provides for the licensing and discipline of administrative practitioners. This requires a definition of "practice" (sec. 2) and a method for the admission of lawyers (sec. 5) and nonlawyers (sec. 6). Provision is made for the maintenance of standards of conduct of such licensed practitioners (sec. 4) and for the disciplinary proceedings (sec. 7). Nothing essentially new is proposed, since in each of these aspects of the subject there has been long experience. The bill simply seeks to shape a system which will operate in modern government with due provision for the functions of a great variety of recently created or expanded administrative agencies.

EXPLANATION OF PROVISIONS

In the following explanation there appears each section of the bill in quotation marks followed by a paragraph or more of analysis or explanation:

"SECTION 1. Title: This act may be cited as the 'Administrative Practitioners Act'."

The proposed statute is called a Practitioners Act because it relates to the licensing and regulation of practitioners before administrative agencies of the Federal Government. In these days when administrative agencies have taken over much of the work formerly left to the courts, it is timely that there be regulation of such practitioners before such agencies just as there has long been the licensing of lawyers by the courts. Individual agencies have heretofore attempted such regulation, some on an elaborate scale, but many agencies have paid little if any real attention to the matter. Moreover, diverse requirements by the different administrative agencies of the Government are confusing to both lawyers and nonlawyers and in most cases fail to constitute a satisfactory system for even one agency. The provisions and comments which follow explain how it is proposed that regulation of administrative practice be achieved and be given a measure of uniformity by this bill.

"SEC. 2. Definitions: Terms shall have the same meaning as in the Administrative Procedure Act (Public Law 404, 79th Cong.). 'Individual' means a natural person. 'Credentials' means certificates and other evidence of admission to practice issued pursuant to this act. 'Credentials Committee' means the agency established pursuant to section 3. 'Practice' means regularly appearing, participating, or offering to do so on behalf of others for a consideration in agency proceedings as the whole or part of a profession, calling, business, or trade. Nothing in this act shall prevent appearance or participation in an agency proceeding (1) as a witness, (2) for a limited or special purpose, (3) by an individual on his own behalf, (4) by a partner on behalf of the partnership, (5) by an officer or regular full-time employee of any State, local government, or agency thereof or of the United States on behalf of such government or agency, or (6) if permitted by rule of the agency in any proceeding not conducted pursuant to section 7 or 8 of the Administrative Procedure Act, by an officer or regular full-time employee of a corporation or other organization on its behalf."

The adoption of the definitions in the Administrative Procedure Act not only simplifies the bill but is significant for present purposes because those definitions limit the bill. Thus "agency proceeding," as defined in the Administrative Procedure Act and hence applicable where used in this bill, means only a regulatory proceeding and therefore does not include advisory functions, commercial-type transactions with agencies (such as some of the work of customhouse brokers), or mere applications or requests for information. Similarly an "agency" does not include the tax or customs courts or public authorities composed of representatives of parties.

The definition of "practice" is basic to the whole bill. "Regularly appearing, participating, or offering" eliminates occasional instances in which attorneys or others appear before administrative agencies as an incident to some other proper activity (see also the last sentence of sec. 5 below). "On behalf of others" eliminates the appearance of a person on his own behalf to give data or to express views if an agency will otherwise permit him to do so in a given proceeding. "For a consideration" exempts religious, fraternal, benevolent, philanthropic, charitable, veterans, and other organizations of a nonprofit nature in their legitimate fields of endeavor. "Agency proceeding," as explained in the previous paragraph, means only a regulatory proceeding. "As the whole or part of a profession, calling, business, or trade" again emphasizes that the regulated activities are those in which persons engage as a business or profession.

The final sentence of the section enumerates six situations in which the bill does not apply. But, of course, in any of them an agency, within the scope of its powers, may restrict these exemptions. The latter are also in many respects merely a specification of exemptions which would follow in any event from the general language of the definition of "practice" as set forth in the previous paragraph. (1) "As a witness" is self-explanatory. (2) "For a limited or special purpose' is designed to take care of those situations in which a person appears not as a formal party for all procedural purposes but merely to present data or views with the permission of the agency involved. Examples are the appearances of Boards of Trade or Chambers of Commerce to present, much in the fashion of a witness, the general positions they have taken as to a given matter. Farm cooperatives or labor unions may similarly appear to give evidence or state views. Where they are full parties, as in the case of proceedings brought against them by name they are normally represented by counsel. (3) An appearance "by an individual on his own behalf" would include those persons who in the contemplation of law stand in the stead of any individual. Thus an individual may be represented in an appropriate case by his parent, guardian, administrator, trustee, and so on. (4) The appearance of a partner on behalf of a partnership is traditional and arises out of the legal nature of partnerships. (5) The appearance of public officials for public purposes is an apparent necessity. (6) If not exempted by the provisions discussed above, corporate or organizational appearances through officers or employees are limited to proceedings in which sections 7 and 8 of the Administrative Procedure Act do not apply. The reasons for this limitation are that, in the first place, the proceeding is a so-called formal one in which there is a presiding officer and a record is being made much in the fashion of a court proceeding. Secondly, the record is that upon which judicial review may be had so that the proceeding is in effect a part of the court process. However, even then the limitation need not be taken as precluding corporate or organizational appearances by officers or employees because the latter may be admitted to such practice under section 5 of the bill and in certain circumstances under section 6 of the bill.

"SEC. 3. Credentials Committee: There shall be established and operative (as the President shall provide by executive order in conformity with this act) a Credentials Committee of five members who shall be designated by the Attorney General, serve without compensation, issue certificates of admission and renewals thereof, and perform other functions required by this act. Three shall be a quorum. Four shall be designated from among officers then serving in the executive branch by and with the consent of the Senate. One shall be an attorney engaged in the private practice of law representative of the legal profession. Not less than three shall hold or be eligible for credentials under section 5. For the purposes of this act the Credentials Committee shall appoint a Secretary, have such staff, other assistance, or advisory services or committees as may be required, incur obligations, make rules, issue individual notices by mail requiring the renewal of credentials from time to time, fix compensatory admission and renewal fees, and require the submission of necessary information from any person or agency. Receipts shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States as a trust fund to be drawn upon for the purposes of this act as the Credentials Committee may direct; and there is hereby appropriated to such fund for such purposes for the fiscal year in which this act is approved, and for each fiscal year thereafter, the unexpended balance in such fund at any time."

This section contemplates that a central Credentials Committee shall be created as is often done in the States respecting admissions to the bar. In each of the several States there is a centralized court system headed by a supreme court. But in the Federal administrative system there is no central or top administrative agency to perform the same function. For that reason it is necessary to create one by this bill for purposes of admissions to practice. However, since its functions will soon become routine, it is to be an uncompensated and ex-officio body as is customary in State practice. It is important that they shall be high officials in the executive branch. It is also important that the legal profession be represented as is done in the States. Within these limitations as expressed in section 3 of the bill, it is proper that the detail of the set-up be provided by executive order and thereby remain flexible. The Credentials Committee thus may also be placed in some appropriate department (such as the Department of Justice) for so-called housekeeping purposes.

In order to limit admissions of practice to those who seriously desire to pursue such a calling, and in order to make the system self-supporting as is often done in such cases, fees should be fixed by the Credentials Committee from time to time on a compensatory basis and be made available to defray expenses. Since applicants for such admissions will run into many thousands, such fees will, however, be modest if not merely nominal. Moreover, in order to prevent the roll of practitioners from becoming out of date and thus causing difficulty in administering the system proposed, it is necessary that the credentials committee have authority to require renewals by mail as occasion may require. The authority to "require the submission of necessary information from any person or agency" does not amount to the subpena power but means merely that (1) Federal agencies shall submit relevant data on request and (2) applicants for admission to practice must produce necessary information or run the risk of being denied the credentials they seek.

"SEC. 4. Unauthorized practice prohibited: No person shall practice, hold himself out as a practitioner, or in any other manner assume so to practice before any agency without credentials or except as authorized under this act. No agency action, no credentials, and nothing in this act shall be deemed to permit any person to practice law in any place or render service save practice as defined in and limited by this act; and no person shall hold himself out, impliedly or expressly, as otherwise authorized hereunder. No person shall in any manner or form engage in the solicitation or procurement of employment (involving practice) for another holding credentials hereunder nor shall holders of credentials participate therein. Practice as attorneys subject to section 5 shall be governed by the canons of professional ethics generally applicable to members of the bar of courts. Agents admitted to practice pursuant to section 6 shall be subject to the same requirements (including limitations on solicitation, advertising, and division of fees) adapted and promulgated in the form of rules by the Credentials Committee. Individuals admitted to practice under section 5 or 6 shall honor, and presiding and deciding officers in any agency proceeding shall conduct themselves in accordance with, the canons of judicial ethics generally applicable to members of the judiciary."

The first sentence of section 4, when coupled with the definitions in section 2 above, is the enforcement clause for the whole bill. The second sentence is simply a declaration of the obvious fact that an admission to Federal administrative practice is no more than that, and authorizes no person to claim the privilege of practice elsewhere. The third sentence, prohibiting solicitation through a third party, would not, of course, preclude anyone from recommending, or referring business to, a practitioner upon request and without compensation. The adoption or adaptation of standards of conduct by the last three sentences of the section are necessary because, at least from a technical point of view, the recognized canons of professional and judicial ethics are inapplicable to administrative practice both because it is administrative and because many practitioners are not lawyers. In the absence of such provision, very few administrative agencies have attempted to state standards of conduct and the enforcement of those so stated has been desultory. A large part of the difficulty has been the simple lack of statutory authority for agencies to have and enforce such standards. The bill seeks to remedy this lack.

"SEC. 5. Credentials of attorneys: Any individual shall be given credentials as an attorney by the Credentials Committee upon (1) the production of evidence that he is a member in good standing of the bar of the highest court of any State, Territory, possession, or the District of Columbia and (2) his written statement that he is engaged in the practice of law in such jurisdiction or, if that is not the case, submittal of reasonable and satisfactory evidence of character and fitness. Possession of credentials under this section shall entitle the holder to practice before any agency except that any agency which pursuant to statute has for more than 7 years prior to the adoption of this act required attorneys to demonstrate additional special technical competence may continue to do so under reasonable rules and no credentials authorizing practice before such agency shall be issued until such agency shall have certified to the Credentials Committee that the applicant has met such requirements. Any agency may provide that an attorney without credentials may act for or represent another solely in connection with a particular agency proceeding."

Under the existing system of administrative practice, lawyers who are already admitted to practice before the highest courts of the land must secure admission to numerous administrative agencies as well. Such repetitious admission requirements for lawyers as such are unreasonable, unnecessary, and provocative of much complaint. However, granted that some form of control is needed for the protection of the public and the administrative agencies, section 5 of the bill provides for one centralized admission. The first sentence of the section restates the general practice in State and Federal courts as well as in some administrative agencies. In determining character and fitness the Credentials Committee may utilize methods well understood by the bar. The exception in the second sentence is designed to preserve the Patent Office system whereby, unlike other agencies with admission requirements, competence and experience beyond that of a member of the bar in good standing has long been required, is expressly authorized by existing law (35 U. S. C. 11), and is generally accepted by the bar. The last sentence provides, as is common in the courts, for admission to practice for the purpose of a particular or occasional case where there is ground for so doing and no evasion of the requirements is apparent.

"SEC. 6. Credentials for agents: So long as and to the extent that any agency shall find it necessary in the public interest and in the interest of parties to agency proceedings before it to authorize practice by individuals not subject to section 5 and provides by generally applicable rule therefor, any such individual may be admitted hereunder to practice as an agent before such agency. The Credentials Committee shall issue credentials to applicants under this section if, after such examination or investigation as may be necessary for the purpose, (1) such agency shall determine and certify that the applicant possesses necessary competence as well as understanding of ethical responsibilities and (2) the Credentials Committee shall be satisfied that the applicant is of good moral character and repute. The Credentials Committee shall also issue credentials to individuals who present a certificate from any agency that, prior to the effective date of this section, they have been authorized to practice before such agency and are in good standing there. Under this section no individual shall be admitted to practice in proceedings to which sections 7 and 8 of the Administrative Procedure Act apply or in which the governing statute provides only for appearances in person or by attorney or counsel except that, in either case, any agency may certify such individuals for such practice before it where it has done so by rule requiring investigation and examination of applicants for more than 7 years prior to the adoption of this act."

As is presently the case, the bill leaves the admission of nonlawyers largely to the individual agencies concerned. Since nonlawyers may not have had specialized training and may not have been otherwise licensed for professional duties, the second sentence of the section requires an agency to determine in the first instance whether, in its informed judgment and after such examination or investigation as may be necessary, the applicant possesses such scientific training, experience, special competence, peculiar technical ability, knowledge of legal requirements, understanding of ethical responsibilities, and other qualifications as may be requisite to the adequate performance of the duties of a practitioner for the protection of clients and the attainment or preservation of their rights. An applicant would be licensed only to the extent of practice so certified by the agency concerned to the Credentials Committee.

Determination of good moral character and repute would be undertaken in the same general fashion as in the case of the admission of lawyers under section 5 above. Similarly it should be understood that qualifications with regard to character and professional responsibility will not be less than those required of lawyers admitted under section 5 of the bill.

Previously licensed nonlawyer practitioners will be entitled, by the third sentence of section 6, to new credentials under this bill enabling them to continue in their practice. However, once so given credentials, they will thereafter and in all other respects be subject to the responsibilities, disabilities, and requirements applicable to those receiving credentials for the first time under the bill.

The last sentence of the section imposes two limitations. The first is that, where statutes permit representation only by "attorney" or "counsel," nonlawyers are not given the right to practice under this bill. The second is that nonlawyers shall not, under this bill, be admitted to practice in formal proceedings subject to sections 7 and 8 of the Administrative Procedure Act (see the comment respecting this subject in section 2 above). However, in either case, if for 7 years or more (as in the case of the Interstate Commerce Commission) an agency has been examining and licensing nonlawyers for such practice, it may continue to do so under this bill. It is to be noted that this provision does not change the situation of accountants in tax matters before the Bureau of Internal Revenue because practice there is neither limited by statute to attorneys or counsel nor are the proceedings subject to sections 7 and 8 of the Administrative Procedure Act.

It may be observed that, although nonlawyers are to be admitted to administrative practices as set forth in the preceding paragraphs, such an admission does not extend beyond the admission privileges so granted. (See the discussion of the second sentence of section 4 above.) Moreover, there are obvious limitations in any event to what nonlawyers may do. The constitutional right to counsel means the right to have the advice of a lawyer, not a nonlawyer. Thus, where an administrative proceeding or investigation is one in which a person is compelled to give evidence which may be used against him in criminal proceedings, he is entitled to the advice of a lawyer rather than a nonlawyer. This bill does not purport to substitute nonlawyers for lawyers where the latter are required by constitutional or other law.

The bill does not preclude agencies from regulating nonlawyers over and beyond the minima stated in this bill. Thus, for example, the right of the Treasury Department to regulate customhouse brokers (19 U. S. C. 1641) will remain unimpaired. To the extent that they or other nonlawyers engage in practice as defined in section 2 of this bill, they must be licensed in accordance with the requirements and limitations of this bill. To the extent that in other respects or in a greater degree they or other nonlawyers may be licensed or otherwise regulated by administrative agencies, this bill does not disturb such administrative powers or functions.

"SEC. 7. Disciplinary proceedings: Every agency conducting proceedings subject to this act shall by rule provide that for good cause any person holding credentials shall (1) be censured, or (2) be suspended from practice in the particular case in which misconduct occurs or from all cases before it for a period not to exceed 90 days, or (3) be subjected to proceedings for the revocation of credentials as hereinafter provided in this section and with or without suspension from practice by the agency concerned pending the final determination thereof. Where cause therefor appears and unless the holder consents to an order of revocation and surrenders all his credentials, the agency shall (1) in the case of any individual holding credentials under section 6 issue an order revoking his credentials and (2) in the case of an individual holding credentials under section 5 either (a) refer the matter to appropriate and existing State or Federal judicial disciplinary authorities or (b) issue an order revoking his credentials if applicable statutes expressly provide both for such action by the agency and for judicial review thereof. Any agency order of censure, suspension, or revocation of credentials shall be entered only upon opportunity for hearing and upon the record thereof; and all such orders shall be subject to judicial review. Notice of all such proceedings shall be given the Credentials Committee, and, for the purposes of this section, it shall act in lieu of agencies in cases in which misconduct is unrelated to any agency proceeding and no interested agency undertakes to act in the case."

The first sentence of this section recognizes for the first time in statutory language that it is appropriate for administrative agencies to utilize a variety of disciplinary powers. The courts have long done so, whereas statutes relating to the administrative process have been barren or fragmentary on the subject. The second sentence recognizes the necessary difference in the exercise of the ultimate form of discipline in the case of the nonlawyer as compared with the lawyer. The former has not been admitted to practice by courts and hence is not subject to judicial discipline. The latter has been so admitted, there exists a ready forum for disciplinary proceedings, and any such action solely by an administrative agency is bound to have effect upon a lawyer's standing before the bar. Consequently, it is the design of this bill that the right to administrative practice shall, for appropriate cause, be revoked by administrative agencies in the case of nonlawyers and by judicial authorities in the case of lawyers except in the single case of the Patent Office, where by statute provision is made for both revocation by the administrative agency of a lawyer's right to practice and for judicial review thereof (35 U. S. C. 11). The bill would thus supersede the present authority of the Treasury Department (5 U. S. C. 261), the Veterans' Administration (38 U. S. C. 102), and the Interior Department (5 U. S. C. 493).

However, as stated above, agencies would be given the express authority to censure, to suspend for a limited period, to wholly revoke credentials or institute proceedings therefor, and in the latter case to suspend pending the final determination thereof. For the first time an administrative agency would be authorized by statute to refer cases to the appropriate State or Federal judicial disciplinary authorities. In the case of either a nonlawyer or a lawyer any absolute order of censure, suspension, or revocation by an administrative agency must be entered after an opportunity for a hearing and upon the record thereof (thereby becoming subject to section 5 of the Administrative Procedure Act) and will be subject to judicial review (pursuant to sec. 10 of the Administrative Procedure Act). Of course, a mere reference of a case by an administrative agency to judicial authorities, without suspension of the right to practice meanwhile, would not require a hearing or be subject to such judicial review. For the exercise of these disciplinary powers it is provided that the Credentials Committee shall act in cases in which misconduct is unrelated to any agency proceeding and no interested agency undertakes to act in the case.

"SEC. 8. Operation and effect: Any person willfully violating any provision of this act or rule lawfully issued hereunder, or knowingly submitting any false information required pursuant hereto, shall be fined not more than $5,000, or imprisoned for not more than 1 year, or both. No individual holding credentials under this act and serving by appointment as an officer, employee, or consultant in any agency or branch of the Government of the United States shall act or receive compensation during such public service or within 2 years thereafter as an attorney, agent, or employee of other interests with respect to (1) any matter in which the United States is interested and he renders or has rendered such public service or (2) any matter factually related thereto; but in all other matters such an individual so appointed on a temporary (not to exceed 2 years), intermittent, uncompensated, or part-time basis or for the purpose of particular litigation or agency proceedings may (if otherwise qualified and unless limited by rule or written instruction of the appointing agency) during or after such public service so act or receive compensation. All statutory provisions, rules, or applications thereof in conflict with this act are hereby repealed. No subsequent legislation shall be held to supersede or modify any provision or application of this act except to the extent that such legislation shall do so expressly. If any provision of this act or application thereof is held invalid, the remainder of this act or other applications of such provision shall not be affected. The requirements of this act respecting admissions to practice shall not take effect until 6 months after its approval."

The first sentence, fixing a penalty for violations, is self-explanatory. The same may be said of the last four sentences. The final sentence of the section defers the effective date of the admission requirements for 6 months after the approval of the bill, in order to afford time to place in operation the machinery provided in sections 3, 5, and 6 of the bill as set forth above.

The second sentence of the section deals with a subject respecting which there is now a multiplicity of conflicting and diverse statutory provisions. This provision seeks to write into law for the first time (so far as holders of credentials under this bill are concerned) the present canon of professional ethics that no practitioner shall engage in representing anyone in a matter (or matter factually related thereto) in which he is simultaneously concerned, or with which he previously dealt ("investigated or passed upon"), as a public servant (Canon No. 36, see also sec. 4 above) except that the disability is limited to 2 years following termination of his public service to accord with the 2-year limitation found among the statutory provisions cited below. Secondly, the provision frees the holder of credentials (be he lawyer or nonlawyer) to undertake private representation in other matters if he is or has been a public servant on only a temporary, intermittent, uncompensated, or part-time basis or for particular litigation or agency proceedings unless at the time of his public service the agency concerned has provided otherwise by rule or written instruction. In this respect Fifth United States Code, page 99, would be modified so far as it prevents a practitioner from serving his Government in a limited capacity upon pain of being prohibited from taking certain claims against the Government for a period of 2 years thereafter. The same would be true of section 19 (e) of the Contract Settlement Act of 1944 (41 U. S. C. 119) and of the more limited provisions of the World War Prohibition Act (5 U. S. C. 100). In the same circumstances Eighteenth United States Code, page 198, would be modified so far as it prevents a present limited-service practitioner from engaging in private practice involving claims. The provision would not affect the application of Eighteenth United States Code, page 203, to "a Senator, Member of, or Delegate to Congress, or a Resident Commissioner" but otherwise the provision would be modified so as not to prevent a practitioner from giving limited service to any branch of the Government without losing the right to practice before Government agencies in unrelated matters. The proposed provision would extend the principle of subsection (j) of the Renegotiation Act by extending the prohibition thereof beyond the term of a practitioner officer or employee (50 U. S. C. App. 1151). It carries forward substantially the same provision of section 27 of the Surplus Property Act of 1944 (50 U. S. C. App. 1636). These modifications are desirable in order to provide a uniform rule respecting holders of credentials under this bill. Such persons will be subjected to the licensing controls provided by the bill. They will be permitted to serve their Government on occasion without unnecessary disabilities. It will thus, for example, be possible for a private practitioner to serve on the Credentials Committee as provided in section 3 of the bill.

World Trade Position of the United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEONARD W. HALL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. LEONARD W. HALL. Mr. Speaker, there is included in the RECORD, in line with permission given me, a short editorial from the Grace Log, published by the Grace Line, in pointed comment on the facts of the export-import situation of the United States in terms of our general world trade. Emphasis is placed in the article on the need for properly allowing for the increased price level in seeking to gage our present relative world trade position in terms of what it was before the commencement of the European war. The editorial argues persuasively for the need of world trade expansion.

IT'S A POOR WORLD

The fact that exports of the United States in 1947 reached a total value of $15,330,000,000 is likely to give a false idea of the magnitude of that trade to the entire world. If this figure is deflated to the 1938 price level it would be only $8,030,000,000 as compared with the actual $3,090,000,000 of exports in 1938. This means that the volume of our exports in 1947 was 259 percent of the volume in 1938.

Although world trade figures must be regarded as highly approximate because of inadequacies of current data, the Office of International Trade of the Department of Commerce estimates that the $46,000,000,000 value of exports of all countries, that is, total world trade, would be valued at $23,000,000,000 compared with actual $21,900,000,000 in 1938.

In other words, the world as a whole in 1947 only just barely got its export volume above the prewar level.

As the United Kingdom only has slightly improved its prewar volume of exports, and the United States did approximately 2½ times as well, this means that the rest of the world, outside of the United States and United Kingdom, did only 75 percent as well in volume of exports as in 1938.

The foregoing indicates that it's a pretty lean and poor world—as a whole.

And it substantiates the statement we have made many times before, namely, unless total world trade is considerably expanded there just will not be enough prosperity to go around. Nobody will be happy. The ground will be fertile for the growth of things we do not like.

For this reason it is tragically necessary that every influence be activated that can contribute to sound growth and that trade stifling restrictions be progressively terminated. Trade will not flourish in a quagmire of controls, embargoes, quotas, limitations, and other palliatives.

Republican Congressmen Are Only Kidding Themselves by Ignoring High Prices and Housing Shortage

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN D. DINGELL

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Washington Daily News of July 30, 1948:

CONGRESSIONAL ELECTION, TOO

Republican Senators, in caucus, voted to consider only these recommendations in President Truman's message to the special session which could pass a three-point test:

1. The legislation must be emergency in character.

2. It must contain a problem of national importance.

3. It must be a program which can be processed properly within the time available to an emergency session.

Then the Republican Senators called up the anti-poll-tax bill as their first order of business—a measure which does not meet any one of the three requirements.

Emergency in character? The poll tax has been a political football since reconstruction days.

A problem of national importance? Only 7 of the 48 States have poll taxes.

A measure which can be processed properly within limited time? The Republicans—as well as every newspaper reader—knew in advance the southern Democrats had organized a filibuster against the bill which may endanger the whole special session program.

Now it's the Republicans who are playing politics and giving us double talk.

The President wants to saddle the Republican Congress with responsibility for high prices. In retaliation, the Republicans want to widen the breach between the President and the Dixiecrats, and are using the anti-poll-tax bill as the wedge.

Of course, the poll tax should be abolished. But the issue isn't raised in good faith in the present circumstance, and no one pretends that it is.

Inflation—the high cost of living—is the No. 1 issue at this special session, and everybody knows that, too.

Second only to that is the need for housing. The issue is very real to thousands without a decent place to live, whether Congress knows it or not.

So who is being fooled by these shenanigans? Not all of the people, you may be sure. Possibly only some of those in Congress who hope to be reelected, who are jumping into the hole Harry Truman dug for them.

The Displaced Persons Act of 1948 Should Be Amended

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KENNETH B. KEATING

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, it is my sincere hope that action will be taken at this special session to amend the Displaced Persons Act of 1948 recently enacted so as to change the cut-off date for determining eligibility from December 22, 1945, to April 21, 1947. To that end I have today introduced a bill which is a companion to one offered in the other body by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH] on behalf of himself and several of his colleagues, including the junior Senator from New York [Mr. IVES].

Other measures have been offered to make more extensive changes in the Displaced Persons Act. With many of these suggested amendments I am in thorough accord. Some of them, however, are highly controversial so that an effort to deal with them would entail extended consideration and lengthy debate. For that reason it is perhaps not feasible to consider them at this necessarily brief session.

Nevertheless, the issues presented by the change in date suggested in the single amendment envisioned in my bill are simple and the arguments for the change extremely convincing. April 21, 1947, is the date contained in the original House bill which we passed and which was changed in conference to conform in this respect to the Senate bill. Presumably, therefore, favorable action in the other body on S. 2902, to which I have referred, would be followed promptly by endorsement here.

The first reason for change is purely administrative. April 21, 1947, was the date selected by General Clay for the closing of the displaced-persons camps in Germany to further entry. A careful catalog of the names of and data concerning those who entered prior to that date has been prepared and turned over to the International Refugee Organization at the time that body was created. There are many thousands who fled from persecution and entered these camps between December 1945 and April 1947. By enactment of the Displaced Persons Act our country has assumed its share of the international obligation to find a home for these unfortunate victims of war and religious or political persecution. To divide the present occupants of these camps into two categories; one, those who arrived before December 22, 1945, and the other those arriving after that date, raises obvious administrative difficulties of great complexity and leaves completely undischarged our obligation, equally strong, to those who sought asylum after December 1945 from the cruelties of persecution.

In other words, to leave the date as it is, is to make two packages out of what should be one, to leave the job only partially accomplished.

There is, however, a further and more compelling reason for this suggested change in date. No doubt, unwittingly, but none the less effectively, the selection of the arbitrary date, December 22, 1945, has resulted in effecting a discrimination against religious and racial groups which is foreign to the finest American traditions and should never find a place in legislation. The Jews, those who suffered most from the outrages of their torturers, fled in large numbers from Poland, the Ukraine, and elsewhere following the war, to seek refuge in these camps. Likewise, those professing the Catholic faith fled before the prospective horrors and tortures of Communist oppressors. To mark these groups as ineligible for entry into this country under the displaced-persons program seems to me extremely unfair and unfortunate. Certainly these victims of totalitarianism, whether nazism or communism, may reasonably be expected to appreciate the blessings of American freedom at least equally with the victims of the actual conduct of the war itself who for the most part comprise those already within the camps by December 1945.

In fairness it should be pointed out that the Right Reverend E. E. Swanstrom, of New York, chairman of the National Catholic Resettlement Council, has disavowed any claim that the bill which we finally enacted is discriminatory. Nevertheless, the council, at its meeting in St. Paul, Minn., on June 4, adopted a resolution urging that April 21, 1947, be selected as the determinative date in this legislation in order to prevent injustice to many good European citizens who fled from Communist-dominated areas after the end of the war.

The simple amendment here suggested, of course, in no way increases the number of displaced persons to be admitted to this country. That is not changed in any way. It merely makes eligible for consideration for admission not only those forcibly displaced during the conduct of the war, but also those equally effectively displaced by conditions resulting from the war.

Modern Business Problems

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. HAROLD D. DONOHUE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. DONOHUE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I should like to include the address I recently delivered at a meeting of the Smaller Business Association of New England, which took place on July 27, 1948, at the Hotel Sheraton in Worcester, Mass.

The address follows:

Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the Smaller Business Association of New England, it is a privilege and pleasure for me to be with you tonight on the occasion of your sectional meeting here in the city of Worcester and the heart of the Commonwealth.

I am not going to talk about small business in any narrow sense, but about American business. If we examine the facts, small business is American business, for 98 percent of all the business units in the United States have fewer than 50 employees. These small enterprises represent the spirit of American free enterprise, the heart of our free economy.

These are critical times—more critical, perhaps, than many of us realize. We read and hear much of the things that are happening which threaten to plunge other nations of the world into political and economic chaos, but there are also other dangers for us which are much closer at hand.

The threat of economic disaster is not wholly one that we can view from afar. Many of the same forces which have brought large sections of Europe close to the brink of chaos are also working in our midst.

Today America stands as an oasis of social and economic freedom in a world beset by dictators and regimentation. We are facing a fight to preserve our traditional liberties—liberties which were almost universally accepted as the rightful heritage of mankind not so many years ago. One by one other nations who enjoy similar liberties have been forced to relinquish them either by totalitarian pressure or economic adversity.

American productivity, which far exceeds the productivity of any other nation in the history of mankind, has been built on the principle of free enterprise. This principle is one of our fundamental doctrines. In a sense it is the foundation on which our other liberties have been erected, for it represents the right of the individual to be his own master. There can be no real freedom in a land where all commerce and industry are monopolized either by the Government or a handful of private enterprisers.

However, the stability of a free economy depends upon the social intelligence and individual responsibility of the people who enjoy its advantages. It cannot prosper in a society where selfishness and opportunism are allowed to thrive with reckless abandon.

It should be a matter of the deepest concern to all of us that the tendency of our American economy to swing widely between prosperity and depression has become increasingly apparent in recent years. In a brief span of three decades we have had three periods of prosperity and two depressions. We all remember the lush period of the 1920's when making a paper fortune on the stock exchange was the style even for the office boy and housemaids. Everybody was going the limit to gratify his own desires. If he couldn't pay cash for what he wanted, he could buy it a dollar down and a dollar a week. Nobody was concerned about a day of reckoning, except a few far-sighted economists, and nobody paid much attention to them.

Then came the crash. Today we are similarly threatened with inflation. Many are convinced that it has already arrived, but the present situation differs considerably from the inflation of the 1920's. That was primarily an inflation in the securities market; this is an inflation in the commodities market. There is very little speculation in the present situation. Certainly, however, the danger is no less; it may be even greater. And certainly the selfishness on the part of many is again pushing us toward the brink of disaster.

Time does not permit a detailed discussion of all the factors that enter into what I have termed "selfishness," but I would like to discuss with you one of the major causes.

In my opinion overexpansion of credit is a major contributing cause of a general business break-down. This has been recognized by the American Banking Association when it stated that "easy credit terms in the long run is bad business."

When anything is suggested in the nature of planned economy it is termed "communistic" because we would be denying to the individual his inherent right to use his credit on the best terms he can secure. This seems to be the equivalent of saying we have an inherent right to destroy ourselves, and everybody else along with us.

I am perfectly aware that consumer credit has been a powerful factor in the economic growth of our country. It has helped to keep production lines in operation and to maintain employment in periods when buyer demand was lagging behind the output of certain industries. It is a drug to increase demand. This is certainly not a drug that we need today, because the demand is so great.

I doubt that the small-business man could be given any more dangerous advice in the present situation than to be told to go all out on long-term credit selling. We know that the present inflationary spiral must be stopped, for otherwise we are headed for an economic disaster. Present prices are mounting upward like a stock of boxes piled one on top of the other until the slightest vibration may send them toppling to the ground. If anything happened to bring about a sharp reduction in prices, even by some emergency action, the little-business man with a heavy load of credit sales would be caught in the middle. His creditors—banks and wholesalers—would press him for settlements. His customers would be ill-disposed to continue payments on goods purchased while the prices were up. Many of them would probably default, especially if the decline in prices were accompanied by other features of a business recession.

What action Congress will take on the President's proposal is something uncertain. I believe, however, that a great number of the Members in both the Senate and the House recognize that some legislation should be enacted to prevent further inflationary trends. This is not a partisan matter. High prices and inflation are no respecters of political affiliation.

One of my chief reasons for discussing consumer credit has been to emphasize that American business must develop a keener sense of responsibility for the economic well-being of the Nation, if our system of free enterprise is to survive and prosper. If we have heeded the lessons of history, we know that inflation is the highroad to economic chaos. We know, moreover, that economic chaos fosters political upheavals and the development of radical economic doctrines. It is the principal ally of the Communist and every other plotter who hopes to overthrow our Nation.

We are all concerned about what may happen in the field of small business in the event of recession. Since the end of 1943, when the business population of the country hit the bottom of its wartime slump, more than 650,000 new businesses have appeared. Unquestionably, many thousands of them have been started by veterans and former war workers with virtually no business education or experience. These small enterprisers are ill prepared even for the return of normal business competition. If any great number of them were to fail, they might conceivably set off a chain reaction of failures which would end in a major calamity.

I am not in any sense meaning to say that we are headed inevitably toward another depression. Such a statement is not only untrue, in my opinion; it is dangerous. To say that another depression is inevitable is to resign ourselves to its coming. That we must not do.

We do not know what another depression would do to our economy. Many businessmen, who have observed a close parallel between present conditions and those that followed the First World War, have soothed themselves with an idea that, if another depression is ahead of us now, it will follow the same pattern as the depression of 1920–21. That depression was bad enough but it was a short one, except for the farmer. There is no certainty, however, that another depression would be a short one.

There are many influences at work today which were absent a quarter of a century ago. All of our business life has become more involved and more complicated. In the depression that followed World War I, the price of food decreased rapidly to adjust to falling incomes. The farmers took the rap. This time we have a price-support program for agricultural products which does not expire until the end of next year when it is almost certain to be renewed. That means that food prices would be slow to adjust to another depression.

In the World War I depression, labor unions had only 4,000,000 members who had just begun to realize the influence they were capable of wielding. There are now 15,000,000 unionized workers in the country, supported by effective legislation and powerful political allies.

These new developments have introduced elements into our economic structure which greatly complicate the problem of forecasting what would happen in another depression. I do not mean to say that these elements are not desirable. It is worth noting, however, that while the positions of agriculture and labor have been greatly strengthened, the position of business has been very little reinforced if at all.

Still another element is present today which was lacking in the period that followed the First World War. There was no dynamic force at work then to drive the world into the fold of communism. That force is present now, seeking to develop economic chaos and factional disputes. We can be very sure that the Communists are doing all that they can to bring about another depression in the United States. They know that the American people will never again tolerate the hardships of a major depression such as the one that hit us in 1929. They hope that the result would be a swing to communism.

This danger is not one that we can afford to ignore, regardless of our faith in the good sense and patriotism of our American people. It is up to American business to see that conditions do not develop which will favor a dangerous swing to the left. Our system of economic freedom can exist only so long as we can make it work successfully. If we permit it to falter and fail, we must anticipate the upsurgence of some other economic doctrine wholly foreign to our American ideals and traditions.

We must learn that economic freedom means, not freedom to engage in selfish practices that jeopardize the general business structure, but freedom to work together for the good of all. This is the only way that we can insure the future of American free enterprise.

Statement on Bill for an Excess-Profits Tax and for Special Amortization of Economic Emergency Facilities

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN D. DINGELL
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, the excess-profits tax provided for in the bill I have introduced today is expected to yield about $4,300,000,000, according to Treasury estimates. It will contribute to the fight against inflation in four main ways.

First, it will go far toward restoring a surplus of Government receipts over expenditures, which should be one of the Government's principal weapons against inflation. Such a Treasury surplus was eliminated by the tax-reduction bill passed in the spring of 1948.

Second, it will remove $4,300,000,000 of purchasing power from large corporations. The Treasury estimates that this bill will affect less than 25,000 of the more than 360,000 corporations filing tax returns with the Treasury. It is significant, however, that the rapidly rising corporate profits would make taxable 3,000 more corporations than did the bill I introduced earlier this year—even though the present bill is much more liberal in its terms. Moreover, the present bill will yield over a billion dollars more in revenue. The net result of the tax will be to reduce demand for investment and inventory accumulation, to relieve pressure on markets, especially for capital goods, and thus to reduce inflationary pressure on the economy.

New businesses would be protected by a special exemption not granted to corporations in existence before 1940.

Third, the excess-profits tax should contribute to wage stabilization. Extraordinary business profits are undoubtedly one of the two major factors giving rise to demands for wage increases, the other and by far the most important being the exorbitant rise in the cost of living. The taxation of excess profits, therefore, together with measures to hold living costs down, should restore stability to the wage structure.

Fourth, the excess-profits tax, limited to the larger corporations, will be an inducement to the dominant producers and price-setters in an industry to avoid further price increases to whatever the traffic will bear, since so large a part of the price increase would be paid over to the Government.

With corporate profits after taxes nearly 100 percent above the level of peak war year 1943, the consuming public is entitled to protection from the peacetime profiteers.

This bill also attacks inflation by encouraging the building and acquisition of plants and equipment for the production of key cost-of-living commodities or materials in short supply. All income taxpayers—both individuals and corporations—will be allowed to charge off for tax purposes the cost of economic emergency facilities over a period of 5 years instead of ordinary depreciation over the life of the facility. Provision is made for a committee, appointed by the President, to certify as to the necessity for economic emergency facilities.

An explanation of the specific sections of the bill follows:

Section 1 of the bill states the short title: "Emergency Revenue Act of 1948."

Section 2 of the bill, will reimpose with certain modifications the excess-profits tax which was repealed by the Revenue Act of 1945.

The old law imposed an excess-profits tax at a flat rate of 85½ percent of the adjusted excess profits net income with a ceiling for normal, surtax and excess-profits tax combined of 80 percent. The wartime tax provided for a specific exemption of $10,000. Under the wartime tax the excess-profits credit was the higher of (1) an income credit equal to 95 percent of average earnings for the period 1936–1939 with certain adjustments for changes in capital, or (2) an invested capital credit equal to 8 percent of the first $5,000,000, plus 6 percent on the next $5,000,000, plus 5 percent of the balance of invested capital over $10,000,000.

The bill would make the following changes in the wartime excess-profits tax:

1. Effective date: The new excess-profits tax would be made applicable to taxable years ending after 1948.

2. Specific exemption: In lieu of the $10,000 wartime specific exemption, the bill provides $50,000, with an additional $50,000 allowed to corporations not in existence prior to January 1, 1940.

3. Excess-profits credit: The excess-profits credit under the bill is equal to 140 percent of the excess-profits credit allowed under the wartime tax.

4. Tax rate: Tax rates under the new bill would be:

Income subject to tax:	Tax rate (percent)
In excess of 140 percent but not in excess of 145 percent of old credit	50
In excess of 145 percent but not in excess of 150 percent of old credit	60
In excess of 150 percent but not in excess of 75 percent of old credit	70
In excess of 175 percent of old credit	80

5. Carry-overs: Under the bill there will be no carry-overs or carry-backs of any unused excess-profits credits.

Section 3 of the bill provides 5-year amortization for economic emergency facilities similar to that allowed during the last war, with the following modifications:

(a) The authority for certifying such facilities as necessary is vested in a committee designated by the President for such purpose. The committee is authorized to prescribe such rules and regulations as may be required with respect to these certificates. The committee, in its discretion, could certify that only a part of a facility qualifies for, and is subject to, 5-year amortization.

(b) Provision is made for the prevention of the application of the long-term capital-gains rate to any gain resulting from the sale of an emergency facility to the extent of the amortization deduction previously taken.

(c) The cost of land is not included in the basis for special amortization.

(d) The provision will take effect for taxable years after 1947.

Mr. Speaker, it would be an unconscionable denial of responsibility if Congress were to adjourn without passing this bill. Since the peacetime excess-profits tax will rest on the foundation of our experience in the war, there is no necessity for extended debate. The bill could even be passed under suspension of the rules. I point out that 159 Members already have voted for an excess-profits tax in the Eightieth Congress. If only 59 Republican Members should awaken to the pressing need of the hour, passage of this bill can be obtained.

I repeat—corporate profits feeding the fires of inflation have soared to nearly twice the level of the peak wartime year. Surely—in peace as well as in war—the American people cannot fail to protect themselves against those whose uninterrupted folly threatens the stability—if not the very existence—of the country and the capitalistic economy.

Dewey's Teacher Slur Verified

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGIA L. LUSK
OF NEW MEXICO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mrs. LUSK. Mr. Speaker, a prominent newspaper columnist has termed the criticism of Mr. Dewey by the school teachers and friends of Federal aid to education, as childish. But in my opinion it is a serious matter.

As a Presidential candidate, Governor Dewey's attitude on this and every other question should be thoroughly understood. Why does not Governor Dewey himself, rather than through a secretary, tell the people of his stand?

Governor Maw, of Utah, has the forthrightness and courage to bring this discussion out in the open.

I am glad to offer his statement made to the press for information of the Members, to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD:

[From the Democrat, of New York, N. Y., July 29, 1948]

DEWEY'S TEACHER SLUR VERIFIED—WITNESS REFUTES DENIALS—GOP NOMINEE HIT TEACHERS' LOBBY AS VICIOUS

Governor Herbert B. Maw of Utah today sharply refuted denials issued for Governor Dewey of New York that Dewey had made slurring remarks concerning the activities of the teacher's lobby.

"I was there," said Governor Maw. "Dewey did make the statements attributed to him."

TEACHERS VERSUS DAY LABORERS

Governor Maw also revealed that Governor Dewey and Governor Warren, now Dewey's running mate, clashed sharply over the fact that Warren argued that school teachers should be paid more than day laborers.

Governor Dewey was criticized at the recent convention of the National Education Association in Cleveland for making the statements. Dewey's remarks were originally reported in a copyrighted syndicated column to the effect that he had characterized teacher's propaganda for higher pay as the biggest lie since Hitler.

CONVICT HIM OF UNTRUTH

Governor Maw today said:

"I cannot understand why Governor Dewey persists in allowing subordinates to issue denials for him. He made the statements and this apparent attempt to dodge the political consequences can only convict him of untruth. If I felt as strongly as Governor Dewey seemed to on this subject I would certainly not object to standing up and backing my own statements."

Governor Maw said the conversation at which the statements were made by Governor Dewey took place immediately before the opening of an executive session of the Governors' Conference. He added:

"This was on the next to the last day of the recent Governors' Conference in Portsmouth, N. H. That would make it June 15."

TEACHERS' LOBBY "MOST VICIOUS"

Telling of the conversation, Governor Maw said:

"There was a discussion of the problem facing all Governors on the matter of teachers, their pay and the general shortage of trained personnel. This problem was to be the subject of the executive session.

"Governor Dewey was extremely excited and heated in his remarks. I remember distinctly one statement in which he said, 'It (the teachers' lobby) is the most vicious lobby in the Nation today. If it isn't stepped on now, it will destroy the Nation.'

"There was some disagreement among the Governors with this extreme statement, but Governor Dewey persisted in his remarks," Governor Maw recalled. "Dewey went on to say, 'It's worse than the power lobby, the real-estate lobby, the oil lobby, the liquor lobby and a lot of others'."

There was a sharp interchange between Governor Warren and Governor Dewey at this point, Governor Maw declared. Governor Warren asked Governor Dewey:

"Why teachers don't even get as much as a common laborer. Do you object to them getting that sort of pay?"

WOULD FIGHT PAY INCREASE

Dewey replied: "That's not true in New York."

"I don't know about your State, Tom," Governor Warren replied, "but conditions are not good in California."

Governor Maw thought for a moment and added, "I was a little surprised that Dewey and Warren wound up on the same ticket at the Republican Convention. They certainly differed on this issue."

One of Governor Dewey's pet projects at this Governors' Conference was a proposal that the conference hire some top price publicity men to combat the teacher's demands for pay increases.

DEWEY AID ISSUED DENIAL

"Governor Dewey said he had already personally contacted radio commentators and news columnists in New York to get them to stop using teachers' propaganda. He wanted them to tone the teachers' demands down. I suppose that's how Drew Pearson got on the story."

Since publication of the story by Drew Pearson and the offering of a resolution of censure to the National Education Association convention in Cleveland, Ohio, James Hagerty, press attaché to Governor Dewey, has twice denied the story. He termed it utterly false.

Governor Hildredth, of Maine, a Republican, also denied Pearson's story.

Governor Maw today said, "I'd be glad to make an affidavit under oath to the truth of my statement. I can't see the sense of these denials. Are they ashamed of an action openly urged upon the Governors' Conference? Possibly Governor Dewey feels there is political dynamite in his original remarks. I can only say that he should have thought of that when he made them."

Governor Maw explained that the remarks of Governor Dewey which he quoted were made prior to the executive session. He said that he did not feel at liberty to reveal Dewey's further statements as the discussion was continued in the executive session.

Veterans' Housing

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. E. (EDWARD) A. MITCHELL
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, in all the discussion these days of housing, there is one point on which everyone, regardless of other differences on the subject, agrees. This is that the veterans are entitled to homes of their own—and that everything possible should be done to aid them get those homes.

To that end, I have today introduced a bill—H. R. 7108—designed to allow veterans once again to make use of the home loan guaranty provisions of the GI bill of rights.

H. R. 7108 has only one purpose, to establish a secondary market for GI home-loan mortgages in the Veterans' Administration at once. It stands outside the areas of dispute in the highly controversial field of housing. It would not cost the taxpayers a cent.

Allow me to explain this legislation and the need for it, and allow me, at the same time, to urge this House to give favorable consideration to H. R. 7108 as expeditiously as possible in this extraordinary session.

In the closing minutes of the last session of this Congress, we passed legislation designed to reestablish a secondary market for GI home-loan mortgages. This action was necessary, as its proponents explained, because there had been a sharp decline in the number of GI home loans after the Government's secondary market for these mortgages was allowed to lapse in the summer of 1947. Veterans could not find lending institutions which would give them money on Veterans' Administration guaranteed loans. The reason was simple. The lenders could not find a secondary market for mortgage paper.

The original intent had been to set up the secondary market in the Veterans' Administration, but the bill which finally went through on June 20 put it in the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. This was, perhaps, natural, since RFC had provided the secondary market prior to midsummer 1947. Now, however, veterans tell us that 6 weeks' experience has already demonstrated some unnecessary restrictions in the legislation. Further, they say, the RFC is handling the problem in a manner which underlines these restrictions.

The present bill (H. R. 7108) amends the GI bill of rights to establish a secondary market for GI home loans in the Veterans' Administration, where the veterans want it and where the people are really concerned with the needs and the rights of the veterans. H. R. 7108 would authorize the Veterans' Administrator to purchase GI home-loan mortgages at par value within 5 years of the date of issuance. Where such a loan had been guaranteed by VA prior to September 1, 1948, the amount of unpaid principal, plus accrued interest, could not exceed $12,000. The original amount of any loan guaranteed on or after September 1, 1948, could not exceed $7,500. The service fee established under the bill would be not more than 1 percent. The financing is of a type familiar with such legislation. H. R. 7108 provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall provide the Veterans' Administrator with the funds necessary to carry out the purposes of the bill; that these funds shall be kept in a special deposit account with the Treasurer of the United States; and that the Administrator shall pay interest to the Treasurer at a rate to be established by the Secretary of the Treasury.

It is worth noting, incidentally, that such operations have always yielded a profit to the Government in the past. Here is a workable housing proposal that calls for no outlay at all, and, wonder of wonders, even brings in money.

There is nothing wrong with the GI bill of rights, as such, but the veterans' home-loan program has dried up to an alarming extent because of the lack of a proper secondary market.

This bill is designed to meet that lack. Supported by veterans' groups and of obvious benefit to veterans, to the construction industry, to building labor, and to the community as a whole, it offers a simple way of assuring a great volume of veterans' housing in the days ahead. H. R. 7108 should be passed.

Dumping of Garbage at Rosedale, Long Island

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GREGORY McMAHON
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. Speaker, I am in receipt of a communication from the Rosedale Civic Association, Inc., of Rosedale, Long Island, N. Y., which sets forth the plight of that community in regard to the dumping of New York City's garbage within its confines.

It is my intention, Mr. Speaker, to inquire from the other Members of the House after having read this how the problem is being met in their cities, particularly Chicago, Los Angeles, and large cities of that nature.

Upon receipt of this information, it is my intention to turn over the suggested plans to the mayor of New York City in the hope that an early solution of this problem will be forthcoming.

The Rosedale Civic Association's letter reads as follows:

GARBAGE DUMPING AROUSES ROSEDALE

The residents of Rosedale were stirred to new protests against the decision of Sanitation Commissioner William J. Powell to continue dumping in Rosedale despite his promise to stop it. The board of governors of the Rosedale Civic Association were given a mandate to take steps to stop this, the greatest menace to health and property that was ever perpetrated on a residential community.

It seems incongruous for the greatest, the most enlightened, and the most modern city in the world to resort to such a primitive method to dispose of its garbage. There must be something radically wrong and illogical with a department that will summon an individual to court for exposing a small garbage can for only a short time while it dumps all day and every day tons of garbage in an exposed area in a residential community.

Commissioner Powell assured the committee of the Rosedale Civic Association that the dumping was only temporary because of lack of equipment and it would be discontinued permanently on April 1, 1948. Thereafter the dumping would be resumed at its former location.

Although new garbage trucks had been delivered to the sanitation department this promise was not fulfilled and the reason given by Mr. Powell for not doing it was an apparent evasion. Since he was harassed by the committee to fulfill the promise, he gave his assurance that if the committee would locate another area he would stop dumping in Rosedale the very next day.

Accordingly, two sites were located. One was ruled out, but the other which was not in proximity to any homes was found suitable by the sanitation-department engineer. When our president, Joseph Gioscia, now insisted that Mr. Powell act at once in accordance with his promise, he pleaded for an extension of 1 week to investigate the site. The committee felt that the commissioner now had his back to the wall and could not now reasonably go back on his promise. But, alas, after a week the commissioner gave his answer that at the far end of the area which was hardly discernible was Jamaica Bay and that Park Commissioner Robert Moses would therefore not permit the dumping of garbage. This excuse bore no logic since Commissioner Moses is now permitting the dumping of garbage directly into the Brooklyn part of Jamaica Bay as a land fill whereas dumping on the approved site, located by the committee, could not reach Jamaica Bay for years. An endeavor to contact Robert Moses by our president, Joseph Gioscia, proved futile and subsequently a statement appeared in the newspapers wherein Commissioner Moses stated that he proposes to use the chosen area as a sanctuary for bird and wildlife. These are strange words coming from a man who spent most of his life building highways flanked by landscaping, beaches, and parks for the enjoyment, recreation, and health of human beings. One would suppose that in his advancing years Mr. Moses is diverting his attention to animals and birds that do not now exist in the selected area, to the detriment of human beings who are threatened by the decaying garbage in their midst. It is apparent that there must be some collusion between the sanitation and park departments and we are disappointed in finding Mr. Moses a party to it. Because the garbage is eventually covered with a layer of sand, does not abate the menace and hazard to health. The fact that garbage is continually dumped all day and every day, there necessarily must be exposed garbage at all times.

It should be obvious to everyone, including those in the city administration, that no service with the exception of hospital and fire-fighting services takes precedence over garbage disposal. The city can dispense with a few books for the libraries for a while or additional appropriations for museums and botanical gardens and even the golden anniversary celebration as well as many other activities pending the solution of the garbage disposal. Then and only then will the city have good reason to celebrate.

Rosedale certainly has no reason to celebrate the golden anniversary. We would be better off if its residents of 50 years ago would have consolidated with Nassau County where the welfare and the well-being of its inhabitants are jealously guarded by the town and county administrations and not by a New York City government that is far removed both in location and interest from its environs. It is a certainty that if garbage were dumped in the vicinity of Mayor O'Dwyer's residence or Commissioner Powell's home they would forthwith take measures to correct this deplorable condition.

Considering the inefficiency of the sanitation department as reported by the citizens budget committee on January 12, 1948, and the recommendation for the reorganization of the department by the mayor's executive committee on administration of May 21, 1948, and considering the unusual request of the Rosedale committee by Mr. Powell to find a new site for dumping when his department could have readily located it if it made a diligent effort to do so, one wonders if Mr. Powell is really qualified for the job of commissioner of the sanitation department. A change in the personnel of the department might be in order at this time before invoking the suggested reforms.

What good are schools if healthy bodies cannot attend them? What good are books if healthy bodies cannot absorb them? What good are flowers if you live with a stench of garbage? Vermin and rat breeding, stench, explosive gases are a constant threat to the home and family, and the threat increases with the years as the garbage decomposes.

It is little wonder that Rosedale is up in arms to stamp out this menace from its residential community.

Truman's Bogus Program Postpones Real Deflation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT J. TWYMAN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. TWYMAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Chicago Daily News of July 31, 1948:

TRUMAN'S BOGUS PROGRAM POSTPONES REAL DEFLATION

WASHINGTON.—Up on Capitol Hill a sullen Congress is sitting in special session called by the President of the United States to meet "the urgent needs of the people."

Elsewhere in Washington, the city is deserted except for Government officials, forced by the President's action to forego their August vacations, and the usual seersuckered summer tourist trade.

Because of the political factors involved, no one is regarding the special session seriously or anticipates that any constructive action will be taken.

When President Truman used the rostrum of the Democratic National Convention to announce his intention of calling Congress back this summer, he gave the Republicans good reason to cry "politics."

For more than a decade, a Congress dominated by Mr. Truman's own party had failed to find a solution to many of the problems now characterized by the President as "urgent."

It is therefore not surprising, although disappointing, that the Republicans were unable to dispose of the many complexities facing the Eightieth Congress in less than the year and a half they have had a majority.

PRICES AND CONGRESS HIS ONLY VALID ISSUES

In his fight for reelection, Mr. Truman realizes that he has only two valid issues: High prices and the record of the Eightieth Congress.

It is, of course, possible to make a substantial case against the record of any Congress, no matter which party is in power.

If the Republicans have failed to enact a housing bill, the Democratic record was no better. In fact, the feeble efforts of Wilson Wyatt, Mr. Truman's one-time Housing Expediter, were a standing joke in Washington.

If the Republicans have refused to swallow the President's anti-inflation remedies, it is because they are nostrums rather than cures.

With regard to civil rights, the Republican record is immeasurably better than that of Mr. Truman's party.

Mr. Roosevelt talked glibly about these matters but never once did he force the issue on his fellow Democrats from the deep South.

When the President urges repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act, the country must not forget that more Democrats in both the Senate and the House voted for Taft-Hartley than voted against it. In fact, the Taft-Hartley Act could never have been passed over the President's veto without strong Democratic support.

On many of the other recommendations contained in the President's special message to Congress, Republicans and Democrats are divided in their support and opposition without regard to party lines.

DODGES REALITIES TO AID CAMPAIGN

The frailty of President Truman's position on the high cost of living is that he is dodging the realities of the situation in order to gain a campaign issue.

No one likes high prices, not even the manufacturers who seem to profit most. Ultimately, a constantly spiralling economy leads but to one end—economic disaster for all.

The President would deal with inflation by reinstating the excess-profits tax, restoring price controls, and restricting credit.

Possibly these measures could be effective if they were coupled with an all-out attack against inflation on every front.

As Walter Lippmann says so aptly: "There is a simple test by which the public can find out who is trying to deal sincerely and intelligently with inflation.

"Does the candidate begin or end his oration with a clear explanation and a stern warning that if his program is effective, it must be painful to farmers, wage earners, businessmen, and bankers?

"Does he put the public on notice that they cannot continue to enjoy the benefits of inflation—that is to say full employment, high wages, booming markets, high profits—and at the same time be able to buy at lower prices everything they are trying to buy?

"If the public man says none of this, if he believes or pretends to believe that he can reduce prevailing prices without reducing current incomes of farmers, workers, and businessmen, if, in other words, he talks as if the people could have their cake and eat it too, he is deceiving himself."

Mr. Lippmann's devastating sincerity test would flunk Mr. Truman on every count.

It was Truman who thought we could have ceilings on prices without applying the same rule to wages. It is Mr. Truman who is now trying to create the illusion that he, with the help of Congress, can reduce the cost of living without breaking the boom.

The President's failure to recommend an anti-inflation program which is all-embracing exposes his insincerity and lack of statesmanship.

Truman wants a campaign issue, not a remedy.

WHAT THEY FAIL TO SAY IS VITAL

It is to be hoped, as the campaign progresses, that the public will examine the speeches of both Presidential candidates, not so much for what they say as for what they fail to say.

As yet, Governor Dewey's views are unknown. It is unlikely that he will clarify his position until the special session of Congress has been concluded. So far as we are able to determine, he is making no effort to influence its judgment and will not be bound by its acts.

Mr. Truman's record is, of course, open to inspection.

That record is a sorry contradiction in economics. He has tried to control prices without placing similar ceilings on wages. At one time, he denounced controls as the methods of a police state; now he urges their necessity.

The President is for continued Government support of farm products but he omits any reference to their effect on consumer prices.

Housewives are not told that our taxpayers are making it possible for the British housewife to purchase bread at 4 cents a pound, beef rib roast at 40 cents, bacon at 48 cents and butter at 80 cents a pound.

We don't begrudge the British housewife these lower prices, but it should be understood that when Canada sells Great Britain bacon at 36 cents, the United States Government gives Great Britain the dollars with which to pay the bill.

United States gifts of about a billion a year finance British buying abroad. This is money paid by American citizens who are plagued with sky-high prices at home.

We have never heard President Truman denounce the various unions in the building trades whose restrictive practices inflate the cost of housing.

He has recommended no cuts in the ordinary affairs of Government.

He has not cracked down on the Department of Defense for failing to introduce the economies that were anticipated under the Unification of the Services Act.

In short, the President is either lacking in any knowledge of elementary economics or he willfully chooses to deceive the public by disregarding the contributing factors to inflation which are laden with political dynamite.

ACTION WILL AWAIT THE FALL ELECTION

It is in such a climate of mutual distrust and partisan politics that the Congress has gathered in Washington's midsummer heat to consider the President's wholly inadequate program.

A few days spent in the galleries of the House and Senate are enough to convince any visiting fireman that the only result of this special session will be an unwarranted waste of taxpayers' money.

Mr. Truman wants an issue for his campaign. The Republicans are determined he shall not have it.

"The vigor of our democracy is judged by its ability to take decisive action," says the President.

"Congress would be fully justified in adjourning at once," retorts Senator Taft.

What they both mean and fully understand is that in accordance with the great game of American politics, nothing will be done until after the November elections.

JOHN S. KNIGHT.

Atlantic Coast of Europe Is Kremlin's Goal of Year

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN DAVIS LODGE
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. LODGE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Constantine Brown from the Washington Sunday Star of August 1, 1948:

ATLANTIC COAST OF EUROPE IS KREMLIN'S GOAL OF YEAR—SOVIET BELIEVES UNITED STATES WILL NOT PROVOKE WAR AND SHE MAY SUCCEED WHERE HITLER FAILED ON THE "RIMLAND"

(By Constantine Brown)

Some ranking military men in Washington, who have followed Soviet policies since Moscow was given the green light in 1943 to take over eastern Europe and the Balkans, have come to the conclusion that the Kremlin is determined—regardless of the price—to achieve control over Europe as far as the Atlantic.

Furthermore, they believe that Russia intends, after destroying the regime of Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek, to establish Red supremacy over China, India, Siam, Indo-China, and Indonesia.

The Kremlin hopes to carry out its plans without war, but is prepared and willing to unleash a conflict if we attempt to interfere. Moscow feels confident that it will succeed where Hitler failed. The western powers were capable of determined resistance to Nazi Germany in World War II, but this strength has been destroyed as far as Europe is concerned, the Soviet planners believe, while the United States will not—single handed—challenge the vast power of the U. S. S. R. and her satellites.

As an indication of our timidity according to those who maintain some contacts with the countries behind the iron curtain, the Kremlin points out that the United States, after having shown its willingness to spend billions for Europe's recovery, balked when the western European nations asked that military equipment be made available to aid their self-defense.

LESSON FROM HITLER

The German geopoliticians, who, headed by the late Professor Haushofer, advised Hitler before he embarked on his fatal adventure, expounded the doctrine of the "heartland" of Europe and Asia which must be in the hands of any power which seeks to dominate the world. It was in accordance with this doctrine that the Germans tried to conquer the heart of Europe before they attempted to win the shorelines of the continent.

Soviet geopoliticians, who realize that today most of Europe's heartland is in Moscow's hands, go a step further. Taking a lesson from Hitler's sad experience, they believe that the heartland is useless unless the "rimland" of the continent is in their hands.

This makes it imperative for the U. S. S. R. to be in physical possession of the Atlantic coast from Norway to Spain—and, if possible, to Gibraltar. If such an operation can be carried out without a shooting war, so much the better. If there is physical resistance, however, it must be crushed. The present western governments must be liquidated and replaced by faithful stooges of the Kremlin.

EXPLAINS BERLIN ATTITUDE

This program explains the Soviet attitude in Berlin and its insistence on creating a centralized Germany after the Allies have evacuated German territory. America at the present time is the only power in the world capable of challenging the grandiose Russian plans. Hence, America either must be placed in a position where it cannot interfere with the Kremlin's plans or be persuaded to give up all interest in Europe and Asia.

It must be remembered that until Prime Minister Stalin was "bribed" to participate in the United Nations—by important concessions in China and new territorial acquisitions from Japan—he advocated the division of the world into three zones: (1) Eastern and central Europe and a portion of the Middle East, to be the responsibility of the U. S. S. R.; (2) western Europe and a portion of Africa together with the Indian Ocean area of Asia, for which Britain should be responsible; and (3) the Western Hemisphere—including the Philippine Islands—which would be the exclusive interest of the United States.

Prime Minister Stalin was following the old power politics pattern which eventually would lead to more major wars, for one of the great powers could be expected to infringe on the bailiwick of one of the others.

If today the United States can be persuaded to give up all interest in Europe and the Far East, Russia soon will be in a position to control both the Atlantic and Pacific shores of the continent of Europe and Asia and will not have to consider what America may do in the future.

BOMB EFFECT NEGLIGIBLE

Moscow's determination to reach the Atlantic this year is considered to be the only certain thing in the present confused European picture. Many diplomatic and military observers in Washington contend that Russia is reluctant to unleash another war because she is not fully prepared yet. Furthermore, it is said, she does not yet possess the atomic bomb. This destructive instrument, which is still an American monopoly, unquestionably would be important in an offensive war. But the knowledge of this monopoly is producing the same effect on the American people as the Maginot Line produced on the French between the two world wars.

The atomic bomb is a powerful weapon in our hands, if we decide to use it to stymie Russia's present obvious plans. But it will become of questionable importance if Russia is permitted to establish herself along the Atlantic and Pacific and begins to produce her own atomic bomb.

The belief that Russia is not fully prepared to wage war at this time is pure wishful thinking. It is true that the Soviet armies are not prepared to fight such a powerful army as we had in Europe between 1944 and 1945. If the powerful American divisions which broke the back of the Nazi armies and the powerful air groups which smashed Germany existed today between the Rhine and the Channel instead of the present weak skeleton formations, there is no doubt that the Russians would not have a chance against us, no matter how many divisions they had.

FORCES ARE WEAK

But our fighting strength in Europe right now is less than three divisions. Our Air Force is nowhere near what it was on VE-day. The French and British forces are lamentably weak and dispirited. There is more national unity in those countries today than there was a year or two ago, but still Communist agents have succeeded in creating a state of mind which does not lend itself to long-range resistance.

The French have manpower enough to organize immediately 45 divisions, but they must rely on American factories to provide them with the necessary equipment. We cannot provide them with it. We are figuring on increasing our own national forces by eight new divisions. This will require at least 18 months under present conditions. How can we assume the responsibility for providing war material for 45 new French divisions?

While it should be admitted that the Red armies are not equal qualitatively to the forces of the West as they existed on VE-day, there is no military force now in existence which is able to stand before the masses the U. S. S. R. can throw into a campaign at a moment's notice.

The sheer weight of Russia's more than 250 divisions would annihilate the weak forces which exist in western Europe. This explains why the French Government is swallowing its pride and urging the American and British Governments to negotiate—and appease Russia if necessary—rather than provoke a Soviet attack.

PROPITIOUS MOMENT

The Kremlin is fully aware of conditions in the West—much more so than we are about conditions behind the iron curtain. The Kremlin also is aware that in addition to our unpreparedness for a major war, a bitter electoral campaign will be waged in America during the next 3 months. The members of the Politburo assume that no political leader will be popular and get the vote if he advocates involvement of the United States in another war.

No moment has been more propitious for the Kremlin to put into effect its policies of reaching Europe's and Asia's rimland—as protection for the heartland—than the next few months. The Soviet leaders have made their calculations and believe that while there is slight danger of provoking the American people to another bitter fight, the chances that this will not happen are very great, indeed.

"SIT TIGHT" POLICY

Their present policy is to sit tight and let Washington exhaust itself with diplomatic gestures and notes. After a while, our diplomatic observers believe, when this Government is faced with the alternative of a shooting war or a withdrawal from Europe, the Kremlin is confident that we will withdraw.

Meanwhile, the Russians are holding tight to their policy of squeezing us out of Berlin—which is regarded by those in that city as another potential Bataan. The air lift which we are using to bring supplies into that beleaguered city is spectacular and impressive. But like many spectacular displays of strength, it cannot go on indefinitely. The days of heavy fogs and frequent bad weather are approaching and our planes will be grounded for considerable periods. "Then what?" the Russians ask.

The German people are watching our efforts with admiration, for American planes are performing a remarkable feat. But the question in their minds is whether there is enough strength in America to challenge the Russians when they decide to start their march to the Channel. They doubt it.

The Berlin affair, which has set the international pot boiling, is a premeditated incident on the part of the Russians. We have to make a choice in the near future whether to abandon the city—which means that we would have to leave all of Germany before the year is up—or to accept the Russian challenge and assert our rights to remain there.

The Russians feel confident that in either case they will succeed in reaching the Atlantic by the end of the year, and secure the rimland which they believe will help establish Asiatic domination over the world.

The GOP Wrecking Crew

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS E. MORGAN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of July 28, 1948:

THE GOP WRECKING CREW

The special session is a failure before it has really begun. That is evident from the statement of Republican leaders. If that statement were not enough, the fact is cinched by the announcement that an anti-poll-tax bill will be the first order of business. This means, of course, a filibuster by the Dixiecrats which will probably prevail over any attempt at cloture.

Despite the fact that Governor Dewey says that Congress should give careful consideration to whatever was proposed in the President's message, the GOP leaders give the message short shrift. They say that it would take 6 months to give consideration to Mr. Truman's program.

This statement certainly could not be applied to the Taft-Ellender-Wagner housing bill. That bill has been studied and discussed in Congress for several years and many hearings have been held. The bill has passed the Senate and no doubt would have passed the House if it had not been bottled up in committee. It could be passed in 1 day. To say that the million new dwellings being built this year exhaust the materials and labor available for the purpose sounds suspiciously like a lame alibi. After all, the T-E-W bill is a 10-year program, and in view of the desperate housing shortage, it is the counsel of despair to assume that materials and labor cannot be increased to meet the need.

Even more disturbing is the brush-off given Mr. Truman's anti-inflation program, as to which the GOP leaders say that it represents a fundamental difference in Government philosophy between the President and Congress. They say he stands for regimentation. If placing controls to prevent economic disaster represents regimentation, then the same GOP leaders, to be consistent, should repeal the rent-control law. Let them dare do that.

If the GOP is going to continue to get its philosophy from archaic textbooks, what is going to happen to the country meanwhile? No one likes controls, but we had them during the war and they kept prices within bounds despite the tremendous drain on supplies of all kinds for our armed forces. Are mere shibboleths to stand in the way of protecting the country from the calamity of runaway inflation?

To say that the President is already armed with the weapons to fight inflation just isn't true. They say he could cut Government spending. Has not the Eightieth Congress been in charge of the purse strings in the last 2 years with power to stop excessive expenditure, if it exists? The budget is abnormally high, but this is accounted for by the Marshall plan and the defense program, both of which Congress approved.

As to other points in the President's program, no doubt some of them can await action by the next Congress. But what good excuse can there be for taking no action on the matter of displaced persons, for failing to pass the much-discussed proposal for increasing minimum wages, and for extending Federal aid for education—which has already passed the Senate?

Mr. Truman, it is true, was playing politics in calling the special session. But it happened to be the kind of politics that ministers to the public welfare. The Republicans had two choices: they could either regard the President's action as a challenge and an opportunity, or they could sabotage his program. The leaders have chosen the latter course, and unless they are overruled by the GOP rank and file, the country will be the sufferer.

The people are not going to be deceived by the GOP position. It is too transparently obstructionist. It has seemed obvious in the past months that there will be a Republican victory in November, but if the GOP leaders' action is a fair sample of Republican policy, Harry Truman is likely to make a real horse race of the campaign.

Gardner Day at Braves Field

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PHILIP J. PHILBIN
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, Under leave to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include therein a recent article from the Gardner (Mass.) News which vividly described Gardner Day at Braves Field, Boston, last Sunday.

It was a great day for Gardner, a great day for the Braves, and a great day for the Jimmy fund and aid for afflicted and crippled children.

TWO THOUSAND GARDNERITES TREK TO BRAVES FIELD, SHOWER TRIBE SQUAD WITH GIFTS—CEREMONIES ARE BRIEF—CHAIRS, CARRIAGES, TRICYCLES LINE INFIELD—THIRTY-TWO FIRMS CONTRIBUTE

Gardner baseball fans, 2,000 strong, made a storm assault on the Wigwam, stately home of the Boston Braves in the Allston sector of sedate, respectable Boston yesterday. And they came bearing gifts. Every Brave, from the top sachem to the lowest tribesman, got something.

There were chairs of every variety and description, baby and doll carriages, cribs, bassinets, strollers, tricycles, and just about everything the industrial city of Gardner turns out in its mundane work week. Mike McCormick, Tribesman outer gardener, won himself a special compact Florence stove apartment gas range for an effective piece of work with the willow. He clubbed four hits in four trips to the plate, top Boston man of the day, to qualify for the award.

The tepee just swarmed with Gardnerites and they gave a rousing ovation as the snappy Simplex Fife, Bugle and Drum Corps piped its way onto the playing field to inaugurate the 2:30 ceremonies. Congressman PHILIP J. PHILBIN, of the Third Congressional District, State Representative Fred A. Blake, and Mayor Fred E. Perry, represented the Gardner delegation in the brief procession that next introduced the 35,000 Braves fans to the hulking Heywood-Wakefield Hitchcock chair, the city's coat of arms.

Then came the parade of gifts strong-armed onto the field and lined around the diamond by a corps of volunteer workers, male and female. The latter did especially well with the pushers. Meanwhile the Simplex band was marching snappily around the field and the Braves, troubadours, ambassadors of music, came wheeling along in the specially braced carrier for triplets, there being three Troubadours, of course.

A breath behind, or before—things were breaking that fast in the three-ring arena—came the Wampanoag chasseurs de bois to initiate Injun Billy Southworth into the tribe. The Gardner redmen left Lake Wampanoag in their swift bark conveyance over some mysterious waterway into the Charles River, the backyard of the Wigwam. They wheeled the canoe near home plate and before long Southworth and tribesmen in full headdress were paddling merrily in the general direction of the Great Beyond.

Again a few minutes before or after, the same tribal head and his papooses were grinning warm-heartedly for flash bulbs popping around the big chair on home plate.

A brief speaking program "mceed" by Mr. Denison brought Congressman PHILBIN into the limelight with a brief talk followed by the introduction of Representative Blake, Mayor Perry, Councilor Bill McMahon and F. Paul Hallock, the last two as chief engineers of the Braves' mid-summer Christmas party.

Southworth made a brief and courteous response on behalf of the Braves' players and their families. Jim Britt, radio sportscaster, accepted a beautiful upholstered chair from the committee given him for the original Jimmy, who stands behind the tremendously successful Jimmy cancer fund drive which got its start here in Gardner.

Roughly a third of the Braves patrons made the trip in 18 busses chartered for the occasion. The long procession left from the Heywood-Wakefield plant on Central street at 11:15 behind a Gardner police escort. Trucks laden with gifts left the city early in the morning and had delivered the gifts to the Wigwam for safekeeping before the motorcade pulled in.

The 32 area firms donating gifts were A. & B. Manufacturing Co., Allain Bros., American Chair Co., Beauchemin Bros., S. Bent & Sons, Bettez-La Roche Upholstering Co., Brown Bros., Children's Furniture Corp., Collier-Keyworth Co., Conant-Ball Co., John A. Dunn Corp., Florence Stove Co., Gardner Manufacturing Co., Gardner Upholstered Furniture Co., Gardner Wood Novelty Co., Gem Crib & Cradle Co., William C. Gerrard, C. H. Hartsborn, Inc., Hatton Press, Hedstrom-Union Co., Heywood Wakefield Co., Kuniholm Manufacturing Co., Nichols & Stone Co., O'Hearn Manufacturing Co., George Berreault & Son, Rahaim Upholstering Co., Rousseau Bros. Manufacturing Co., O. W. Siebert Co., Thayer Co., all of Gardner; Temple-Stuart Co., of Baldwinville; W. F. Whitney Co., of South Achburnham, and Winchendon Furniture Corp.

What We Must Do Next in Europe

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN DAVIS LODGE

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. LODGE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Hamilton Fish Armstrong:

WHAT WE MUST DO NEXT IN EUROPE

(By Hamilton Fish Armstrong)

A year ago western Europe was like a beleaguered medieval city, measuring her capacity to hold out by months and scanning the horizon for signs of possible succor. Plundered, scarred, and exhausted in a long campaign, liberated at last, she saw a new foe massing in the East. She felt the pressure of its agents in her streets and heard their boasts even in the governing circles that should have been the centers of the new resistance.

America's veins were pulsing with the life blood that Europe needed. Would the transfusion be offered? In our times, free will is so limited that the opportunity to exercise it on a grand scale was exhilarating. Some of us had no doubt that as soon as Americans understood the choice which Europe was facing they would assume all the costs and risks necessary to enable her to remain within the stream of western civilization. So it proved. Within a year ERP has been suggested, debated, adopted, and put into operation.

As a result, Europe west of the iron curtain today lives, works, and is not Communist. In Italy, France, and Greece, where a year ago communism was advancing, it still has not been defeated, but it has suffered severe defeats. In the other countries it is increasingly on the defensive. And eastern Europe, forbidden by Moscow to participate in the revival of the West, watches its progress enviously and with restless memories of lost personal and national freedom.

This is no mean achievement for one year of American foreign policy.

A year ago the problem of Europe was economic and social. This year it is political and military.

This year's problem grows directly out of last year's. As the path of economic salvation for the western nations becomes clearer under ERP, the risk that the Soviet Union will intervene to frustrate their progress along it becomes greater. For if the western nations are healthy they will be immune to Communist infiltration and continue to magnetize eastern Europe. What is more, their strength, added to that of the United States and other faithful members of the United Nations, can make the barrier against Soviet aggression absolute.

We are as concerned to bring about this result as the Kremlin is to prevent it. So far the advantage has been ours. The nations of western Europe disregarded Soviet threats of retaliation, accepted our aid, turned their backs on communism and threw in their lot with us. Now that, as we hoped and planned, they are in our camp, we must help make them able to stand up to the threat of Communist aggression from without just as last year we helped make them able to stand up to Communist revolution from within.

The essence of our decision to do this is not military so much as political, in the sense that an understanding of the broad movements of history is political. Yet it must be substantiated by both political and military action.

We must reiterate in terms specifically applicable to the present emergency the general pledge of support against aggression which we have already given all our fellow-members of the United Nations. We and those who will reciprocate this more specific pledge must bring our plans for the use of our joint forces against aggression to the same pitch of readiness which they would have reached if the Military Staff Committee of the UN Security Council had been permitted to function. And we must supply them, to the extent of our capacity, with arms and materials, so that they may be ready to do their part under those plans effectively.

These actions should all be taken now. They constitute a confirmation of the policies we adopted when we joined the United Nations and voted ERP. They extend those policies only in that they make them more precise.

It always seems more risky to be precise than general—at the start. Actually, the maximum risk would be to retain the obligations of the charter without arranging the collaborative means for carrying them out successfully, and to continue building up Europe with American goods and money without assuring her a breathing spell of safety in which to turn them to effective account.

The first objective, of course, is to avert war, by making plain to a potential aggressor that if he takes the final plunge he will be sure of finding powerful forces ranged against him. The second is to make certain that if this deterrent fails and war nevertheless comes, those forces will be brought into such instant and harmonious operation that they will be assured of victory.

European statesmen differ about what are the potential risks of war today, but not about the fact that a risk exists. The fear in foreign office circles in London is that Stalin may be as ignorant of the temper of the west as Hitler was, and that he may blunder as badly in estimating its limits. French and other continental leaders worry not only about this possibility but about the risk of a deliberate Soviet attack.

The French line of reasoning runs as follows:

A year ago everything seemed to favor the fulfillment of Soviet ambitions. Looking at western Europe, members of the Politburo saw a power vacuum. Looking at the United States, about to indulge in one of its mysterious political orgies, they figured that party leaders would never be able to agree on a program of European aid, and that even if they did its progress would soon be disrupted by the economic crisis which, according to Marxist prophecy, was about to overwhelm the capitalist world. Already in March, President Truman had announced a policy of military aid for Greece and Turkey. Moscow counted on his getting his fingers burned. All these events would fan a recrudescence of American isolationism.

This year, by contrast, members of the Politburo look out on a very different world scene.

In western Europe, a defensive coalition was formed by Britain, France, and the Low Countries at Brussels on March 17, 1948. The American policy of strengthening resistance to communism around the whole Soviet periphery has been pushed more vigorously than Moscow expected, and has been more successful, notably in Italy, Greece, and Turkey. Moscow also counted on regimenting life within her own zone of Europe quite easily. But Yugoslavs, Czechs, Poles, and others are not the mujiks that the Russian revolutionaries had to deal with, but lettered peoples proud of their nationality and experienced in independence.

Nor have American affairs marched according to the Kremlin schedule. Bipartisan support of an active foreign policy did not founder on the rocky approaches to the Presidential campaign. ERP was voted and is pumping blood into the wasted veins of Europe. Rearmament has begun. The demands of these two programs have at least postponed any business depression. Revolutionaries who joined with well-meaning citizens under Mr. Wallace's umbrella, borrowed from Neville Chamberlain's bankrupt estate, seem unlikely to receive the help they counted on from unemployed and restless labor in a period of economic stagnation.

The contrast in these two pictures is taken in Paris to indicate that whereas a year ago the Russian rulers might have felt content to move forward on the current of world events without themselves making an aggressive move and without much risk of war, today they can hardly count on that sort of progress. Hence, in this reasoning, unless the Soviet program excludes war as an instrument of policy, why would not this year or next be a more propitious time for the Kremlin to act than a year or so from now, when the countermeasures of the democracies will have decisively turned the balance in their favor?

It will be noticed that the effect of the atomic bomb on Russian calculations has not been mentioned. Obviously the men looking out from the windows of the Kremlin are taking it into account, but on the Continent there is a question whether it encourages the Russians to make war or seems to them a reason to postpone it.

Soviet strategists must guess that the present American supply of bombs is small. But they know it will grow steadily in numbers and in effectiveness per unit. They expect to develop the bomb themselves. But America will have acquired a tremendous headstart both in numbers and quality.

Probably they feel confident that we are not meditating a preventive war, even assuming we were sure that the atom bomb would bring us victory. Indeed, as things stand, they probably would count on their armies being able to occupy the capitals of western Europe, at any rate to the Channel and the Pyrenees, before we made up our minds to use the bomb; and they would figure that, once there, their armies would be safe from the bomb. On the technical problem of the effectiveness of the bomb against communications between armies of occupation and their base they probably keep as open a mind as do some American authorities.

But here a doubt must assail them. As tension between east and west grows, and as western cohesiveness and strength increase, will not the peoples of the western world feel tempted to put an end somehow to the uncertainty in which the Soviet Union is compelling them to live? Will they not rebel against the perpetual drain on their resources required to keep ahead of Soviet military preparations? Will they not reach the point of exasperation where they will use the bomb against their tormentors, with or without special provocation and warning, or make demands which will lead to a showdown in which they will use the bomb as a matter of course?

Russian leaders may not dare answer these questions with a confident negative. This possibility has made statesmen on the Continent feel that, on the whole, the bomb increases the temptation for the Soviets to seek a showdown in the near future rather than risk waiting to see whether the western world will seek one later.

Certain English conservatives with a good record of political forecast see merit in the French analysis. But the tendency in official circles in London is to label it "too French"—by which the speaker may mean either too logical or too emotional.

British officials cite the fact that, so far, there are no intelligence reports of special military preparations just inside the Soviet border. More important, they believe that Soviet Russia is too weak internally to risk war, and has run into too many difficulties in the territories she has recently brought under her sway to care to add to them. Anyway, they say, the Russian method is to deal with one big problem at a time. With the Cominform split already complicating Moscow's handling of the German problem, they do not see much likelihood that the Politburo would launch out on a great aggressive venture which would be sure to end, even if it did not begin, as a world war.

One further consideration seems pertinent. Mr. X stated in Foreign Affairs that the American Government's effort to contain Soviet expansion at all points aims to build up an increasing strain on the Kremlin's foreign policies. As ex-Secretary Stimson put it, the American object is to make the Soviet leaders change their minds or lose their jobs. If the Soviet leaders understand that this is the adopted American policy, will they wait passively for it to become effective? If Stalin wanted or expected peace, would he have taken Ambassador Bedell Smith's very serious demarche of May 4 as a mere excuse for launching a propaganda campaign in the course of which he hurled Mr. Wallace in President Truman's face?

The British do not ignore the long-run implications of a line of thought like this, and, of course, they are worried about what a dictator might do with the atomic bomb when he secures a supply. They simply feel that the chance of a blunder by the Kremlin or a Soviet commander in Germany, Austria, or elsewhere is sufficiently acute to justify every possible precautionary move on our side, without losing sleep over the minor chance, as they see it, that Stalin may overnight order a sweep toward the Atlantic.

The European debate as to whether the risk of war issues chiefly from Soviet calculations or miscalculations interests the United States less than the fact that there is a risk. President Truman and Secretary Marshall gave renewed recognition to the fact that the risk exists when they welcomed the Brussels pact and promised American help to make it successful. The Vandenberg resolution of June 11 has now authorized them to carry out that promise, and the first discussions of how to link the United States and Canada with the west European defense system have been held in Washington with representatives of the five Brussels-pact nations.

While we discuss the form of our political guaranty of the European democracies, we can press forward with de facto cooperation. One advantage of informal staff talks with European military leaders is that our own military leaders will have to clarify their opinions regarding various projects for the defense of Europe. Europeans are not interested in hearing about how their countries might be liberated after some years of conflict. What they want to know is how much aid we can give them in defense at the start.

Our various military services are supposed to be somewhat at cross-purposes about the feasibility of defending western Europe and about the methods to be used in the attempt. It will be salutary for them to discuss the problem on the assumption that for political reasons that attempt is going to be made.

How to supply American arms to Europe at this stage is a more difficult problem. Presumably our Government could declare certain stocks surplus or out of date, and could sell them to our friends in Europe or lend-lease them. But the major part of the answer must be an effort by American industry, and by European industry supplied in part with American raw materials, to provide at an accelerated pace and in accordance with an agreed priority rating, the particular equipment most needed for joint operations.

Meanwhile, the British welcome the bomber squadrons which we are stationing at British airfields for "training" purposes, but wish the system could be extended to France and the Low Countries. They also are particularly anxious for the French forces to be better equipped. They think France might be less reluctant to permit a controlled German recovery, and the full integration of the Ruhr industry with west European recovery plans, once she has regained her military strength and once she is assured that the United States as well as Britain will be her partner from the start in opposing any Russian attempt to make use of a revived Germany in an attack on the west.

For it must be understood that the French fear today is not so much of Germany alone, as in the past, but of Germany as a partner and spearhead of Russia. French leaders think that Americans like General Clay ignore this danger in their preoccupation with the direct Soviet danger. Once the German war potential has been restored, even under western supervision, the French see no possibility of outbidding Moscow for Germany's favor. What can the west offer Germany? Nothing, unless the Saar and frontier rectifications at the expense of France. What can Moscow offer Germany? In the east, the former German territory which is now Polish, and in the west—the west.

Before the time for such unequal bargaining comes, France must be as strong as possible herself and joined in partnership with great allies. She sees no chance for ultimate peace and safety except in a group which possesses power superior to a Russo-German combination, and she feels that she must delay German recovery, even to the detriment of west European recovery, until that group takes shape.

On this more general score, then, as well as with a view to the immediate military situation, there is a strong argument for early American participation in the organization of the nations of western Europe for defense against aggression.

The need goes beyond our participation in an observer role in the military committee of the Brussels Treaty powers, and beyond whatever arms we may be able to give those powers at short notice. It is important to avoid any misunderstanding by our people or by the Europeans as to the nature of the action we are taking to build up a defense system against possible Soviet aggression. And it is vital that the Soviet Union understand just what we are doing and intend to do. The United States must assemble the whole of its influence to prevent war. It must not hazard being sucked into war, as Britain was in 1914 under Sir Edward Grey, without having made plain to its possible antagonists the full measure of the risk they run.

European leaders have recognized the difficulty of our taking action on a political guaranty before the new President and Congress are elected, and have deeply regretted it. They are certain that once the United States has given a specific undertaking to support the European democracies against aggression, the risk of aggression, either blundering or deliberate, will be enormously reduced. A promise by the United States to be in a war against aggression from the start, instead of after it has already been halfway lost, as in 1917 and 1941, will go far to make sure, in European eyes, that the promise will not be put to proof.

But now that a special session of Congress has assembled it is possible to do almost at once what a few weeks ago seemed impracticable. We can have de facto cooperation; and we can add to the psychological impact of a formal declaration of policy in the shape of a treaty approved by the Senate.

Approval of an agreement associating the United States in the defense of western Europe, in harmony with the VANDENBERG resolution, would not be grist to the campaign mill of either Republicans or Democrats. Leaders on both sides supported that resolution, and the policy which it is designed to implement could not have become our national policy without the cooperation of both. Advantage would accrue not to either party but to the Nation.

The gravity of the present emergency should persuade Senate leaders of both parties to set controversial issues aside long enough to act on it; and if they act on it, they are bound to support it, for no association could be imagined which more closely affected our national security in the precise connotation of their own declaration.

Last autumn, I suggested that the failure of all efforts to give substance to the enforcement provisions of the Charter made supplementary security measures necessary, and that those members of the United Nations who were anxious to carry out their obligations of mutual self-defense against aggression should agree to do so voluntarily even in cases when a veto prevented the Security Council from ordering it. They might make the commitment in a special protocol open to all United Nation members, or in a series of regional treaties on the model of the Rio treaty of September 2, 1947. Either method of arranging group defense would be authorized by Article 51 and other articles of the Charter.

Given the present precarious situation in Berlin, where some Russian move, either intentional or blundering, might require us at any moment to make almost instantaneous decisions involving war, delay in acting along one or other of these lines is increasingly risky.

The natural tendency will be to follow the easier course of underwriting by treaty the five members of the Brussels Pact. But if we bear in mind the interests of the United Nations as a whole, with which our own long-term interests are so closely bound up, we may well decide to emphasize our intention to carry out our world-wide commitment under the Charter to resist aggression, whatever its sources and against whomever it may be directed, instead of limiting that commitment by implication to nations with which we have signed special group agreements.

We can do this by signing a general protocol open to all faithful members of the United Nations, those now directly menaced and others as well. The phraseology of the agreement can be simple, and so can the procedure by which it is to be brought into operation in case of need. While this is being settled, we shall be showing our practical support for the Western European security pact by participating as an observer in the discussions of its military committee and by arranging to sell or "lend-lease" them certain categories of arms and to help them manufacture others.

Then Congress can add to these physical preparations to deter and if need be defeat aggression, the immense weight of an unmistakable political guarantee. If in these circumstances war should come, we need not feel that we have omitted any practicable step in harmony with the Charter to ward off such an untold calamity, or to survive it.

Federal Thought Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES A. HALLECK

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of my colleague from Indiana, Hon. FOREST A. HARNESS.

FOREST A. HARNESS was born in Kokomo, Ind., where he still lives. He was graduated in law at Georgetown University, practiced in his home State and before the Supreme Court of the United States, served for a time as special assistant to the Attorney General of the United States and represented the Government in the famous proceedings that brought Samuel Insull back from Greece. He was elected to Congress in 1938 and has been there ever since. As chairman of the Subcommittee on Publicity and Propaganda of the House Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, he became deeply interested in the new technique of acting upon public opinion by Government propaganda. He is also a member of the House Rules Committee.

FEDERAL THOUGHT CONTROL—A STUDY IN GOVERNMENT BY PROPAGANDA

(By FOREST A. HARNESS, Member of Congress from Indiana)

The purpose of Government propaganda is to guide public opinion into channels favorable to a particular activity, be it soil conservation, national health insurance, irrigation, universal military training, public housing, or a given line of foreign policy.

When Government propaganda is successful in shaping public opinion to its own predetermined objectives, then we have arrived at a system of Federal Thought Control which parallels closely the mechanics of dictatorship.

Not all Government propaganda in the United States achieves its objectives, but much of it does.

Our Subcommittee on Publicity and Propaganda in the Executive Departments was established last May by the House of Representatives, to inquire into all Federal propaganda operations. As a subcommittee of the standing Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, we are empowered to survey routine operations in every administrative agency.

Our assignment is a challenging one, for often it is difficult to separate the merits of pending legislation from the larger question of Government propaganda designed to generate pressure on Congress. But we have set our course resolutely against the whole system and theory of Government-made public opinion, and we have attempted conscientiously to distinguish that great issue from all subsidiary questions touching the merits of various legislative proposals.

As we have stated in our several interim reports, our inquiry is not directed to the merits of this program or that, but solely to the question whether the Federal agencies are engaged in generating public opinion for or against pending legislation. Such activity by the Federal agencies, whether for or against any particular piece of legislation, is clearly beyond the law. And that is the beginning and end of our inquiry—whether the Government agencies are in fact making the public opinion which comes back upon Congress in the form of pressure-group activities.

THE CITIZEN UNAWARE

The average American citizen is only vaguely aware that the Federal Government continuously touches and influences his daily thinking. But, when he stops to think about it, he must realize that a host of Federal agencies and activities exert a constant, and often decisive, influence upon his own and his neighbors' opinions. Yet, I doubt that any but the most thoughtful students of American Government understand how vast is the range of this influence; how tremendous is the machinery in our Federal establishment through which this influence of molding opinion is exercised; and the extent of this threat to representative Government.

Everyone in Congress is keenly conscious of the tremendous, immeasurable power of this Federal machine, for he comes in direct, personal contact with it every day. He lives with the lobbies, good and bad, which constantly seek to influence the course of legislation, and he can hardly fail to know that the most powerful, most persistent of them all is the Federal lobby. It works around the clock, every day of the year.

TAXPAYERS PAY

The very range and intensity of official information can be confusing. At the last official tabulation in 1946, the executive agencies were spending annually some $75,000,000 a year in definitely identified publicity and propaganda activities.

These activities begin to explain why the Government Printing Office which occupies 33 acres of floor space in Washington and employs 7,900 full-time workers, still can't keep up with Government printing demands.

Some of the principal spenders for publicity in fiscal 1946 were:

Department of State	$30,377,000
Treasury	11,104,800
Department of Agriculture	9,295,700
Office for Emergency Management	8,154,021
War Department	5,715,690
Office of War Information	3,772,095
Office of Price Administration	2,572,000
Office of Petroleum Administration	2,572,000
Federal Security Agency	2,043,988
Department of Commerce	2,003,212
Department of Labor	1,440,641
Navy Department	704,000
Veterans' Administration	660,571
Tennessee Valley Authority	245,000

My distinguished colleague, Representative RICHARD B. WIGGLESWORTH, of Massachusetts, long has been a crusader on the Appropriations Committee against excessive public relations expenditures within the Federal establishment. He expressed astonishment at these 1946 tabulations.

"In my opinion," he said, "the enormous governmental propaganda set-up is not only a gross waste of the people's money, but, over and beyond that, makes for the destruction of the proper exercise of the legislative functions of the Government."

When we asked the Bureau of the Budget in November 1947 to make a complete factual tabulation of all publicity and propaganda expenditures in all the Federal departments and agencies for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1947, we were informed that such a compilation would require at least 3 months and would cost approximately $150,000. Rather than insist upon that heavy expenditure, we decided to make out as best we could with the 1946 figures. The exact total of public information expenditures reported for that year was $74,829,467. An earlier study, covering the fiscal year 1941, showed total publicity expenditures aggregating only $28,000,000. I cite these comparative figures here because it is the contention of our subcommittee that the people are entitled at least to know how much they are spending to educate themselves to more spending.

Some 45,000 Federal employees devote their time, wholly or in part, to these definitely identified information activities. I use the term "definitely identified" advisedly, for we can be sure that many other officials and employees, as well as funds from other sources, contribute directly or indirectly to the volume of Federal publicity and propaganda. What the total cost in money and manpower may be we can only guess. However, we do know that it is tremendous.

Yet the tangible cost, large as it is, should be the least of our concern. Our real worry should be the direct violence which this phase of bureaucracy does to the very philosophy of our Constitution; the insidious threat it poses for our free institutions.

BUREAU CREED: SELF-PRESERVATION AND EXPANSION

The first instinct of bureaucracy is self-preservation. The second is expansion.

Like any living organism, an administrative agency, once launched, seeks constantly to justify its existence—to perpetuate itself and to expand. In the salubrious climate of government paternalism which has prevailed in Washington since 1933, bureaucracy has luxuriated into a tropical jungle. It has grown to the alarming extent that it touches and shadows the daily life and daily thinking of every citizen.

Now that we have a majority in Congress determined not merely to halt this bureaucratic growth, but to clear away the propaganda jungle which enmeshes us, the American people begin to see the true nature of big government.

Let me make it clear, as I have stated so often in our committee hearings, that I have no objection to the liegitimate publicity functions of Federal agencies. In fact, it is a duty of free government to keep the people fully and accurately informed. Administrative officials at policy making levels should be entirely free to express and discuss policy on any issue. But beyond the routine duty of releasing such expressions to the regular news channels of press and radio, no agency may properly go. The information services of administrative agencies may not lawfully use public funds to sell ideas, to influence legislation, or to mold public opinion on any legislative issue. Federal officials and employees may not lawfully devote time and talents paid for from public funds to mold public thinking.

The sole legal and ethical function of a Federal information service is to issue factual, objective, and studiously unbiased information. Specific safeguard against the abuse of that function is provided in section 201, title 18 of the United States Code. Unfortunately, however, the law has been, and is being, repeatedly violated by numerous administrative agencies. In hundreds of ways, some devious, some blatant, Federal agencies—their officials and employees—are ignoring or flouting this legal safeguard, often for the deliberate purpose of fostering sentiment and support for administration policy or viewpoint.

No Member of Congress, no responsible administrative officer, no thoughtful individual anywhere, doubts the wisdom of this specific prohibition against Federal propaganda. It should be unnecessary to argue that the citizen and taxpayer may not be forced by the Federal agencies to pay for publicity and propaganda designed to influence and direct his own thinking.

One can justify Government propaganda only if one belongs to that school of thought dominant in Washington in recent years, that Government must guide and direct the average American in everything because he is incapable of thinking and acting wisely or safely for himself. No one should so thoroughly approve the policy being advanced by the propaganda of a particular Federal agency, that he falls into the fatal error of believing the end justifies the means.

Actually, the merits of the immediate issue in any case should not influence our reaction. We need only remember that if the power of Federal propaganda is applied for a good and wise purpose on one occasion, it can be applied on another for a purpose mischievous and dangerous.

And whether the immediate purpose of Government propaganda is good or bad, the fact remains that individual liberty and free institutions cannot long survive when the vast power of Government can be marshaled against the people to perpetuate a given policy or a particular group of officeholders. Nor can freedom survive if all Government policies and programs are sustained by overwhelming Government propaganda.

LINING UP THE FARMERS

On the home front, the Department of Agriculture is by far the most prolific vendor of official propaganda. In that Department, our committee investigators found 525 persons engaged in public relations work. Salaries ranged from $10,000 down to $1,888 a year. But only 204 members of this robust information staff were in Washington. The rest were found in Department of Agriculture branch offices in Boston, San Francisco, Milwaukee, Raleigh, Dallas, Denver, Albuquerque, Philadelphia, Ogden, Chicago, Atlanta; Juneau, Alaska; San Juan, Puerto Rico—and eight lesser cities throughout the States and Territories.

Total budget estimates for Agriculture's Office of Information for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1947, were $2,307,000, an increase of $335,350 over the previous year. But this does not include printing or mailing expenses.

Every known medium of intelligence is utilized by Agriculture. The Office of Information prepared 1,998 press releases in the 9 months ended April 1—an average of 11 every working day. During the same months, the office prepared 837 radio scripts, including several network programs. The radio time contributed for these programs normally has a commercial value of more than $500,000 a year. The same 9 months saw 17 new motion picture films released through the Department's film stations.

For the 1947 fiscal year, Agriculture's combined printing bill—all bureaus, divisions and offices—was $2,260,784, exclusive of mimeographing processed within the Department.

Before leaving the Department of Agriculture, it may be worth while to trace out the detail of the propaganda method employed in one State to generate pressure on Congress to increase appropriations for the fiscal year 1948, after certain reductions had been voted in the Department's estimates as submitted to the House. Our field investigators in Nebraska gathered letters from the federally-sponsored county crop control organizations in 25 different counties.

While these inciting letters were not identical, each of them did contain sentences or phrases which were based on a master telegram sent to all State agents of the AAA from Washington on the day the House reduced the appropriations.

The obvious purpose of this high-pressure campaign was to compel the Senate to restore some of the economies demanded by the House—an organized attempt by the Department of Agriculture, on a Nation-wide scale, to influence the course of legislation which was at that moment before Congress.

All Members of Congress are aware of the subtle and devious methods used by departments and agencies to exert pressure on Members to influence votes on pending legislation. It is the opinion of our committee that it is most reprehensible when full-time employees of a Federal agency attempt to use citizen groups to propagandize for certain legislation.

The potentialities of the improper and illegal campaign by the Department of Agriculture can best be realized by considering the agency's size and scope. There are 3,029 county agricultural associations in the United States having county officers. There are a total of 9,087 county committeemen. There are 97,529 community committeemen, and the office personnel for these officers, in addition to the committeemen, total 8,378 man-years. For personnel a total of $19,536,824 is provided annually. Provision for travel and other expenses brings this total to $23,760,650 per year.

The responsibility for the correction of the improper and illegal use of Government funds in the Production and Marketing Administration lies directly with the Department of Agriculture. Although our committee first called these violations to the attention of the Department of Agriculture in June 1947, our best information indicates that no disciplinary action of any kind has been taken against the officials involved, and that no real steps have been taken to guard against a recurrence of such abuses in the future.

FOR UMT

Another segment of our inquiry was directed to the activities of the military services in behalf of universal military training, and that subject has been covered formally in a special interim report to the House.

I shall quote some paragraphs from that report, but before doing so, I should like to emphasize that our inquiry was not into the merits of universal military training as a peacetime policy. Our inquiry was limited strictly and sharply to the question whether the military services were diverting part of their appropriations unlawfully to generating public opinion pressures upon Congress to force enactment of a specific piece of legislation.

One of the civilians employed by the War Department in this campaign was Alan Coutts, of New York City. Mr. Coutts toured the country at the taxpayers' expense, conducting radio panels and speaking to groups wherever and whenever they could be assembled. The radio panels were top-heavy with persons selected to speak for universal military training. Material supporting the legislation was prepared at the War Department by Mr. Coutts, for distribution to participants in the radio discussions. Evidence before the committee reveals that, on March 5, 1947, over Station WIP, in Philadelphia, Pa., Mr. Coutts asked that the listening audience write to the radio station, adding that the letters received would be forwarded to proper congressional authorities.

Here was a clear case of one department diverting public funds for propaganda purposes, aimed specifically at influencing the ultimate decision of Congress on a measure in which that particular department was vitally interested.

This radio speaker was paid $25-a-day salary, plus travel expenses and $6 per day for subsistence, or at the rate of approximately $10,000 a year, to go about the country beating the radio tom-toms constantly for universal military training.

It is not the contention of our subcommittee, of course, that the War Department has not the right to state the case for its program, whatever that program may be—whether rivers and harbors, universal military training, chemical warfare, or whatever. But we do insist that the Army is authorized by law only to present its case to the appropriate committees of the House and Senate. It has no authority to divert part of its appropriations to propaganda to bring pressure to bear on Congress.

There were other instances of such employment in the War Department of persons engaged exclusively in the work of generating pressure on Congress for enactment of universal military training.

Our committee report on this phase of the inquiry concluded that Government propaganda almost uniformly is designed to make the individual feel that he is thinking for himself. On this point, our report carried this observation:

"In reality, Government propaganda distorts facts with such authority that the person becomes prejudiced or biased in the direction which the Government propagandists wish to lead national thinking."

Our investigation established that the Army used not only these paid speakers and paid radio debaters to build up a demand on Congress for universal military training, but also that a special motion picture was made for free release to any theater which would show it. This film cost about $36,000 to produce, and an additional $14,000 was spent to distribute it throughout the country.

The Army likewise used military airplanes to carry several hundred influential civilians to and from Fort Knox, Ky., to view the experimental training project there, which was to serve as the pattern for universal military training.

Our committee investigators also discovered a section within the War Department, known as the Women's Interest Unit. This unit prepares bulletins and publications to be forwarded to women's organizations and individuals throughout the United States. There was presented to the committee the mailing list of the unit, which contained more than 3,000 names and addresses of the leaders in women's activities in every section of the United States. Much of the material prepared and distributed by the unit was exhibited to the committee for examination. It was of interest to the committee to find that universal military training and the proposed legislation was high on the agenda of subjects for discussion in the bulletins.

One of the bulletins prepared in October of 1946 was a mimeographed sheet of a club program titled "A Plan for Universal Military Training (based on booklet distributed by Public Relations Division)." A part of that pamphlet contained the following language:

"It is hoped that each club will devote at least one meeting to explanation and discussion of the present plan. Your legislative committee can be asked for a report on the bill for universal military training, which died with the Seventy-ninth Congress."

On the basis of extensive hearings over a period of 3 months, our subcommittee submitted House Report 1073 on July 24, 1947. That report ended on this note:

"Your committee therefore reports its firm conclusion that on the basis of the evidence at hand, the War Department, its personnel and civilian employees, have gone far beyond the limits of their proper duty of providing factual information to the people and the Congress and have engaged in propaganda supported by taxpayers' money to influence legislation now pending before the Congress."

This report was approved unanimously by the 25 members of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, including the 10 Democratic members. Thereafter a copy was transmitted to Attorney General Tom C. Clark, with the suggestion that the Department of Justice take appropriate action to end the illegal propaganda activities of the War Department. The UMT campaign of the War Department since has been modified in some important respects, and the committee has received assurance from Secretary Royall that all future activities will be held within the law and the authority granted in the appropriations bills.

SELLING COMPULSORY MEDICINE

One important segment of the Federal Government's intensive propaganda activity has to do with the world-wide campaign for socialized medicine, through compulsory national health insurance along the lines of the Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill. This inquiry has been perhaps the most significant and revealing phase of our subcommittee's work to date.

It is an historical fact that wherever some form of dictatorship prevails in government, there we also find some manifestation of socialized medicine. The brand of dictatorship makes no difference—communism, fascism, nazism, socialism—all are alike, in that they enforce a system of State medicine, or political medicine, as I prefer to call it.

Whatever the name of the dictatorship, or whatever the pattern of the particular brand of collectivism in a given country, the system of socialized medicine is always pretty much the same. It is based on compulsion, and is generally administered by a nationwide system of ward and precinct politics.

If the medical profession and all our hospitals can be taken over by the Federal Government and forged into a new and gigantic health bureaucracy, then it would only be a question of time until Washington likewise moved into the field of education, religion, the press, the radio.

Freedom soon would be in total eclipse.

That must not come to pass in mighty America, the last great citadel of freedom and liberty on the face of the globe today.

Ours is a great responsibility to hold aloft the bright torch of freedom and honest representative government. And it has been most encouraging to know that we have the great body of the American medical profession standing behind us in this effort in Congress.

More than six solid weeks of our investigation have been devoted exclusively to the so-called health workshops set up throughout the country under the aegis of the United States Public Health Service, the Social Security Board, the Children's Bureau and several other agencies having an oar in the administration of health and welfare programs.

The amazing ramifications of the Federal propaganda in behalf of socialized medicine have astonished me. How much of our total appropriations for health and welfare are being diverted to this sort of high pressure propaganda, we do not yet know. But we do know that the amount is considerable. And before our inquiries are concluded, we shall hope to present for public consideration an itemized account of the total diversion of Federal funds for this propaganda campaign. In that accounting, we shall include a considerable item for foreign travel to New Zealand, England, South America, and Japan. For we now know that our health bureaucrats are interested in socialized medicine not only in the United States but in every other land in which they can find an opening.

We now know that the Social Security Board has been spending about $2,000,000 a year in public relations activities—regardless of whether we call it publicity or propaganda. We do not yet know the full scope of this work. But we do know that they have been setting up these so-called health work shops; that they were launched on a Nation-wide scale; that they are financed entirely by Federal funds diverted from the regular appropriations, and that it was never at any time the intention of Congress or its Appropriations Committees to authorize the expenditure of public funds for such activities.

To our committee it seemed reasonable to ask why these agencies should be permitted to spend public money to generate an entirely artificial public demand for a system of socialized medicine in the United States, when all our experience through public-opinion polls, and all our contacts with the medical profession, indicate beyond question that the American people and the American medical profession insist upon maintenance of our traditional system of free-enterprise medicine, under which we have attained the highest standards of service and scientific skill and proficiency ever recorded in the history of the world.

It seems to our committee to be a proper function of the Congress to determine whether the diversion of public funds from legitimate purposes to purely propaganda purposes for socialized medicine, does not, in fact, constitute a criminal violation of the law.

And on this point, I may say that the Federal Bureau of Investigation is giving that question some serious study at the moment. We advised the Attorney General, Mr. Clark, what we discovered about the Health Work Shops, and we have since been informed that some of the vouchers are in the hands of the FBI for investigation.

All this federally financed activity for socialized medicine heads up in the Bureau of Research and Statistics in the Social Security Board. Our committee investigators have found in that bureau a veritable nerve center of socialized-medicine propaganda for the entire world.

Mr. Isadore S. Falk is the director of research and statistics in the Social Security Board. He has been in the Government service for some 12 years. He has always been noted for his militant and aggressive advocacy of socialized medicine.

Our committee, of course, does not challenge the right of any citizen to hold whatever views he may wish on any subject of political or economic policy. But we are interested that funds appropriated by Congress for public administration shall not be diverted to a world-wide system of propaganda calculated to advance socialized medicine the world around.

Such operations, until specifically approved by the Congress, are positively illegal. And our committee will not rest until they are uprooted and stamped out of the Federal picture.

Any group of citizens has a right to agitate for socialized medicine if it puts up its own money and pays its own bills. But I, for one, do not intend to see this gigantic propaganda machine for socialized medicine financed entirely by funds secretly diverted from moneys appropriated by Congress for the legitimate functions of government.

In our hearings to date we have examined officers of the United States Public Health Service, the Children's Bureau (which is another section of the Federal Security Administration), the Social Security Board, and the Farmers Home Administration, a section of the Department of Agriculture. As a part of this investigation, we also called upon the General Accounting Office for certain travel vouchers in connection with the Health Work Shops.

We found that the first meeting on the Health Work Shops was held in Washington on November 2, 1945. It was attended by only 12 persons—10 of whom were full-time employees of the Public Health Service, the Social Security Board, and the Department of Agriculture.

This is where the Health Work Shops were born. The chairman of that meeting was Dr. George Perrott of the United States Public Health Service.

The detailed operations of the Health Work Shops are set forth in House Report No. 786 of the Eightieth Congress, as published by our subcommittee on July 2, 1947.

Suffice it to say here, that the project was financed almost entirely by Federal funds, through the contributions of the participating Government agencies—through the assignment of the so-called forum experts from the Government bureaus, through the payment of travel expenses, and the providing of literature and mimeographed material for the meetings.

The real purpose of these meetings was to generate pressure upon Congress for passage of the Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill.

"Otherwise we should get out"

At one point in our hearing, our committee counsel, Mr. Frank T. Bow, asked the witness, Dr. Herman Hilleboe, of the Public Health Service, if the literature presented by the Government agencies presented all sides of the medical discussion, or merely the side supporting socialized medicine as embodied in the Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill. To this question, Dr. Hilleboe answered: "We would naturally give emphasis to that, because that is why we are in Government. Otherwise we should get out of Government."

Here, indeed, is a strange concept of Federal service in Public Health—the concept that any physician who is not a vigorous advocate of socialized medicine should remove himself from the Goverment service.

And that conception of the public service appears the more distorted when we realize that at no time has Congress approved any declaration of policy favoring the expansion and development of socialized medicine at Federal expense; nor has Congress authorized the expenditure of public funds for any sort of propaganda work calculated to generate public opinion in behalf of socialized medicine as a national policy. Yet here is a responsible official of the Public Health Service testifying before our investigating committee to the effect that the presentation of material supporting socialized medicine is a clear and direct moral obligation of the Public Health staff.

Such a distorted conception of the public service in Washington must be uprooted by Congress.

"I don't know what you mean by both sides"

On another occasion we had as a witness before the committee Mr. Harry J. Becker, health consultant in the Children's Bureau. When asked if his public speeches throughout the country presented both sides of the discussion touching compulsory national health insurance, this witness answered:

"I don't know what you mean by both sides."

Those two bits of testimony, to my mind, offer a pretty complete picture of the present set-up in Washington as it relates to Government propaganda supporting socialized medicine. From the Public Health Service came the suggestion that doctors who do not believe in the Wagner-Murray-Dingell bills simply have no place in government, and from the Children's Bureau came the response that the witness was either unaware of the opposing viewpoint, or had so firmly closed his mind against opposition arguments that they could merit no time or attention in his public speeches.

From these incidents it seems reasonable to conclude that some of our bureaus in Washington regard themselves as the protectors and defenders of the whole concept of compulsory national health insurance and socialized medicine.

But, again, I want to repeat—that is not what Congress appropriated the money for.

The extraordinary executive pressure exerted upon the staff of the United States Public Health Service to further the campaign for socialized medicine is indicated by a letter sent under date of December 10, 1945, by Thomas Parran, Surgeon General of the United States Public Health Service, to all field men and staff operatives throughout the country. This letter referred to the message sent to Congress on November 19, 1945, by President Truman, urging enactment of a national health program. The Surgeon General's letter referred to the President's message as "a subject of the highest importance to every citizen." His letter continues (transcript of hearing, May 28, 1947, p. 88):

"The appropriate executive agencies of the Government have been specifically instructed by the President to assist in carrying out this legislative program as presented to Congress on September 6, 1945."

The Surgeon General then listed the several health bills pending before Congress, continuing:

"Every officer of the Public Health Service will wish to familiarize himself with the President's message and will be guided by its provisions when making any public statement likely to be interpreted as representing the official views of the Public Health Service."

Pursuant to this policy, the Public Health Service launched its national program of Health Workshops.

Following the Washington conference of November 2, 1945, a broader planning conference was arranged at the University of Chicago, November 26–27, 1945. At this meeting 20 persons were present, 9 of whom were full-time employees of the Federal Government. The 11 nongovernment persons in this meeting were representatives of the CIO, A. F. of L., and the Farmers Union.

Next the planning committee met in Washington, D. C., on December 10, 1945, to evaluate the Chicago meeting and plan for the health workshops. The first health workshop was held in St. Paul, Minn., February 6–10, 1946, with 80 persons participating, 15 of whom were Government employees, representing 7 different agencies in the Federal establishment.

The second health workshop was held in Jamestown, N. Dak., September 27–30, 1946, with 98 persons participating, 18 of whom were Federal employees, representing 7 Federal agencies. The chairman of this meeting was Dr. Mayhew Derryberry, Ph. D., of the United States Public Health Service. Apart from Federal personnel, there were no doctors of medicine in attendance at this meeting as delegates. The testimony before our committee indicates that no registered doctor of medicine was invited to participate.

All the evidence indicates that these health workshops were planned, conducted, and largely financed with Federal funds, by a key group on the Government pay roll, who used the workshop method of discussion subtly to generate public sentiment in behalf of socialized medicine. It is evident from the record that most of the planning was done by the Federal officials in Washington prior to each workshop conference and that each meeting was devoted to their own purposes—that of organizing pressure groups to agitate for compulsory health insurance, as then pending in Congress.

In preparation for the Jamestown Health Workshop, the Public Health Service distributed in advance to all invited delegates a packet of pamphlets published by the CIO, A. F. of L., the Physicians' Forum (propaganda agency for the Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill), and the Government bureaus, in support of socialized medicine. These packets were mailed to the delegates in advance of the conference, at Federal expense. They urged that letters be written to Senators and Representatives, advocating immediate action on the Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill.

After the propaganda packets had been delivered, well in advance to the invited delegates, the Jamestown Health Workshop assembled on September 27, 1946.

The committee received a detailed account of this health workshop from Mr. E. F. Engebretson, executive secretary of the North Dakota State Medical Association, who attended as an uninvited observer. On June 18, 1947, Mr. Engebretson testified:

"The meeting began on Friday, September 27. Friday was spent in its entirety in a so-called training program. The sponsoring organizations had invited various Federal and State officials to attend the conference as so-called consultants. Twenty-one of these consultants were in attendance, of which 19 were Federal employees and 2 were employees of the State of North Dakota.

"The training session the first day was not open to the general membership of the Farmers Union or other groups sponsoring the program. Rather, a hand-picked group of leaders from the various local societies were brought in for the purpose of being trained in workshop procedure. This training program was handled entirely by the employees of the Federal Government. In charge of the program, in a general way, was Dr. Mayhew Derryberry, Chief of the Office of Health Education, United States Public Health Service. In charge of the training instructions was a Dr. Hubert Stanley Coffey, Chief of Training, Federal Security Agency. The hand-picked group from the local societies were designated as delegates, and in training them, they were seated around a conference table with the 21 consultants lined up behind them."

After the training program, the indoctrinated delegates were given 30-minute tests to measure their leadership ability by setting forth the immediate health needs of North Dakota. At this point, Witness Engebretson testified:

"It was very interesting to note that when left to themselves, the delegates seemed unable to think of any particular health problems in the State."

We then obtained from the Federal Security Agency a full copy of the instruction sheets used by the training officers at these health workshops. Among the topics listed are: Techniques for the organization of citizen groups. Formation of pressure groups. Methods of bringing about group action.

Testimony demonstrating the efficacy of this indoctrination of delegates by the Federal officials was found in the formal summary of the Jamestown Workshop, as presented by the United States Public Health Service.

One section of the action program, approved by the conference, urged that congressional candidates and incumbents be polled by the committee, on their stand on the national health program, and that their opinions be sent to the State organizations for publication.

This recital presents the complete picture of Government propaganda in action. The Federal employees arrange the meetings, invite the delegates, train the delegates, preside at the meeting, and then frame the formal summary of resolutions and actions.

And all of this is paid for with public moneys never authorized or approved by Congress for these or any like purposes.

Testimony before the committee indicates also that the staff and resources of the Bureau of Research Statistics in the Social Security Board were devoted freely, from time to time, to the preparation of pamphlets and propaganda literature for the CIO, the AFL, and the Physicians' Forum. Much of this material prepared for the CIO and other groups, by the Social Security Board at Government expense, supported socialized medicine in every approach and dismissed contemptuously all arguments controverting the fixed position of the Social Security Board. Our committee concluded from the testimony that most, if not all, of this literature, as distributed by the CIO, the AFL, the Farmers Union, and the Physicians' Forum originated in, and emanated from, the Bureau of Research and Statistics in the Social Security Board. Miss Margaret Klem, Chief of the Medical Economics Section of the Social Security Board, was one of the group of Federal employees who charted, arranged, and conducted the Jamestown Health Workshop. The testimony discloses also that she helped draft the Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill.

At a later date, our committee will submit a detailed report on the activities of the Social Security Board during the last 10 years in behalf of socialized medicine.

Other evidence before the committee reveals that the Bureau of Research Statistics of the Social Security Board also prepared pamphlets and propaganda material to be distributed under the imprint of the CIO. Similar pamphlets were prepared in the same office for distribution, as Government literature through the Department of Agriculture's Interbureau Committee on Postwar Programs. All this material, as presented in our hearings, is similar in tone, content, and objective. It all originates in one spot, in the Social Security Board. It is all paid for, save the actual printing, by a process which our committee deems an improper use of Federal appropriations.

Samples of all these pamphlets and propaganda leaflets are available in the committee's files for examination by the public. Photostatic copies of some of them have been transmitted to the Attorney General, with our request for action in defense of the American taxpayers, who are paying the bill.

The Children's Bureau, Federal Security Agency, was represented in the health workshops movement by Mr. Harry J. Becker, a full-time employee of the Federal Security Agency, in the capacity of health consultant. Mr. Becker, while engaged in his Federal position, also was one of the principal organizers of the Group Health Association of Washington, D. C., of which he later became president. He is also vice president of Cooperative Health Federation of America, which he helped organize in meetings at Two Harbors, Minn., and Columbus, Ohio, while on the full-time pay roll of the Children's Bureau.

Mr. Becker was a witness before our committee on June 18, 1947. His testimony delineates in some detail the historical development of the movement within the Federal Government to set up, at Federal expense, a Nation-wide campaign in support of the pending legislation.

The committee invites particular attention to the testimony and cross-examination of Mr. Becker, because we feel that the devices and arrangements of Federal employment in this instance provide a typical example of how funds appropriated by Congress for the legitimate expenses of Federal agencies are diverted within the bureaus to full-time propaganda for socialized medicine.

Not only are men and women paid substantial salaries in their Federal positions for their full-time activities in other fields, but in many instances traveling expenses and incidental costs of these pressure-group meetings are paid out of funds of the same Federal agencies.

The committee has, for example, a report from the General Accounting Office, showing that various Federal agencies paid out a total of $1,950 in traveling expenses of Federal employees to and from the Jamestown Health Workshop. This conference took 18 Federal officials away from their desks for a total of 126 man-days.

Another report from the General Accounting Office shows that the Federal Government paid almost $5,000 in traveling expenses of Federal employees for the series of five health workshop conferences and planning meetings held throughout the country before our investigation begun.

Health mission to Tokyo

Plowing deep into these matters, our investigators soon came upon the much-discussed health mission to Tokyo. It, too, is revealing for the light it throws on the operations of the Washington inner circle which is forever pulling the wires for socialized medicine.

In our examination of the Bureau of Research and Statistics in the Social Security Board, we discovered that practically every argument, every pamphlet, every radio broadcast, and every statistical table advocating socialized medicine originated primarily in the Social Security Board. Here is the world-wide nerve center of the movement for socialized medicine. In several of the pamphlets, no matter by whom distributed, the language and the figures were the same. The material is then distributed for popular consumption by whatever organization will lend its official imprint to arguments and briefs of the Social Security Board. That's the basic set-up discovered by our committee, and that's the beginning of the health mission to Tokyo.

In August 1946 a Federal civilian employee from Washington (one Stanchfield) who had been detached temporarily from his job in Washington, moved from Korea to Japan to make a preliminary survey of social security and health needs. Upon his return to Washington early in 1947, Mr. Stanchfield proposed a general health mission to Tokyo. His proposal was presented directly to Mr. Arthur J. Altmeyer, Commissioner of Social Security, not to the War Department.

Next, on March 5, 1947, Mr. Altmeyer outlined the mission in a formal communication to the War Department. In that letter, Mr. Altmeyer designated the particular individuals who should make up the mission, and then went further to suggest that William H. Wandel, Chief of the Program Division, Bureau of Unemployment Security, be appointed Chief of the Social Insurance Division of the Public Health and Welfare Section of the Supreme Command for the Allied Powers in Tokyo. It is perfectly apparent from the letters we have taken from the War Department files that the personnel of this mission and the planning of its program originated in and was dictated from the Social Security Board in Washington.

Next, we found a letter, under date of June 14, 1947, from Mr. Wandel in Tokyo reporting directly to Mr. Falk in Washington on the progress of the work in Tokyo. In one revealing passage of this letter, Mr. Wandel said:

"We think that our need is for someone who is primarily not so much an economic analyst as one versed in health insurance. Health insurance is the major field of social security in Japan. * * * Permanent revision requires amalgamating national health insurance with health insurance on a compulsory basis."

When the Tokyo Health Mission finally was named, it comprised two men from the Public Health Service, one from Mr. Falk's bureau, and one from the Federal Housing Authority. This mission departed for Japan on August 28, 1947, with the understanding that Mr. Altmeyer and possibly Mr. Falk would follow when the work had been sufficiently organized in Tokyo.

One of the members selected for the Tokyo Mission was Dr. B. M. Davis, who is the son of Mr. Michael M. Davis, chairman of the executive committee of the Committee for the Nation's Health. This Committee for the Nation's Health is perhaps the most conspicuous lay organization agitating for socialized medicine in the United States. The father, Mr. Michael M. Davis, long has been a coworker with Messrs. Altmeyer and Falk in the national and international agitation for socialized medicine.

It is significant, also, that the son, Dr. B. M. Davis, was, at the time of his selection for the Tokyo Mission, on duty in England, temporarily detached from his Government job in Washington, to assist in perfecting legislation in England for the complete socialization of all hospital and medical care in that country.

We thus find Dr. Davis barely finishing his assignment in England in time to catch the Tokyo assignment—all at the expense of the American taxpayers.

It is true that Dr. Davis is a member of the staff of the United States Public Health Service. He is a full-time Government employee of the United States, but the record shows that during the past 18 months his principal duty has been in perfecting medical legislation in other nations—first in England and next as a member of the mission to Tokyo. After a brief stay in Tokyo, he returned to England to assist on the final phases of the British program in Parliament.

Because this instance offers a shocking demonstration of bureaucratic intrigue in violation of the purposes and intent of Congress, I brought the matter to the attention of the House Appropriations Committee, with the suggestion that when the next budget comes up from the Social Security Board and the Public Health Service, funds for all those engaged in spreading socialized medicine around the world be stricken from the appropriations bill unless, of course, Congress shall determine to support such world propaganda with funds specifically allocated for that purpose.

In my letter to Chairman JOHN TABER, of the Appropriations Committee, I made eight specific charges against the Tokyo Health Mission. I wish to summarize them here, because they are the nub of our case against the Social Security Board and the United States Public Health Service in relation to all this propaganda supporting socialized medicine.

My charges against the Tokyo Health Mission are as follows:

1. That the health mission to Japan was composed entirely and exclusively of men long identified in the public record as advocates and proponents of socialized medicine not only in the United States but throughout the world.

2. That the real purpose of this mission is to lay the groundwork for a system of socialized medicine in Japan.

3. That the scheme for such a mission originated in the Division of Research and Statistics in the Social Security Board in Washington, and nowhere else.

4. That the nominal request for the mission was engineered through the General Headquarters of the Supreme Commander in Tokyo by Federal employees sent from Washington for that particular purpose.

5. That Gen. Douglas MacArthur does not favor—and does not approve—any plan to establish compulsory socialized medicine in Japan.

6. That the dispatch of this mission to Tokyo for the purpose indicated in Mr. Wandel's letter to Mr. Falk under date of June 14, 1947, is a gross misuse of public funds.

7. That the real purpose of the mission was not to assist Japan in working out her basic problems in health and welfare, but to force upon that country a compulsory system of socialized medicine.

8. That although the questions here involved are of a health and medical nature, the Surgeon General of the United States Army was not consulted in reference to the problems involved.

It is a matter of public knowledge that the Health Mission to Tokyo has now returned to the United States. They came back, be it noted, before Messrs. Altmeyer or Falk could join them in Japan.

We are assured from certain events in the public record, that our subcommittee's letter to the House Appropriations Committee, under date of September 9, 1947, had a decisive influence upon the course and actions of the Tokyo Health Mission. Once the full light of public inquiry and understanding had been focused upon the mission, it soon became a different sort of thing.

We are advised that General MacArthur has not acted on the recommendations submitted by this mission, but has referred them to the American Medical Association in Chicago for consideration and advice.

I wish that I were free to reveal at this time the details of the communications that passed between myself and General MacArthur on this transaction. I cannot properly do so, however, until the final report of our subcommittee. Suffice it to say here that General MacArthur refused to act on any of the Mission's recommendations until they had been weighed and evaluated by the American Medical Association.

I deem it inappropriate for Federal employees, at the expense of the American taxpayer, to travel throughout the world preparing or assisting in the preparation of legislation to be adopted by foreign countries when similar legislation, long pending, has not been approved by the Congress of the United States.

But the issue is far broader than the question of socialized medicine. The record now reveals for public examination the manner in which Government lobbyists operate on the Federal pay roll, how they are always at work to expand their fields of interest, to perpetuate themselves in office, and to impose their ideas and systems upon the American people by organized propaganda paid for entirely by the diversion of public funds from their true purposes to the secret purposes of the top bureaucrats and planners.

This is the fundamental issue from the legislative standpoint—the question whether the Congress of the United States has lost its power to establish and maintain the sort of Government the people want; or whether the bureaucrats are supreme and can give the sort of Government they want, regardless of Congress, regardless of elections, regardless of public opinion.

That's a question that goes to the very roots of popular government. If the bureaucrats are above Congress, and may defy Congress in the way they spend their appropriations, then representative government has become a fiction.

I am certain that the United States has not yet reached the point where it must be submissive to the dictates of a rampant bureaucracy in Washington.

ELECTIONEERING FOR PUBLIC HOUSING

Another phase of our subcommittee's inquiry reached to the Federal Public Housing Authority in California, where the regional managers were charged, in the San Diego area, with using public funds for partisan political activities.

Several days before the 1946 election, political posters appeared in prominent places throughout every housing project in the San Diego area, particularly at bus stops and in front of the project management offices. These posters were captioned "Save your home" and contained alleged statements of certain candidates which were unfavorable to the public housing groups. These statements were made as direct quotations, but our field investigation proved the quotations were inaccurate.

All housing tenants have the first 5 days of each month to pay their rent, and approximately 78 percent of the tenants pay on the fifth day, which in 1946 was the day before the general election. Signs were placed prominently around the management offices, with the obvious intent to impress tenants when paying their rents. Such posters were not only improper Government propaganda, but a violation of the civil service regulations which prohibit political activities by Federal employees.

Much of the publicity and propaganda relating to the Public Housing Authority emanates from an organization known as the National Association of Housing Officials, and the National Public Housing Conference. This association has been very active throughout the country and most of the officials and employees of the Public Housing Authority are also members of the association. This organization also has been used for propaganda purposes in support of the Taft-Ellender-Wagner national housing bill. Federal employees have also used the association to foster and promote State legislation, the purpose of which is to carry on in the public-housing field after the Federal Government has ceased to function in that activity at the conclusion of wartime emergency.

We are continuing our investigation as it relates to publicity and propaganda within the Public Housing Administration, and shall submit a detailed report to Congress in the near future on this special aspect of Federal propaganda.

Such is the challenge of entrenched bureaucracy, once it adopts the techniques of overwhelming Government propaganda to guide the thinking of the citizen-subjects. Historically, the processes of Government propaganda are the devices of dictatorships. Our investigations have demonstrated, I feel, that as the various agencies perfect their propaganda methods, they move inexorably toward the patterns and forms of imperious dictatorship. That's why Government-made opinion, or Federal thought control, is essentially un-American, and a threat to balanced constitutional government.

Have We Learned Our German Lesson?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE G. SADOWSKI
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. SADOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include an article written by Dr. Jean Pajus.

Dr. Pajus served as an advisor to the Board of Economic Warfare and Foreign Economic Administration on economic warfare against the Axis during World War II. At the conclusion of the hostilities he went over to Germany as an advisor to the United States Treasury Mission. While there he served as an advisor on cartels to the Economic Division of OMGUS in Berlin.

The article follows:

HAVE WE LEARNED OUR GERMAN LESSON?—SOME FACTS WHICH RAISE THE QUESTION

(By Jean Pajus)

There was a time when we were sure we had learned our lesson about Germany. The time was 3 years ago. We had acquired all the experience any period in history could offer. We knew there was something decidedly rotten in Germany which must be eradicated once and for all.

Germany has been under Allied control for 3 years, and it seems as if all the lessons we have learned went for naught. Who is to blame for it? The people? The Government? The occupation authorities? All three, to be sure, but one cannot escape the conclusion that perhaps the people are less to blame for the rot that remains in Germany because they believed—and rightly so—that the allies meant what they said 3 years ago.

After the First World War, we destroyed military establishments and appointed a military commission to see to it that Germany remain disarmed. But we completely overlooked Germany's ability to utilize her industrial potential not only as a springboard for war, but also as a means to control the economies of her neighbors. Three years ago the people were told that the mistakes made in the twenties would not be repeated, and assurances were given that our policy toward Germany would be based on the following principles:

1. Germany will be encouraged to bring to the fore her democratic forces.

2. Peace from German aggression cannot be obtained without economic measures.

3. The control of Germany's industrial potential must be based on realistic considerations having nothing to do with either the hard or the soft peace philosophies. The idea of control was derived from a recognition of the direct relations of certain types of industrial potential and economic weapons to a national war-making power. This idea was not based on revenge nor on punishment.

4. The first protection against lawlessness is to disarm the lawless person. A second and equally essential protection is to prevent those who are lawless from reacquiring the power and capacity to forge any new weapons with which they can again menace society.

5. A new method of controlling Germany's ability must be devised. It must be distinguished from the orthodox and strictly military problem of regulating Germany's armed forces or initially confiscating her finished munitions and aircraft.

6. If Germany is to live peacefully she must have an economy for peace.

7. The control of Germany's economy must be designed to continue on an indefinite basis until the nations of the world feel that the pacification of the German mind is so assured that special protective devices need no longer be maintained.

8. Germany must never again be allowed to dominate her neighbors economically through patents, know-how, withholding of techniques and machines, or by the use of cartel devices.

9. Germany's neighbors must be encouraged to develop their own industrial economy rather than depend, as was the case in the past, on Germany for their machines.

10. Germany must never again be allowed to use the commercial and trade methods practiced by her in the thirties.

11. Germany must contribute to the reconstruction of Europe.

These basic principles are still valid today. Last summer, when the 16 members of the Marshall plan met in Paris, they unanimously adopted a resolution urging that Germany be fitted into the European economy. But, mindful of the past, these 16 nations stipulated that "the German economy must not be allowed to develop to the detriment of other European countries as it was done in the past."

Echoing these sentiments, Secretary Marshall told the American people on November 17, 1947, that "We must be very careful to see that a revived Germany can never again threaten the European community." Strengthened by such assurances, the American people had good reason to believe that our policy toward Germany was on the right track. That is the reason why they accepted the idea that Germany should participate in the recovery of western Europe.

This was only natural since they firmly believe that Germany was being groomed as a democratic, denazified, and demilitarized state, and that her force of evil had been eliminated from her economic and political life. They believed it because they were publicly told so.

And how democratic is Germany today? Not much can be said about Russian occupied Germany. We know what to expect from the Soviet practice of "unifying" the democratic forces under the leadership of the Communist Party.

We know more about the "democratization" of the United States and British zones. We have seen the public polls conducted by the military authorities in both zones. These polls conclusively show that a majority of the German people do not believe in our brand of democracy and are ready to follow a new leader.

Again, it is difficult to say exactly whose fault it is—the Germans or ours. Congressman SABATH tried to show one reason for the sad state of affairs on July 26, 1947, when he revealed the name of 21 big Nazis occupying the most important public and private posts. These Germans occupied the same or similar posts of prominence during the Hitler regime. On March 2, 1948, the New York Times revealed a new list of 15 prominent Germans in bizonal affairs, and reported that behind them stood a group of Germans who were sabotaging the military government policies "by deliberate bungling, disastrous delays and incitement to disaffection." Since most of these are prominent Nazis, it is only natural that the German people cannot understand our brand of democracy.

But, if the German people are perplexed, what should the American people believe when they hear the Secretary of the Army, Kenneth C. Royall, say:

(a) "We have abolished the pernicious cartels."

(b) "We have removed from positions of influence most of the top leaders who fomented and conducted the cruel war of oppression."

(c) "We have brought the war criminals before the bar of justice."

Bear in mind that this was said in a speech on January 8, 1948, delivered before the Rotary Club of Denver, Colo. Exactly one month before that, on December 9, 1947, the World Report (now amalgamated with the United States News), made a detailed analysis of Germany's post-war economy and reported that "Little has been accomplished towards the occupation goal of breaking up the 69 trusts that once controlled the German industries." The same article also reported that a plan was already afoot to rebuild the I. G. Farben cartel, at a time when its leaders were being tried for war crimes at Nuremberg. Worse yet, last year the decartelization branch of OMGUS in Germany made a special survey of Germany's major industries in the United States zone. Speaking about the most important commodity in Europe today—coal—it had this to say about the postwar German coal cartel practices: "They do not appear to be greatly different from those performed in the final phase of the war."

And speaking of bewilderment, a few weeks ago the American press reported that General Clay had ordered a new policy on German cartels which practically dealt the death blow to our entire decartelization program. Two outstanding European cartels, the VKF ball-bearing cartel and the Henschel car cartel were specifically exempted from decartelization. A simple question arises: If, as stated by the Secretary of War on January 9, 1948, the cartels had been abolished, how was it possible 4 months later to exempt specifically certain cartels and to abolish all decartelization activities? Does it mean that in 4 months the German cartels were rebuilt?

Or take point B of Secretary Royall's speech. What prominent Germans were removed? Alfred Hugenberg, a member of the Hitler cabinet is today still chairman of the largest steel cartel in Germany—the Vereinigte Stahlwerke; Dr. Ernst Poensgen, founder of the International Steel cartel is active; Heinrich Dinkelbach, the man who paid millions to the Nazi Party chest is today in charge of the iron and steel industry in western Germany; Heinrich Kost, a former prominent Nazi, was appointed recently boss of the coal industry in Germany; Paul Reusch, the closest collaborator of Baron Von Schroeder has an important post in bizonal affairs, etc., ad nauseum. Space does not allow to list all the prominent names. The facts are that the industrial war lords and staunch Hitler supporters, who manipulated the huge industrial war potential under Hitler, are in the saddle again. In this connection, it is no coincidence that Herman Abs, one of the most influential of these war lords—Germany's most brilliant financier, not excluding Schacht and Funk—was proposed as president of the board of the new Trizonal Bank. Abs was the most powerful figure in the Deutsche Bank, the most powerful of the Nazi banks. For a long time our military authorities tried to arrest him, but the British always refused to turn him over, and saw fit to make him one of the chief financial and economic advisors, after Germany's downfall.

The people were told that the German war criminals would be brought before the bar of Justice; but of late we have been witnessing a series of not guilty or mild verdicts coming out of Nuremberg. The scuttling of this program began more than a year ago with the acquittal of Schacht. Next came the acquittal of the most prominent directors of the Krupp munitions combine on the account of conspiracy to wage aggressive war. There is serious talk in Washington about an amnesty for the I. G. Farben war criminals.

In the economic sphere, our present policy toward Germany remains the most baffling. It appears that no matter how little the Germans produce, how much they sabotage, how much black marketeering they practice, how much they vilify and discredit the occupation authorities, the Germans will continue to receive billions from the United States Treasury. Now, granted that the Germans had a bad harvest and do not have all the calories they want—neither do millions of other Europeans—the facts are that during 1947, 6,319,000 heads of cattle disappeared into the German black market; that some months ago the American Military Government authorities discovered that the Germans deliberately underestimated their grain crop by 62 percent; that 50,000 tons of Ruhr coal disappears every day in the German black market.

Germany is a member of the Marshall plan. We always thought that the Marshall plan was intended to help the recovery of western Europe plus Germany. This being the case, it is hard to believe that the Germans should demand about 40 percent of the total sum of $5,300,000,000. Mr. Sumner Welles, former Under Secretary of State, gave the figure of $2,000,000,000. It was reported that the Allied-German differences as regards Germany's request for import aid for the 12 months are not great. In fact, we are told that "because of the high figures involved, some Allied officials appeared distressed that they transpired to the public" (New York Times, March 3, 1948). On April 2, 1948, the same New York Times reported that the final figure would be flexible. Flexible or not, the fact is that Allied officials are making commitments behind the back of the people and Congress.

If Germany should get two billions, how much money would be left for the recovery of the 16-nation members of the Marshall plan? Surely the European recovery program was not intended to give Germany the lion's share. We had some misgivings about Germany's share in the Marshall plan when it was first promulgated. Last year both Secretary Royall and former Under Secretary Dean Acheson casually mentioned the fact that Germany would become the cornerstone of western Europe. It was hard to believe that this was the real intent of the Marshall plan. The 16 nations would not believe it either. But as recently as May 21, 1948, Mr. Wilkinson, who appeared before the Senate Appropriations Committee, gave notice to the 16 nations that they will have to accept the fact that Germany will become the cornerstone of Europe. The New York Times of May 22, 1948, makes it very explicit when it says: "Mr. Wilkinson told the committee that authorities in Germany would not hesitate to bring pressure to bear on Marshall plan countries through the ECA in the event that any of them failed to cooperate toward the revival of German industry."

And speaking about Germany's contribution to the recovery of western Europe, the American people today face, in the words of the Commerce Department, "the most critical industrial problem due to the lack of scrap iron." The Commerce Department reported a few months ago that Germany has at least 10,000,000 tons of available scrap, but we were recently told that the Germans cannot be forced to sell it to the United States because we have no authority to do so. Clearly, there must be something wrong in Germany when this sort of thing is allowed to exist.

A few words must be said about the reparations program. Three years ago we were told that Germany would contribute her share to the recovery of western Europe by delivering to 18 nations the surplus industrial capacity which she cannot use under her peacetime economy. In this connection, 2 years after World War I, Germany paid in reparations 8,000,000,000 marks. Three years after VE-day the 18 nation members of the Inter-Allied Reparations Agency in Brussels are still standing, hat in hand, begging for reparations in capital goods which Germany has in abundance and which she cannot use under the level of industry plan. The reparations program was recently reduced to 682 plants (only 1 percent of the available number of plants). But we are now informed that a program is afoot to do away with the reparations program entirely.

Perhaps the best way to summarize the lesson we have not learned about Germany is, to quote Mr. R. H. Estill, the American chairman of the US-UK control group dealing with Germany's production of coal, on which so much of Germany's economy depends. On May 25, 1948, he told the foreign correspondents that, "call it sabotage or what have you, the management (Mr. Kost & Co.) certainly is not making a concentrated effort to produce coal" (New York Times, May 26, 1948). Mr. Estill also accused the German management of having tricked the US and UK authorities regarding the production figures.

The sum total of it all is that we have embarked upon a policy of rewarding our enemies and punishing our friends. The result will be that we will rebuild Germany at the expense of the only friends we have in western Europe.

These are only a few instances to show what has happened to our policy toward Germany. We are told that all this is necessary because Germany must become the bastion of our western civilization—which is another way of saying that we never learn our lesson.

Wallace Party Said To Illustrate Hypnotism of Soviet Juke Box

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include an article by Sumner Welles that appeared in the New York Herald Tribune on Tuesday, August 3, 1948:

"WALLACE PARTY SAID TO ILLUSTRATE HYPNOTISM OF SOVIET JUKE BOX"—SUMNER WELLES POINTS TO THE GROWING INFLUENCE OF RUSSIAN SEMANTICS ON THE MORE SOGGY-MINDED OF THE LIBERALS AND CITES TWO EXAMPLES

(By Sumner Welles, Former Under Secretary of State)

We cannot afford to ignore the significance of the support given by many Americans to the Progressive Party in spite of their knowledge that the Communists dictated its platform and control the party machinery. It is an alarming fact that a great number of these Americans sincerely believe that peace and a free world will be secured by the adoption of policies laid down by Moscow's agents in this country.

The third party convention proved that Soviet indoctrination has had far-reaching effects in the United States.

The influence that Communist propaganda has had in the realm of semantics is notorious. The meaning of so vitally important a word as "democracy" has already been obscured. Its true meaning of "rule by the people" has been perverted by the consistent use as a term applicable to the Soviet type of dictatorship. Some Americans are confused. They daily hear from Soviet-inspired sources that the autocracy which the men in the Kremlin are imposing upon the Russian people is genuine democracy and that the freely elected governments of the West represent a form of semifascism.

A DISTINCTION LOST

As this confusion grows, the distinction between liberty and tyranny, which was once clear cut in the minds of the English-speaking peoples, is correspondingly dulled.

Outside of our largest racial minority, the results of Soviet indoctrination are chiefly to be seen among the more soggy-minded of the peace seekers, and among those groups of liberals who concentrate exclusively upon materialistic objectives. These men and women have been so influenced by the Communist line that they minimize the worth of those fundamental guaranties of human liberty established by the Bill of Rights.

Two typical cases of the hypnotism produced by the Soviet juke box have only today come to my attention.

I have read an advance copy of the book of an American professor who writes of his experiences in eastern Europe, where he was recently sent to expound our national culture to the people of a satellite country. He cites with relish the criticisms of American policy that he heard. These he evidently considered unanswerable. Among them were such threadbare examples of Communist propaganda as "Why has the United States intervened by force in Greece?" and "Why has the United States refused to oppose the Fascists in Argentina?"

OMISSIONS ARE CITED

This supposed evangelist of American democracy refrained from pointing out that the United States has not intervened by force in Greece and that without American help the Greek people could not maintain their freedom in the face of Communist aggression. He was unwilling to explain that the Argentine Government was freely elected by the Argentine people and that, while we may deplore some of that Government's domestic policies, under the democratic principles which govern inter-American relations, no American Republic can interfere in Argentina's internal concerns unless the American states jointly decide that her policies endanger hemispheric peace.

THE PARTY LINE

There is no reason to suppose that this professor is not a patriotic citizen and an honest liberal. He is probably now busily promoting civil rights in the United States. Yet to him neither the liberty of the Greeks, nor the sovereign right of the Argentine people to choose their own government seemed to involve principles whose observance is essential to a free world. His criterion was the Communist Party line.

The second case is that of a correspondent who writes that he is a member of "a group of honest citizenry in Los Angeles." He upbraids me for my disapproval of the dictatorship that has recently forced itself upon Costa Rica. He insists that the abrogation of Costa Rica's liberal and democratic constitution; government by decree; the subordination, without appeal, of life and property to the decisions of tribunals installed by the dictatorship; and the imposition of capital levies and the nationalization of banks, railroads, and utilities without any prior expression of the will of the Costa Rican people, are all measures to be applauded on the ground that "radical surgical steps are necessary to cut out cancerous sores from the body of a republic." He believes that through such measures "we can expect the creation of a more liberal social democratic constitution than even the previous one."

A "MORE LIBERAL" SYSTEM

Here is an American citizen asserting that, in a country where democratic processes and respect for individual liberties are traditional, a totalitarian dictatorship is to be welcomed as a means of securing an even "more liberal social democratic" system. The thesis is, of course, similar to that so recently proclaimed by the Communist Party in Czechoslovakia.

We have heard much of the desirability of combating communism by convincing other peoples of the superior advantages of our own democracy. When Americans, such as those I have quoted and those who support the third party, hold in such low esteem the safeguards for individual freedom upon which our institutions are founded, we have reason to wonder whether our democracy is carrying out its proper obligation of teaching its own citizens the value of those human liberties that have made of it the hope of the oppressed for more than a century and a half.

May it be perhaps that some of the enlightenment required is needed here at home?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RICHARD F. HARLESS
OF ARIZONA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. HARLESS of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, the Post Office Department recently released to the press a "complete list of new postage stamps to be issued during the remainder of 1948, together with the places and first-day sales of each." Included in that list is the special series of 3-cent stamps commemorative of the fiftieth anniversary of the organization of the Rough Riders, authorized by my House Joint Resolution 305—now Public Law 812, Eightieth Congress, chapter 710, second session. Such Rough Riders stamps will be issued on October 27, 1948, the birthday of Theodore Roosevelt, formerly colonel of the Righ Riders and thereafter the twenty-sixth President of the United States, and the place of the first-day sales will be Prescott, Ariz., the home city of its heroic mayor, Capt. William Owen "Bucky" O'Neill, who was killed in action while gallantly leading his troops at the Battle of San Juan Hill on July 1, 1898, and a picture of whose magnificent equestrian statue by the celebrated sculptor, Gutson Borglum is to be engraved upon such Rough Riders stamps. Under unanimouse consent of the House of Representatives, I am including in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an editorial entitled "The Rough Riders" from the June 21, 1948, issue of the Prescott Evening Courier, of Prescott, Yavapai County, Ariz.:

THE ROUGH RIDERS

Tribute to the Rough Riders, who will hold their fiftieth anniversary celebration in Prescott June 24 and 25, was paid in a brief address in the national House of Representatives by Congressman RICHARD HARLESS, who introduced a resolution for the issuance of a memorial Rough Rider stamp, which has been accepted by the House.

Also included in publication in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is a poem by James Patrick McGovern, a prominent attorney of Washington, D. C., who found his health in Prescott many years ago.

Congressman HARLESS' remarks follow:

"Mr. Speaker, the fiftieth anniversary of the organization of the Rough Riders—the first volunteer United States Cavalry—will be observed on the 24 and 25 of this month of June 1948, at Prescott, Ariz., the home city of the famed William Owen "Bucky" O'Neill, its mayor and captain of Troop A of that glorious regiment of the Spanish-American War, who was killed in action while gallantly leading his men at the Battle of San Juan Hill on July 1, 1898. A magnificent equestrian statute, by the celebrated sculptor, Gutzon Borglum, to the memory of that hero, stands in Court House Square, in the city of Prescott, and on January 21, 1948, I introduced in the Congress House Joint Resolution 305, authorizing the issuance of a special series of 3-cent postage stamps, commemorative of that fiftieth anniversary, and which shall bear a picture of that statue. The Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, to which such resolution was referred, reported favorably thereon May 27, 1948, without amendment, and recommended that it do pass. That joint resolution passed the House by unanimous vote on June 8, and I hope that it may be enacted into law promptly.

"James Patrick McGovern, of the District of Columbia bar, a captain in the American Expeditionary Forces during the First World War, and the special Washington correspondent of the Arizona Daily Sun, of Flagstaff, Ariz., where he lived as a youth, has written a fitting tribute, in verse, to the Rough Riders, which I now submit for publication in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and elsewhere throughout the Nation, as follows:

" 'THE ROUGH RIDERS

" 'Charge, charge of San Juan Hill, charge, charge again,
Resounds as half a century enshrines
The memory of deeds by supermen,
Whose dauntless valor swept the Spanish lines.
Roosevelt and Wood, for whom life's peak was fame,
O'Neill and Capron, for whom scorn mocked at death,
Men white and red, of every rank and name—
All thrilled with a devotion dear as breath.
True warriors they were, first volunteers.
From mountains and from plains of the broad West,
Virile, bold, and peerless pioneers,
Exploring in a new horizon's quest.
They stormed the heights of glory with white fire;
Forever shall their vibrant hearts inspire.' "

American Chief of UN Mission Proud of Poland

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE G. SADOWSKI
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. SADOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include a most interesting and remarkable letter that was written by Earl H. Bell while in Warsaw for the UN as Chief of Mission of its International Children's Emergency Fund.

WARSAW, POLAND.—Your recent letter reached me a few days ago. Your concern over our welfare is quite unnecessary. We have been here 4 months and are living a very normal life. Kim is thoroughly acclimated now. He is in a Polish Przedszkole (kindergarten). He likes it very much, talks Polish fluently, is learning to sing and dance, and even Polish manners. He has several little friends outside of school with whom he plays. His health is fine.

I know you are interested in Poland and I have so much to tell you I hardly know where to begin. Perhaps the best way is to tell you how an American member of the United Nations staff is treated by and works with the government.

In the first place I am received in the most friendly and cordial manner by all ranks from chauffers to ministers.

My most intimate associates are a working committee of four from the ministries of supply, education, health, and labor, and social welfare. Their position in the civil service is comparable to that of a division head in a bureau at home.

POLES FIRST OF ALL

Some of them are Socialists and some Communists, but they are all first Poles—capable, honest, conscientious, hard-working patriots who jealously love their country and demonstrate it by their willingness to make whatever personal sacrifices are necessary to rebuild their country on a pattern of freedom from fear and want.

In our work I find that they are motivated only by the desire that our program shall be efficiently and honestly administered in accord with the spirit as well as the words of the basic agreement between the Polish Government and the UN children's fund.

While there are violent arguments at high levels in the UN we are demonstrating here that the UN can work together harmoniously.

DIFFERENT SPIRIT

There seems to be a minimum of interministerial power politics, which is amazing to an old American bureaucrat. For instance, when we were discussing how to increase our program the representative of the ministry of health said they would like to have most if not all the increase go for feeding infants under 1 year of age.

I replied that perhaps the ministry of education would not agree since this would mean no increase in their operations.

To my surprise the representative of the ministry of education spoke up and said that they agreed—the total increase should go to infants.

Now for some general things. If anyone had told me of the progress that has been made in the reconstruction of Warsaw during my 11-month absence from Poland I would not have believed them. We drove into Warsaw at night along streets which 11 months before were filled with rubble. Now many of the buildings are restored. Most of the reconstruction has been accomplished by human strength alone, unaided by mechanical power.

How they do it I cannot understand. But I did get a bit of an insight one Sunday recently. I went out with a volunteer group to help clear a street.

There were perhaps a hundred of us. There we stood in the midst of ruins. Ruins as far as we could see—a street filled with rubble 6 or 8 feet deep—wrecked buildings. One hundred people on a Sunday morning started to clear away the millions of tons of debris with nothing but hand shovels and push carts. Hopeless as it seemed, after 4 hours we had made a distinct impression.

REGULAR SUNDAY WORK

That is the way thousands of Poles spend their Sundays. That is the way Poland is being rebuilt. When it is finally rebuilt it will be truly the people's Poland—built by the people of their sweat and tears.

The reconstruction of industry is proceeding even more rapidly because production goods are given highest priority. The coal mines, completely destroyed by the Germans, are now producing coal at more than the prewar rate. No other coal field in Europe can boast of anything like prewar production. Other industries are being restored at a phenomenal rate.

Despite the great shortage of all kinds of consumer goods, inflation is being prevented. Prices have been held and in some instances reduced through control of wages and profits and by increasing production to a rational plan.

There are not enough goods, and wages are low in relation to prices but the Poles recognize that inflation, brought about by higher wages and prices, does not make more goods available. During the last year the production of goods has been increased. Prices lowered and wages increased thus bring about higher prices and real wages.

FOR MOTHERS AND CHILDREN

Poland is making a great effort to care for the children. Over 13 percent of the national budget is devoted to mother and child welfare. Every mother of a child and pregnant woman has free access to medical care. Orphans are given the best care the nation can afford. I am not referring to "afford" in terms of money but of goods.

I know you will be interested in the status of religion in the new Poland. I have seen no evidence of persecution of any church or the suppression of religion. On the contrary, in most of the public schools I saw the cross and other religious symbols above the national insignia. Catholic sisters work in and operate many state-supported schools and orphanages. There is what most of us Americans would believe a belated determination to separate state and church.

But minority religious sects have protection which they never had before, much to the dissatisfaction of some of the clergy who remember the old days when they were allowed to persecute the minority sects.

REJECT MARSHALL PLAN

I know you wonder about the attitude of Poles toward the Marshall plan. That is one thing they are most unanimous about. They want nothing to do with a plan that would build up the aggressors before the victims of the aggressors; that would reestablish economic domination by cartels which in the past proved to be the predecessors of military domination, or at best held east Europe in colonial bondage to Germany.

Poles have suffered too much in the past to be willing to run the chance of being subjected to the old industrial despotism. They want a new deal industrially so much that they are willing to go hungry, ill-clothed, and work with their bare hands to get it—and they are getting it.

They have made progress toward it while other countries were waiting for Congress to pass the Marshall plan.

Here, I am sure, is the same spirit that imposed the Declaration of Independence, made it possible for the ragged patriots of Valley Forge to throw off the yoke of foreign domination, established the social revolution of 1800 and created a civilization from the forests and prairies.

Change From $10 Bill Real Issue in Campaign of Both Parties

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an article by Robert M. Grannis that appeared in the Brooklyn (N. Y.) Eagle on Sunday, August 1, 1948:

CHANGE FROM $10 BILL REAL ISSUE IN CAMPAIGN OF BOTH PARTIES

(By Robert M. Grannis)

Polysyllabic words, intricate figures, and economic principles always throw me in hot weather. Particularly in midsummer, when the suit hangs on me like a bag and the brow from which the hair is receding is as moist as a worried politician's handshake.

No one has to tell me what happens to a $10 bill when my wife hands it to the butcher or the grocer or buys a pair of shoes for junior. The change I can count. But after several mornings of having Eccles with my breakfast bacon, Mr. Truman's special advisory council for lunch, Paul Porter for dinner with a side dish of Bob Taft. I'm wondering if it's worth getting peptic ulcers to find out what really is happening in Washington.

Nevertheless, let's take a look, ulcers or no ulcers.

Having followed the same national road map for nearly 16 years, we have reached a big bump on the main highway.

INFLATION BIG BUMP

The big bump is inflation peak, and the question is, Can the old car negotiate it without crashing? Some say "Yes" and some say "No." Leaders of both parties are terribly embarrassed because they have discovered something that has been right under their noses for a long time. And the experts have been called in. The flow of technical language is terrific.

President Truman, who, in case you haven't heard, is running for President in November, talks in terms of the wonderful ride folks had before they reached the bump. High wages, etc. But he's certain the bump is a Republican responsibility. He dares them to do something about it and drags up characters like Paul Porter, who belongs in the Alice in Wonderland era of our national economy, to point the way. Roll-backs, rationing, and subsidies.

Remember the good old slogans in the good old prebump days? Let's boost wages and keep prices down. And "hold the line" with one hand and subsidize prices with the other.

The Republicans are on the spot. If they follow the suggestions of Mr. Truman and they work, whom will folks vote for in November—the present incumbent, or Mr. Dewey? If they detour around the bump until after election, whom will the people support? It's a mess, all right.

If the GOP and the Democrats could have brains enough to decide on a bipartisan cure for the bump, the darn thing could be removed as a campaign issue. Who's responsible for the bump would be a good substitute issue. Governor Dewey is in favor of not making a detour. Perhaps because he's smarter than the Republican leaders in Congress.

HARRIED BY WALLACE

One thing both parties overlook worries me. They keep an apprehensive eye on the splinter groups rallying behind Henry Wallace, who believes in using wings to fly over things like bumps in the road. They can't understand why Henry gets so much support. The Iowa corn king watches the huddle at the bump and points to the alternate road that isn't there. And some day, if the two major parties keep on squabbling at the expense of the people, the majority might decide to take the dream road and that would be bad.

Right now I want to be told how to get more change out of a $10 bill and it doesn't appear that I'll get an answer this summer. Fewer big words and more action might do it. Certainly drastic action is needed to eliminate the bump, and while I'm not in favor of hasty legislation, maybe we'd better not wait until January, after all.

Address of Hon. Clare Boothe Luce

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. LESLIE C. ARENDS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include in the RECORD the following address of Hon. Clare Boothe Luce to the Republican National Convention in Philadelphia on Monday, June 21, 1948:

Ladies and gentlemen of the convention, 4 years ago you did me the great honor of letting me address our Republican convention. I was deeply aware of the privilege and the responsibility that went with it. But it is an even greater thing to be granted the attention of this audience. For everyone in America—indeed, in the whole watching world—is certain that among you are the men and women who are going to pick our next President.

Why is everyone so certain? For three reasons: Our people want a competent President. Our people want a truthful President. Our people want a Constitution-minded President.

Know-how, squareness, Americanism—these three we must have in our next President if we are going to restore confidence in our economic system at home and if we mean to do a constructive job of world leadership.

So our theme tonight is the same as it was 4 years ago; it is an old Republican theme. The Democratic Party, for reasons that we will have a brief look at now, cannot produce such a President. And most of the people know it. Even the Democrats know it. That is why so many of them are hoping against hope that they may be able, at their own convention, to draft a Republican.

Let's waste no time measuring the unfortunate man in the White House against our specifications. Mr. Truman's time is short; his situation is hopeless. Frankly, he is a gone goose. But before he goes we should admit that we owe him several debts of gratitude.

We should be grateful to Mr. Truman that he tried to be Vice President in 1944, and that with the gallant aid of the big city bosses, Kelly and Flynn, Pendergast and Hague, he did not fail. If he had failed, our President today would be Mr. Wallace.

There are those who call Mr. Truman a little man. His party has sired a smaller. Mr. Truman is a giant beside that very dwarf among pigmies—the American who runs down his own country in order to get buttered up by a foreign tyrant.

Yes, providence wrote straight with crooked lines when Pendergast gave us colorless Harry Truman, instead of Red Hank Wallace.

We should also be grateful to Mr. Truman because he has had so little dramatic talent. When there's a slump at the ballot-box office, a real New Deal hero must be able to chew up the scenery. But Mr. Truman is a man of phlegm, not of fire. He just can't read those old Bob Sherwood lines with the oomph they need for the curtain calls in November. This Truman torpor is more than Democratic f. and b. can bear. But it's been a great relief to Mr. Truman's fellow citizens.

Now, nobody could call Mr. Truman's 3 years in office the pause that refreshes. But they have given us a breathing space in which to refresh our memory on a great chunk of recent Democratic Party history. For the first time, many Americans can see clearly why that party, by its very nature, is unable to run the country well.

Consider the make-up of the party at its immediate postwar operational level. It was less a party than a podge. It was a mishmash of die-hard, warring factions.

Take the extreme right, or the Jim Crow wing, of the party. This was controlled by lynch-loving Bourbons, white-shirted race supremists of the Bilbo ilk. At its best conservative, this wing was and is seldom at its best. It is generally waging a last ditch fight on some progressive issue—of national health, housing, education, or labor because its passage will better the lot of our badly underprivileged Negroes, or other racial minorities. At its worst, this wing is the most reactionary and intolerant element in American life. It is anti-Semitic, anti-Catholic, antiforeign. In short, antediluvian.

You could promise heaven to the Jim Crow wing of the Democratic Party. They'd refuse to go along. Heaven isn't 100 percent American.

Then, there is the left, or Moscow wing of the party. This wing, currently in secession, is being master-minded by Stalin's Mortimer Snerd, Henry Wallace. It is also sometimes known as the bat wing. Here one finds most of the economic spoonies and political bubble heads in the Nation. But this buckled-brain fringe is relatively harmless. Its dangerous core is a motley of labor racketeers, native and imported Communists, and foreign agents of the Kremlin.

Then there is the center, or Pendergast wing. This is run by the wampum and boodle boys, the same big city bosses who gave us Harry Truman in one of their more pixilated moments.

Naturally, the three wings of the party, left to their own desires and devices, begin to operate as suicide squads: each demands the purge of the others; or threatens to secede from the party.

How can any Democratic President rule well with and in such political bedlam?

You are reasonable men and women—you would answer that the thing for a President to do when differences exist in his party is to compromise them on basic principles of fair play and justice. But the differences between the Jim Crow and the Moscow wings are too deep, too bitter—one can almost say, too bloody—for reasonable compromise. On what commonly held moral principles of government can Democratic Marcantonio meet Democratic Rankin? Can Talmadge meet Wallace?

If there were ever a political Tower of Babel, it was the modern New Deal Party. There are, however, 3 formulas for keeping power which it has used with success.

The first is the formula of padding the public pay roll. Life with the party must be a little like living in guerrilla territory. Nevertheless, if a man's bread and butter can be made to depend on it, he can take it. Every Government employee delivers on the average of 5 family votes, and in 1945 there were 3,595,734 employees on the Federal pay roll. The feeding of countless hordes of bureaucrats at the public trough is less an ideological principle with the party than a practical necessity.

The second—and great—formula by which a Democratic President can hope to keep the contradictory elements of his own party together in sufficient numbers to reelect him is the formula of confusion and crisis.

He either makes or seizes upon some domestic issue fraught with emotional content. Holding back the facts as long as possible, he kicks up a mountainous dust of debate about it. If this dust is thick enough, his warring factions won't be able to see whose wing is currently being eaten in the White House. And neither will the people be able to see the party-kreigspeil backstage, or take a good clear look at the mounting rolls of Government employees.

The people have long since grown tired of these domestic dust storms. Today they demand that the issues that kicked them up—or supposedly kicked them up, be compromised and settled, according to constitutional methods.

A Democratic President is on the way out when this time comes, unless he is provided by events overseas with a hot foreign issue. It has to be an issue that will send up smoke, maybe battle smoke. The battle smoke of international crisis is even better than the dust of domestic confusion for getting in your eyes, so you won't see why the Democratic Party can't govern peaceably, even in peacetime.

Democratic Presidents are always troubadours of trouble, crooners of catastrophe: They cannot win elections except in the climate of crisis. So the party, by its very composition, has a vested interest in depression at home and war abroad, because the threat of prosperity at home, or peace overseas, will always split it wide open, and so collapse its fortunes.

This is a fact which we Republicans ask all honest liberals to face up to now. We know that there are many, many men and women of good will who have, in the past, sought progress in the Democratic Party, only to have the promises made to their ears repeatedly broken to their hearts. We sympathize with them. But we wish to point out to them, in all sincerity, what the purpose of New Deal demagogs is when they agitate the breasts of the people alternately with dire forebodings of disaster and frantic hopes of utopia. Their purpose was—and is—power.

The arousing of extravagant hopes, or equally extravagant fears: That is the third New Deal formula.

We Republicans will not promise you heaven on earth, or as it was once put, "only a consecrated world." But we can promise you we will do our level, honest, commonsensical best to keep you out of those hells on earth: constant domestic crises and a third world war.

We promise, in short, that we can fulfill the reasonable expectations of reasonable men, by good government at home and sober statesmanship abroad.

On the great issue of war or peace the Democrats are divided, as they are fundamentally always divided on everything. Wallace says that Truman wants war at any cost. Truman says that Wallace wants peace at any price. Both may be right. But our party is not divided about what it believes: We believe neither in war at any cost, nor peace at any price. We Republicans believe that peace can be brought to a great section of the world, by electing a President who will show the simple courage of saying what he means and meaning what he says, both to peoples overseas and to us at home.

It may sometimes be hard for a President to tell the truth. It is always impossible to hide it.

For example, history has already given the final answers to the great question that we the people asked the New Deal in its heyday, and to which we got silence, evasion, or distortion for an answer.

The question then and the question now is primarily whether the war was necessary. By 1940, certainly, the war was necessary.

The question then—and the question now—and the question so long as our Republic endures—is this: Are we, the American people to be trusted by our President with the true facts about our own security, yes or no? Are we no longer fit to shape our own destiny, yes or no? We say "Yes." The Communists say "No." History shows that the New Deal seemed to share the Communist opinion of our popular representative, constitutional form of government.

History shows now that back in '39, administration circles privately thought lend-lease would lead to war: Congress was told it was a peace measure.

History shows now that in '41 commitments were made to Mr. Churchill at the Atlantic Conference: then, the Government denied them.

History shows now that in November of '41, our Navy while escorting British ships, was in a shooting war against German subs: The White House denied it.

And history shows that the State Department felt our demands on Japan would provoke her into an attack: it told us that these demands were a sound basis of peace in the Orient.

The pay-off to such an extraconstitutional foreign policy was Pearl Harbor.

As the war developed, New Deal diplomacy settled—in secret, of course—into its final form: unconditional surrender from Germany and unconditional surrender to Russia.

History shows now that the White House made secret concessions to Soviet Russia at Tehran and Yalta, and Potsdam. At Yalta, that incredibly heroic country, Poland, was sold outright to the Kremlin. And China's sovereignty over Manchuria was snatched away. Unnecessary, disgraceful betrayals. And what was got for them? Stalin's promise to enter the war we had already won against Japan. "I got along fine with Stalin," said the great New Dealer. "I like old Joe," said the little New Dealer last week. Good old Joe. Of course they liked him. Didn't they give him all eastern Europe, Manchuria, the Kuriles, north China, coalitions in Poland, Yugoslavia, and Czechoslovakia? How much more they would have given him if Senator VANDENBERG and Foster Dulles and other Republican voices in the Nation had not put some backbone into the New Deal State Department, we tremble to think. And how much more good old Joe would have taken if a Republican Congress had not kept the bomb, and passed the ERP bill, we can't guess either. Yes, good old Joe Stalin. Bad old Congress.

And the existence of all such commitments and deals were ridiculed and denied at the time, and are today. Republicans who warned 3 or 4 years ago that they existed, and that they would in the long run prove dangerous to world peace, and even to our own security, were publicly pilloried by the White House, no less than the Daily Worker, as Fascists and war mongers.

Fortunately Republicans have never minded being political expendables in our country's cause.

Why, why, many ask themselves today, does not the New Deal trust the people? Why must it indulge so frivolously in complicated moves, evasions, and subterfuges even in the all-important matter of our national safety?

We have given one answer: Public confusion on vital issues was—and is—Democratic weather. A democratic President is doomed to proceed to his goals like a cuttle fish squirting darkness all about him.

But there is a second reason: During its lifetime the New Deal was increasingly infected with the moral disease of expediency. This ethical blight has to some extent hit every form of government in the world. It is responsible for much of the world's miseries. It has become a satanic scourge in Soviet Russia. It is the devilish idea that the ends justify the means.

The Republican and the Democratic Parties both claim, and I think honestly, to be for the same ends; the greatest possible increase of physical well-being, economic security, and political liberty for the American citizen, regardless of color, creed, or condition.

Here's a funny thing—these same goals are also paraded in the propaganda of the Kremlin. It is precisely because they profess the same goals we do that Soviet leaders insist that the USSR is also a democracy.

And in truth, the difference between our democracy and the Soviets does not lie in the ends we claim to seek. It lies in the means by which we and they, in actual fact, try to reach those ends.

We, the people, have always believed that means should correspond to ends; that honest, legal, democratic means were the only safe and proper way to reach good democratic ends. But the Communists hold just the opposite. They hold that in order to reach democratic ends anything goes: Evasion, deceit, subterfuge, sabotage, treachery. And all their horrid progeny—exile, torture, murder, liquidation.

It is a Communist principle to destroy all moral principle—and naturally all religion—on the theory that to do so will bring about prosperous rule of the proletariat more quickly.

A dictator may be all-powerful, as Stalin is in his own country. But Stalin could no more suspend the workings of the moral law, even in Russia, than King Canute could suspend the law of nature when he ordered the tide to halt.

Soviet Russia pursued liberty with the means of slavery. And 180,000,000 Russians have lost all their liberties.

In the New Deal's conduct of our Nation's affairs there were—and still are—many echoes of this diabolic doctrine that the ends justify the means.

You remember the famous phrase, "I hope that your committee will not permit doubt as to constitutionality, however reasonable, to block the suggested legislation." That was one echo.

The philosophy that lofty ends justify underhanded means always goes hand in hand with a contempt for the wisdom of the plain people. And many New Dealers do honestly feel that they cannot trust Americans with the truth, because of their laziness, or indifference, or stupidity.

Harry Hopkins put this attitude in a historic phrase when, defending some covert New Deal measure, he said, "The people are too d— dumb to understand."

Well, the people understand now. They understand now why the New Dealers were attracted—and are still attracted—by the Communists, and the Communists are even more attracted to the New Dealers.

The Communists can do business with any man, rich man, poor man, beggar man, thief, doctor, lawyer, merchant, chief—even a Chief Executive—provided one thing only: That he is willing to use unconstitutional, or simply undemocratic means in the pursuit of his political ends.

The air of expediency is natural to the New Deal Party. This is the air in which native, homegrown American Communists can best thrive.

Let me give you one brilliant example of how this popular New Deal theory that undemocratic means are justified by democratic goals always leads to tyranny, in practice. Speech-making in Oregon last month, Henry Wallace is reported, in the Baltimore Sun, to have made the following statement:

"The Government should buy up land which can't be served by electricity. If people insist on living on such land, then the Government should not permit them to have children."

O, pursuit of happiness, O liberty, O life itself. Must all be liquidated if you and I are so stubborn as to light our lamps with oil, when the New Deal wants us to use electricity?

Here we have the apotheosis of the New Dealer: He pursued plenty by the means of scarcity. He plowed under every third row, he killed little pigs. Now in the name of the almighty, progressive kilowatt, he condemns unborn children to oblivion. Make way, you old-fashioned Republicans. Make way for the New Deal's real heir, the humanitarian with the electric chair.

We Republicans have never ceased, for 16 long years, to warn the people that bad methods never do, in the end, produce good results.

How sad it is to see the effect of those secret treaties made at Tehran, Yalta, and Potsdam, and so long denied in Washington. They have condemned to exile, death, or slavery millions of the very people to whom we sought to give freedom, the Poles, the Balts, the brave people of central and middle Europe who fought for us in the undergrounds.

We see now that a foreign policy which did not meet the Russian challenge on a moral plane—the plane of honesty with our people—this policy is going to cost the American taxpayer dearly—he must now put up billions for the reconstruction and strengthening of western Europe and Asia, and the building up of a strong Military Establishment against the threat of war. The heavy postwar burden put upon our country was made many times heavier, not lighter, because of these secret concessions made to Soviet Russia without the knowledge of the American people.

A simpler way of putting this is to say that the Democratic Party lost faith in the processes demanded by the Constitution of our President. And now the people have lost faith in a Democratic President.

Today, they want a Constitution-minded President. They want a President who can ask, and will ask, as Abraham Lincoln did, even in the midst of the Civil War:

"Why should there not be a patient confidence in the ultimate justice of the people? Is there any better, or equal hope in the world?"

We Republicans say there is no better or equal hope in the world. We believe that the Constitution is the greatest charter of freedom men have ever thought out, written down, embodied into law, and lived by. And nothing that has come out of Germany or Soviet Russia in the past 20 years has made us change that happy opinion. On the contrary, the terror and misery that stalk the rest of the world under totalitarian systems have deepened our conviction that "the Constitution * * * is unquestionably the wisest yet ever presented to man."

In November, the people will shout the words of Jefferson in every polling booth:

"In questions of power, let no more be heard of confidence in man, but bind him down from mischief by the chains of the Constitution."

These are words that no Democratic President has dared to quote with a clear conscience for 16 long years.

The lesson that the American people have learned in these long, long years of the old, old New Deal is this: Competence, truthfulness, and constitutionality are needed in the White House and they cannot be supplied by the Democrats.

It has in many ways been an expensive lesson. But it will have been worth while if we have learned it well.

May our party be worthy to take over the reins of government now. May we be in every way fit to assume the leadership of the Nation that must assume leadership in the world.

Our responsibilities are grave: May we accept them in all gravity and prayerfulness.

It has been said that the affairs of the world are run by the confusion of men and the providence of God. Surely a sound and generous statesmanship will lessen the confusion, and surely prayer will attract a more beneficent providence.

In closing let us recall the words of President Roosevelt—Theodore Roosevelt. They are durable words. Written 38 years ago, they are strangely timely to our ears, as we gather here to choose the next President of the United States.

"Our country—this great Republic—means nothing unless it means the triumph of a real democracy. The triumph of popular government, and in the long run the economic system under which each man shall be guaranteed the opportunity to show the best there is in him. That is why the history of America is now the central fact of the world. The world has set its face hopefully toward our democracy. And oh, my fellow citizens, each one of you carries on your shoulders not only the burden of doing well for the sake of your own country, but the burden of doing well and of seeing that this Nation does well for the sake of mankind."

Mill Pricing in the Steel Industry

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT N. McGARVEY
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. McGARVEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter and statement:

EDWARD L. HAND & CO.,
Philadelphia, Pa., August 3, 1948.

Hon. ROBERT N. McGARVEY,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR BOB: Industry, both large and small, is concerned with the ultimate effect of abandoning the multiple basing principle, commonly used so many years.

The complications of cross migration and relocation of business is beyond the comprehension of anyone. The new definition of an 8-year-old law requires legislative attention if concentration of industry is to be avoided, which was the supposed intent of the law, when passed.

A small industry might move near a large customer to meet the conditions confronting him today. Tomorrow the large industry might pay a higher price to favor another supplier. The small manufacturer is at the mercy of such a condition.

Yours very truly,

W. J. FITZPATRICK.

SWING TO MILL PRICING GENERAL—VIRTUAL COMPLETE ABANDONMENT OF MULTIPLE BASING POINT QUOTING IN STEEL INDUSTRY INDICATED BY END OF SUMMER AS ADDITIONAL PRODUCERS FOLLOW UNITED STATES STEEL'S LEAD

With additional steelmakers adopting mill pricing, abandoning the historic basing point system, indications are that before the end of the summer virtually every steel mill in the country, large and small, will be quoting on the new basis.

Impact of the change in pricing method on consumers' costs will be substantial since freight charges formerly absorbed by the mills now will have to be paid by the consumer. This added cost burden, however, will vary between consumers, depending on their proximity to steel production centers. In some cases, buyers may benefit from the change.

ABANDONED RELUCTANTLY

The steel industry abandons basing point pricing reluctantly. Without exception steel executives view the change, forced by recent Supreme Court decisions in the cement and rigid steel conduit cases, as a backward step. The steel men point out that abandonment of the multiple basing point system will:

1. Promote local monopolies.
2. Restrict competition between the steel mills.
3. Force the closing and relocation of mills and factories.
4. Curtail development of low-cost production and distribution.
5. Deny consumers a free choice of suppliers.
6. Lead to geographical concentration of industry.
7. Cost customers more money because of increased transportation charges.
8. Prevent establishment of consumer cost estimates prior to actual purchases.
9. Result in higher prices on finished products to the ultimate consumer.
10. Create confusion and uncertainties in the marketing of steel products which will have chaotic effects on the economy of the Nation.

SEE GROWTH HAMPERED

It is the firm conviction within the steel industry that under mill pricing the industrial growth of the Nation will be hampered. Ben Moreell, president, Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp., in a letter announcing his company's policy, said: "The Nation's basic industries and their customers cannot continue the vigorous growth which is essential to the preservation of our country's industrial strength."

All that the steel companies seek, he said, is the right to compete, and in order to restore this basic principle he held it is essential that Congress amend the laws so there will be no statutory prohibition against charging lower mill prices to some customers than to others, when such lower prices are necessary to permit products to be sold in a distant market to compete with another producer more favorably located.

LEGISLATIVE ACTION

It was apparent last week that both producers and consumers of steel are banking heavily on some legislative action which will permit at least partial restoration of the basing point system. However, indications in Washington were that if anything at all is done along this line, it will be months in the making.

Senator HOMER CAPEHART (Republican, Indiana), chairman of a special subcommittee investigating effects of recent Supreme Court decisions on basing point pricing, last week indicated that length of the special session of Congress would determine whether hearings get under way before fall. If the special session is prolonged 2 or 3 months (which seems unlikely) hearings of the subcommittee probably would get under way. In any event the most that can be expected in the near future are hearings, any possible legislation being deferred until the next Congress.

Meanwhile, full play of the market under the new pricing system will permit more realistic judgment of the effect of the pricing change on the economy. While there is considerable talk of fabricating plants moving closer to steel production, for the most part it is believed fabricators will not be in a hurry to pick up their shops and move. Extent to which truck and water transport can be utilized in offsetting increased rail freight costs is a matter which thousands of fabricators will look into before they decide upon such a costly proceeding as moving their plant—lock, stock, and barrel.

Wage Increases for Employees of Bell Telephone System

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE P. MILLER
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, officers of the Communications Workers of America, a union representing some 230,000 phone workers across the Nation, inform me that they have been carrying on negotiations with the Nation's telephone industry since early spring, with little success in getting the gigantic Bell System to come through with a third-round increase, as most American corporations have already done.

I should like briefly to review the bargaining relationship which has existed for several years between A. T. & T. and the phone union. In 1946 most corporations agreed to wage increases early in the spring, many of the unions involved being unable to obtain them without going on strike.

Rather than strike the telephone industry then, the phone union, under the leadership of J. A. Beirne, accepted a compromise wage increase settlement somewhat less than that obtained by other workers. A year later, in 1947, the phone industry, despite the granting by other industries of a sizable second round of increases, refused to grant any to telephone workers, forcing them on a 6-week Nation-wide strike before the industry came through with a second round wage increase, again smaller in amount than that obtained by unions in other industries.

In its bargaining this year CWA decided to do everything possible to avoid a strike and has so far displayed admirable restraint in not calling one. Bargaining began with the phone industry early in the year for renewal of contracts set to expire generally in the early part of May. No wage increases were forthcoming even after the General Motors settlement and that in other branches of the automobile industry, steel, oil, rubber, coal, electrical manufacturing, building construction, Government workers.

By now the newspapers report that practically all branches of organized labor, except telephones, have obtained third-round increases amounting generally to about 11 cents to 15 cents an hour.

CWA, as its contracts began to expire, extended some of them and in other cases entered into long-term stabilizing agreements, whereby the question of wages was temporarily set aside subject to reopening twice during the life of these contracts. About half the 230,000 workers CWA represents are covered by contracts still under negotiation despite the ending of their primary term several months ago.

It seems to me that if we are going to make democracy work we must make one of its foundation stones, free collective bargaining, work also. Free collective bargaining requires a willingness on both sides of the conference table to give and take, be reasonable in their position, to consider each other's viewpoint and to be ready to compromise. It seems to me that the leaders of CWA have done all this. They openly stated they intend to avoid a strike if it is possible. They have followed through on this statement, even though a wage increase is long past due to them. They still have no present intentions of striking, but their patience is beginning to wear thin.

Let us look at the company actions in connection with this. The A. T. & T. is a seven-and-one-half-billion-dollar corporation, the largest business organization in America. It is a controlled industry, supervised partly by State commissions and partly by the Federal Communications Commission. Its recent rate increases have amounted to $137,000,000. It has applications pending before State rate-making bodies for another $80,000,000. The corporation has paid a $9-a-year dividend since the early 1920's, and paid that dividend right through the depression. Its latest report showed a net profit of $2.77 per share a quarter, more than enough to again pay this handsome $9 dividend. It is in the midst of a dial-conversion program, which will give it an opportunity for increasing even more its profit ratio through handling of calls mechanically rather than manually by telephone operators. Incidentally, as this program progresses it will throw thousands of operators out of work.

Despite this exceedingly favorable financial position, a situation likely to become even more pleasant for the owners of the company in the future, the Bell System has been adamant in refusing to grant wage increases to its employees.

Some slight movement in wage increases has just become evident in the manufacturing branch of the industry, but even here company offers so far have been still below the third-round pattern established in other industries. As for the several hundred thousand workers in the operating end of the business, the Bell System still insists that no wage increases are yet justified. Despite rising prices, the historic lag of telephone wages below others, and despite the fact that their 1946 and 1947 increases were not as great as those for workers in other fields, the Bell System, in some obscure manner best known to itself, steadfastly maintains that its workers are not entitled to an increase.

We passed the Taft-Hartley law during this session of Congress, a law which some labor leaders say put difficulties in their way of operation and hamstrung their activities. If American corporations like A. T. & T. continue their refusal to play fair with their workers, perhaps it is time the Congress did something about interfering with company activities, which more often than those of workers bring on economic strife and trouble.

In this special session there is perhaps not enough time to go into this matter thoroughly, but when the Eighty-first Congress convenes, if the Bell System has not mended its ways, we should recommend a complete investigation into its methods of operation, its profit-taking, and its relations with its employees and the unions which represent them. America's gigantic corporations have just as much responsibility in maintaining industrial peace as have America's unions.

Federal Spending Is Greatest Single Cause of Inflation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT F. RICH
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following bulletin of the National Association of State Chambers of Commerce:

FEDERAL SPENDING IS GREATEST SINGLE CAUSE OF INFLATION—PRESIDENT OFFERS EIGHT-POINT PROGRAM TO CHECK INFLATION BUT OVERLOOKS MOST IMPORTANT RECOMMENDATION: CURB GOVERNMENT SPENDING

President Truman has ordered Congress back to Washington to deal with two national problems: Inflation and housing. His message to the Congress, delivered on Tuesday, outlined the things he wants done. The message contained 3,000 words, 1,110 of which were devoted to the problem of inflation and to his 8 proposals for solving that problem. There was not a single word of reference, however, to the most important of all the causes of inflation—the extravagant and unsound spending policies of the Federal Government itself.

None of the President's eight recommendations even hinted of the one remedy which, above all others, could effectively check the disturbing trend toward ever-rising prices—reduction of the cost of government.

On the contrary, the President's message contained no less than 10 recommendations for new Federal outlays, which, if approved by Congress, would at the outset add almost $2,000,000,000 more to the present budget, and eventually at least $9,000,000,000 more.

These proposed new expenditures would entail large increases in Federal employment, in Government purchases of basic materials, and in building space needed for the new offices created by the proposed legislation. These increases would come in the face of desperate Nation-wide shortages of manpower materials, and building space—shortages which contribute largely to current inflationary conditions.

COST OF LIVING VERSUS THE COST OF GOVERNMENT

The President's message dwelt at length on rising prices and the high cost of living.

The cost of living in the United States has risen 73 percent since 1939, according to the latest report of the Bureau of Labor Statistics. This is a very disturbing increase indeed.

But in the same period of time the cost of Federal Government (as measured by its expenditures) has soared from $8,765,338,000 in the fiscal year 1939 to $39,326,000,000 in the fiscal year 1948 (Treasury Bulletin of June 30). This is an increase of 337 percent.

In other words, the cost of Federal Government has increased at a rate four and a half times as fast as the cost of living has increased since 1939.

That is important for this reason: Taxes for all government in the United States today—Federal, State, and local—constitute the largest single item in the budget of the whole American people. It is larger than the Nation's bill for food. It amounts to more than 25 cents of every dollar of the Nation's income. Of the $55,000,000,000 levied and collected in taxes for all government in the United States this year, more than four-fifths goes to Washington.

It can readily be seen that if Congress were to approve new expenditures advocated by the President, taxes needed to meet these new spending burdens would take an even larger slice of the American income dollar than is taken now.

TAXES ARE INTENDED FOR SPENDING

The President's message did, indeed, propose the levying of a new tax—an excess-profits tax. The message stated that the new revenues are intended "to provide a Treasury surplus and provide a brake on inflation."

Students of public finnace know that taxes are imposed by government—any government—for one purpose, and one purpose only: to provide money to spend.

Surely this is confirmed by the new spending recommendations made in the President's message. The excess-profits-tax revenues are intended to finance additional Federal expenditures and nothing else.

INFLATION CAN BE CURBED—IF

The most important contribution toward breaking the inflationary trend can be made by the Federal Government itself, simply by putting its own house in order.

Let us give a few examples of what we mean:

Manpower shortages threaten to retard the Nation's production. Yet the Federal Government is surfeited with manpower. It now has 2,100,000 civilians on its pay rolls and has been hiring additional employees at the rate of almost 500 a day. Chairman HARRY F. BYRD of the Joint Committee on Reduction of Nonessential Federal Expenditures has recommended that Federal personnel be reduced by 30 percent. He has declared that this can be done without impairing essential Government services. Adoption of this recommendation would make available 630,000 workers to help relieve manpower shortages in many parts of the country.

There is a shortage of basic materials—steel, lumber, etc. The President's Economic Advisory Council in January urged a substantial cut in public works construction in order to conserve on materials in short supply. Yet the Government is now embarked on public works projects which will cost the taxpayers more than $2,500,000,000 in the fiscal year 1949—the largest public construction program ever undertaken in a peacetime year. A judicious rescission of a substantial part of the funds appropriated for public works in 1949 would help to solve the problem of essential materials shortages.

Finally, inflation is aggravated by the scarcity of building space and of housing. The United States Government is by far the largest single user of building space in the Nation. Its agencies are constantly competing with private firms and among themselves for office space in every sizable city in the country. Newly created Federal agencies are now said to require 9,000,000 square feet of space in Washington alone. A determination to halt the creation of new Federal agencies and the expansion of old ones, and to weed out and eliminate unessential and overlapping services, would do much to relieve building-space shortages and make more materials and manpower available for housing construction.

A Clean Sweep—By Republicans—Needed To End These New-Deal-Born Troubles

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE H. BENDER
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I should like to insert in the RECORD the following editorial which appeared in the Cleveland News of August 3, 1948:

A CLEAN SWEEP—BY REPUBLICANS—NEEDED TO END THESE NEW-DEAL-BORN TROUBLES

This is a good day to talk about the clean sweep for a whole new clean order that the people can make next November by voting for Governors Dewey and Warren.

It is becoming painfully clear that a lot of the wretched disorders, suspicions, and dirty international double-dealing at Washington are all the final results of Mr. Roosevelt's original New Deal—changed in some small ways in the days of President Truman, but not in its worst particulars.

What is needed, we repeat, is a clean sweep for a whole new clean order.

An ex-Communist Party member is testifying to disclosures that ought to scare any right-thinking citizen. She is putting the finger on the actual Communists who held good public jobs at Washington at the taxpayers' expense. She is telling what they did. Notably, how they leaked Washington information to Russian Reds sent over here by Moscow to set up such pipe lines.

The first person she accuses of leaking information to her, to give to her Russian playmates to be cabled back to Moscow, doesn't deny he gave her information. Somewhat worse, he admits associating with people he knew were actual Reds, in Washington and New York; he even was married into a pinko family.

Just how he got to a high public post on a board which determined American shipping licenses to Russia—in these days—should mystify and anger the right thinking.

When she gets around to testifying that Lauchlin Currie, one of President Roosevelt's special assistants, and Harry White, who helped set up Bretton Woods, leaked information to Communists on the Federal pay roll, the possibility can be admitted that they didn't know what they were leaking.

Yet it's shocking that such careless talkers got to top key positions in the New Deal government, isn't it? And the inference is lodged that they weren't careful about their associates, either; and, further, that the line was never drawn, in President Roosevelt's time, between a loud-talking New Dealer and New Deal-talking Communist Party members.

We need to sweep out the whole mess. We don't want a Truman hang-over administration which lets the Remingtons and the Whites, whatever they were, stay on the Government pay roll.

Down at Dayton, an imported mob of labor goons has been defying the law all because the United Electrical Workers, which is admittedly full of Communist officers, lost a plant election and wouldn't abide by the result.

Tear gas, stink bombs, sluggings, and intimidation of workers—the story is as bad there as it was in the days of the sit-downers and the worst terrorist picketers.

Neither this union nor its questionable officers nor the labor goons would be able to operate thus lawlessly had they not been started off by the New Deal and its one-sided Wagner law—which tied every employer's hands and shut his mouth until the Taft-Hartley Act tried to make it a less one-sided act.

We need a new crowd which will compel the labor laws to be enforced and not set off terrorists. We'll not get it as long as the old crowd of New Deal labor bosses and Communist union leaders have old friends left in power in Washington.

The promises and program of the Wallace third party, if you study them, will raise the hair on your heads. It's the nearest to a Communist Party that our third parties have ever developed.

But who produced Henry Wallace in our public life and gave him political stature?

Who produced Lee Pressman, the CIO commander in chief of Mr. Roosevelt's days in the White House, and GLEN TAYLOR, and VITO MARCANTONIO, who represents the New York Communists in Congress? It was the Roosevelt-Truman New Deal which produced and protected all of them.

A clean sweep of the whole regime is what the country needs; a bringing in of new leaders untainted and uncompromised by what has been going on for the last 15 years, so much of it under the cover of darkness and secrecy.

Certainly the time is past when we dare go on with an administration which is half American and half still working and pleading for Soviet Russia.

Fortunately, the clean sweep is right at hand—Dewey and Warren; and a Republican Congress to work with them.

Plywood and Plywood Workers Are Helping Solve the Housing Shortage

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RUSSELL V. MACK
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. MACK. Mr. Speaker, during the year 1946 only 437,600 new homes were built in this country. Last year, 1947, we nearly doubled that figure by completing 837,000 housing units. This year, judging from statistics for the first 6 months, we will construct a million homes.

I want to talk to you today briefly about an industry—a comparatively new industry—that has played a great part in achieving this million-new-homes-a-year record. It is the plywood industry.

The Nation for several years has been pleading desperately for more homes. To build these homes more production of building materials was needed. That we might have more homes the Nation asked the men and women of the plywood industry to produce more plywood.

How well the plywood industry responded to that plea for more building material is revealed by the figures of plywood production.

In 1945 the production of fir plywood in this country was 1,200,000,000 square feet. In 1946 it was 1,400,000,000 square feet and in 1947 it was 1,600,000,000 square feet. This year it will be 2,000,000,000 square feet or almost double the production of plywood of a brief 3 years ago. The contemplated output for 1949 is estimated at 2,700,000,000 square feet or far more than twice what it was in 1945.

I doubt if any other industry in America, or in the world, has done such a magnificent and outstanding job in increased production.

You cannot build new homes without building material and when sometime before December 31, 1948, Americans say, "We built a million homes this year" a great deal of credit for this great achievement properly should go to the men and women of the plywood industry of America and to the loggers who supplied the logs to make possible the doubling of plywood production within the brief period of 3 years.

There are in the United States 43 plywood factories that make plywood from Douglas fir. Thirteen of those plywood factories, almost one-third of the total, are in the district which I have the honor to represent in Congress.

But magnificent as has been the job which has been done by the plywood industry in the past 3 years, it is preparing to do even a better one.

During the period since VJ-day, production of the 31 plants in operation in 1945 has been increased 50 percent.

Furthermore, 12 additional factories have been completed to add to the plywood output.

Important, too, is the fact that on July 15, 1948, there were 10 additional plywood plants under construction and others were being projected for the future.

The estimated investment in this great new industry, which has grown up almost entirely within the past 25 years, is now placed at $110,000,000.

The industry employs 13,000 factory workers and provides an annual pay roll of $56,048,000. All this is in addition to the other pay rolls which it has opened among those who supply the industry with raw material and services.

There is another contribution to the national economy which the plywood industry is making which few of us think about. The plywood industry is making our forests go further and last longer.

For every 1,000 feet of log that goes into a lumber sawmill, the operator gets about 750 board feet of lumber. The rest is lost in sawing and slab material.

The same log going through a plywood plant will produce not 750 board feet of coverage material as in the lumber mill, but 1,500 square feet of coverage material, about twice what the lumber sawmill obtains.

Plywood is made of thin layers of wood, laminated together. Three layers of plywood laminated together into a ⅜-inch piece of plywood has greater strength than a 1-inch board of lumber. Thus the plywood industry is giving us approximately twice as much building material from every tree taken from our forests.

This is important not only to the home building industry but to the Federal Government itself. Uncle Sam is the Nation's greatest owner of timber. Our Federal Government, according to the 1947 annual report of the chief forester, now owns 179,314,756 acres of forest land, or a landed area three times the size of all six New England States combined.

The loggers and plywood workers work and live among the biggest things that grow outdoors, the gigantic and towering trees of our Pacific Northwest forests.

Working among the trees and on the great logs produced from them, these workers have imbibed from the forests something of the strength and hardiness of the trees that they conquer and turn into useful products.

In the war years these workers did a great job in turning out plywood for the war effort—to build Army-Navy housing, to build boats and many other things useful in the war effort.

In peace they have turned their efforts to supplying the material to homes, more homes and then still more homes.

Last year they produced 1,600,000,000 square feet of plywood. This year they will produce 2,000,000,000. Next year their production of plywood will be 2,750,000,000 square feet.

They are doing a job that will make possible the building of a million homes this year and perhaps 1,500,000 next year.

The plywood workers and the loggers and those in allied industries, are doing more than anyone else—more even than lawmakers—to solve the housing shortage.

Request for a Congressional Investigation of Our Policies in Germany

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE G. SADOWSKI
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. SADOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I have recently received a petition from the Society for the Prevention of World War III, requesting a thorough congressional investigation of our policies in Germany.

It is an undeniable fact that our policy of rebuilding Germany into a great power again is viewed with fear and horror by our former allies and victims of German aggression and brutality. These nations and these people have suffered from German attacks and militarism for the past 200 years.

I understand that copies of this petition have also been sent to Speaker JOE MARTIN and to Senator VANDENBERG. The petition follows:

To the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
The Capitol, Washington, D. C.

SIRS: Your petitioners, members of the Society for the Prevention of World War III, a nonprofit organization incorporated in the State of New York, respectfully represent that certain conditions relating to the conduct of our occupation of Germany, and that the policy and activities of our Government relating to German war industries, should be subjected to immediate and thorough investigation by the Congress.

1. Our complaint is based, in general, on the fact that our policy toward Germany has been almost completely discarded and that we are about to re-create the very same forces which embroiled the world in two wars. Specifically our complaint is based on the fact that we have made a mockery out of our denazification and reparations programs, the trial of war criminals, the elimination of Germany's industrial war potential and the handling of the decartelization of the German industries by our military government.

2. The recent dismissals of acquittals of charges against the leaders of I. G. Farben and the Krupp steel firm of participation in the common plan or conspiracy to wage aggressive war, and the inadequate sentences or acquittals of the leaders of the Flick steel combine, violate every concept of human morality and of international law as assembled and decreed in article 6 of the Charter (drawn up by the Allied Powers in 1945).

3. These recent decisions by judges sitting in the all-American Military Tribunal appear to vindicate tragically various charges of a most serious character reflecting upon these Courts, which were made prior to these decisions:

(a) Dispatches from responsible correspondents of the United States newspapers in Germany have stated that the judges of the Military Tribunal were softening in considering evidence against the German industrialists; that reports and rumors were current in Germany of alleged improper conduct of certain members of the American prosecution staff, and that the plea of ignorance of the Nazis' intent to wage aggressive war, on which the four-power tribunal freed H. Horace Greeley Schacht, was being accepted as precedent in the all-American tribunal.

(b) These reports and allegations and the recent decisions in the trials of industrial leaders seem to indicate that the Schacht acquittal was arranged to provide judicial safe havens for these industrialists; Howard Watson Ambruster, author of the book, Treason's Peace, published in 1947, has stated publicly that the rules of the all-American military tribunal were so drawn up as to require or permit the precedent of the Schacht acquittal to rule in these trials, and that impropriety appeared in the selection of the judges sitting in these trials.

(c) In numerous American newspapers, comments have appeared regarding the seriousness of these charges, which have so far gone unanswered and undenied, as stated editorially in the Cleveland News of April 9, 1948.

(d) Other protests at the conduct of these trials and the decisions of the judges have been made on the floor of the Congress, by numerous responsible citizens in the press and by the signers of this petition.

4. The decartelization of German industries and the elimination of war plants was decreed by the Allied Military Government in 1945. This decree has not been implemented and former assistant, Howard C. Petersen, stated before the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations that we have eliminated only 5 or 6 war plants.

(a) Step by step the restrictions on restoration of the German chemical and metallurgical industries, which constitute the real German war potential, have been lifted.

(b) On numerous occasions the United States Government has stated its intention to set up safeguards against Germany's economic and military power. One of these essential safeguards has been the prohibition, under the Potsdam Agreement, of the manufacture of aluminum. In March 1948 it was reported that the Germans were granted the permission to manufacture aluminum.

(c) On March 13, 1948, the staff of the United States decartelization group at Berlin addressed a protest to Gen. Lucius D. Clay, commander of our American Military Government in Germany, because of his instructions to desist from further breaking up of German industrial combines. This appears absolutely contrary to the orders given in 1945, and as specifically provided for by the decartelization laws which became effective in the United States and United Kingdom zones on February 12, 1947. General Clay is reported to have ordered these 19 protestants to either desist in carrying out this law as written or to resign their jobs and return to the United States if dissatisfied with his revision of the original policy. In some instances resignations are reported to have taken place.

(d) The I. G. Farben plants are now being operated by former employees and under the guidance of the men on trial at Nuremberg, and the expectation is that when the trials are completed the defendants themselves are to be restored to their former positions, in control of the German war potential. It has officially been admitted that nothing can prevent the resumption of cartel alliances by these industries should control be relaxed.

(e) H. Horace Greeley Schacht, after his acquittal of war crimes charges, was convicted as a Nazi by a German court and sentenced to jail, but it is reported that he has now been transferred to pleasant quarters at Frankfort to act as adviser to General Clay on the restoration of the German economy. The American press has opened its columns to him for the defense of his own views.

(f) Various important war industrialists and industrial financiers who aided in bringing Hitler to power and in the conduct of the war have never been either tried or indicted by the allied or American tribunals, as for example, Kurt Von Schroeder, head of the Stein Bank of Cologne, who on his record is one of the most dangerous war criminals in Germany, was released with a fine of a few hundred marks; Herman J. Abs, director and the guiding brain of the most powerful bank in Nazidom, the Deutsche Bank, who, as a powerful leader, rendered invaluable services to the Nazis; Heinrich Dinkelbach, and scores of others, who were put back into their powerful positions by the occupation authorities (see partial list in CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, July 26, 1947).

(g) The final restoration of the I. G. Farben empire and the German heavy industry is only a matter of time, but it is already apparent that the industrial war lords and stanch Hitler supporters, who manipulated the German war potential are again guiding Germany's economy in Bizonia. It is therefore clear that we are about to repeat the mistakes made by the Allies after World War I when we neglected to set up adequate controls over the German economy.

(h) The most serious aspect of these accusations is the conclusion that the hidden power of Allies and friends of these German war industrialists persist inside the United States and is a controlling influence in our policy relating to the German war potential.

(i) Vigorous protests have been made on the floor of Congress and by many responsible citizens against this restoration of the German war potential. No real answer to these protests has been heard from any source, but the air and press have been filled with inspired falsehoods to the effect that the restoration of these German war industries is essential to the recovery of western Europe, and also for the protection of the United States against Russia.

CONCLUSIONS

5. We submit that all these facts and the allegations and accusations relating to them, as repeatedly and publicly made, are too serious and present too great a menace to the future world peace to remain unchallenged and unanswered. We submit that these charges must be properly investigated. Should these charges be proven, then drastic action should be taken against each and every individual, regardless of his position, for what will appear as participation in a conspiracy against the security of the United States and the future world peace.

Respectfully submitted.

Youth Month

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MICHAEL J. KIRWAN
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. KIRWAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herein a letter that I have received from Mr. Gael Sullivan, executive director of the Theatre Owners of America, Inc., urging that we aid the youth of America in observing the month of September as Youth Month.

I believe that it behooves each and every one of us to do our very best to encourage every young man and woman to take the place in our country and its affairs that rightfully belongs to them.

The letter follows:

THEATRE OWNERS OF AMERICA, INC.,
New York, N. Y., August 2, 1948.

Hon. MICHAEL KIRWAN,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MIKE: September is Youth Month all over the Nation and we are appealing for your help to put it over. As one of the widely recognized leaders of the Nation, you can give this program for our youth real impact and meaning.

We want this month when we salute our youth to be on the positive side—to stress achievement, not delinquency.

We want in clear terms to tell youth what the Nation offers in work and educational opportunities.

We want to point out the tested values and advantages of our democratic system.

We want to say to youth: "There are rewards for constructive effort and achievement, and your future is not padlocked."

We want to tell them that serving and assisting our Government is an honorable, respected career, whether in the home town or on the national level.

The campaign to give youth "a place in the sun" is being spearheaded by the Theatre Owners of America, an exhibitor organization comprising theatre owners in all parts of the Nation.

It is no self-seeking enterprise. We are merely helping to "carry the ball" on a forward-looking youth project that resulted from the findings of the National Conference on Prevention and Control of Juvenile Delinquency, called by Attorney General Tom Clark.

Every segment of the motion-picture industry has volunteered its full cooperation and time.

This work will be further dramatized when President Truman dedicates a Youth Month stamp on August 11.

We expect, through every possible channel, to set forth the wholesome citizen-building activity of the Nation's youngsters. Newsreels are now busy recording various youth endeavors. Editorial and sports writers, columnists, and working newspapermen have signified their full support.

We are busy contacting radio commentators, magazine writers, church, and welfare groups to give the widest possible focus to the Youth Month celebration.

Tied up with this great effort must be a publicity drive to awaken parents and community leaders to the importance of better home atmosphere, improved schools and housing; improved and expanded recreational and vocational facilities.

I am counting on you to "shoot out" a memo to your entire personnel to help us highlight Youth Month in September. The attached press book may give you an idea of its scope.

For a freer and safer America—let youth know they belong.

All the best,

GAEL SULLIVAN

The President's Message

OF
HON. MELVIN PRICE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. PRICE of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt from the Washington Daily News for July 31, 1948:

IT TOOK COURAGE FOR HT TO APPEAR BEFORE CONGRESS

(By Eleanor Roosevelt)

HYDE PARK.—It was brought to my attention the other day that motor travel in the East has fallen off about 30 percent this year, and that many restaurants, cabins, and road stands are noticing that people are not spending so much money on meals and knick-knacks as they ordinarily have in the past.

On short trips and day outings more people seem to be taking picnic lunches with them and eating them by the side of the road.

This is one of the results of inflation and high prices. It means that the cost of living is so high that an increasing number of people find costly vacations impossible.

It may well be, as some newspapers have pointed out, that President Truman had an eye to politics when he called the Congress in special session. The point is not, however, whether this accusation is true or not, for it is still true that Congress needed to be called into session and to finish some of its work. It must have taken courage for the President to appear before this Republican-dominated Congress in person. He cannot delude himself into thinking that its Members are friendly toward him. So, it would seem that he really has a sense that certain things are of paramount importance—important enough to tell them to Congress face to face.

One newspaper stated that in his explanation of inflation the President had been superficial. I wonder if the people of the country need much more information on this subject. It has become something that affects their daily lives and they see the results of it every time they go to a store. I must say that some of the things the President said struck me as being very pertinent, such as, "high prices are not taking time off for the election. High prices are not waiting until the next session of Congress."

The first two points Mr. Truman mentioned in his message—the imposing of an excess-profits tax and putting controls on consumer credit—may not be completely effective. They are, nevertheless, two things that have proved their value in the past.

It has been said certain prices that have gone up, such as steel, have not gone up anywhere near as much as farm prices. I have not followed the rise carefully enough to be sure whether this is a correct statement. But I cannot help wondering whether the excessive rise in farm prices is because farm prices were so much below what they should have been and that they had further to go before they could be compared at all with industrial prices.

The whole question is a difficult and confusing one. Nevertheless, I cannot believe that the Congress cannot find a solution if it really would forget political advantage and look upon this as one of the essential problems to have behind us before again recessing.

Indictment of Reds Is Move To Prevent Sabotage of United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an article by Constantine Brown that appeared in the Brooklyn (N. Y.) Eagle on Friday, July 30, 1948:

INDICTMENT OF REDS IS MOVE TO PREVENT SABOTAGE OF UNITED STATES

(By Constantine Brown)

Indictment of the leadership of the American Communist Party on charges of advocating the overthrow of the Government of the United States is a belated attempt to throttle the one big internal menace to America's security and national defense, but it comes in time to prevent the Communist machine from carrying out its principal mission in this country, which is to cripple America's war effort by sabotage if we ever become embroiled with Soviet Russia.

Ample time was taken in the preparation of the indictments—more than a year was devoted to investigation—and action was taken with extreme deliberation and consideration of a mass of evidence. There can be no contention that the indictments were the result of excessive zeal to purge the United States of Communists or of lack of examination of evidence.

The question of whether the Communist Party will be permitted to function as a fifth column for Soviet Russia within the United States comes now to a head in advance of the outbreak of a shooting war.

It comes also at a time when Soviet Russia—perhaps anticipating the approach of armed conflict—has begun feverishly to tighten its lines and to fasten more securely its hold not only on its satellite states in eastern Europe, which would be essential to Russia's conduct of war, but also on the foreign Communist parties in non-Communist countries, whose work on Russia's behalf has been cut out for them.

In order to avoid confusion of thinking on the whole matter of Communist activity within the United States it must be kept clearly in mind that if the Communist Party were purely and simply a political party, based on an economic and social philosophy which called for rise to power by American constitutional methods and thereafter the application of its radical economic and social doctrines by our traditional legislative methods, there would be no grounds for objection to communism's participation in the American political drama.

The party is not, however, a political activity in the same sense that the Republican and Democratic Parties are political activities. The Communist Party takes its orders from Moscow. Many of its leaders have been trained in Soviet Communist schools, where the burden of their instruction is the technique of revolution and sabotage. It has devoted its efforts to creating chaos in the American economic sphere by fomenting strikes and strike disorders.

The Communist Party leaders are not being prosecuted, therefore, for their purely political opinions. They are not being prosecuted for their thoughts, and their rightful desire to see this country develop along lines of their own liking.

The Communist leaders are being prosecuted, however, because they sit at the top of an extensive machine with its tentacles in every part of the country—which is devoted to the violent overthrow of our form of government, and the subjection of the American people, through their defeat by force of arms if necessary, to the Soviet Communist form of government.

In its last analysis the whole question is not one of communism so much as it is a question of subordination of the American way of life and the American form of government to Russian imperialism, which can never completely dominate the world as long as the United States stands as a rallying point of resistance. Without the American determination to defend democracy and freedom throughout the world the non-Communist nations would be easy subjects for Russia's domination.

The United States represents the chief obstacle to Soviet Communist aims. It has made itself, therefore, the implacable foe of aggressive communism and it is this country which is most sensitive to Communist infiltration.

A start is being made on the extirpation of the Communist espionage and sabotage machine in this country and as this campaign gains in momentum the national defense will be strengthened in direct proportion.

Hampton Roads Attacks Oil Pollution

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PORTER HARDY, JR.

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, a new public-service activity is expected to be inaugurated in Hampton Roads, Va., this week. Steamship operators will have available to them an accessible facility for easily and inexpensively disposing of bilge and ballast water containing oil refuse. I believe that our port is the first in the world to take this constructive step toward eliminating the serious oil-pollution menace which affects our entire coast line.

Oil pollution of Virginia waterways and beaches has done tremendous damage to our sea-food industry and our beach resorts. Besides this, the accumulation of oil under docks and piers creates a serious fire hazard to water-front commercial property.

The people of the Hampton Roads area decided something had to be done about the situation. The spirit of cooperation which was manifest by Federal, State, and local public agencies and private citizens made it a real pleasure and privilege for me to work with them in seeking a solution to the problem. They set up a working committee and studied the subject with a oneness of purpose and determination which was truly inspiring.

Two Virginia congressional districts were affected. I was especially grateful to our colleague, Mr. BLAND, for his enthusiasm and constructive cooperation. We joined with representatives of the city governments of Norfolk, Portsmouth, Virginia Beach, and Newport News. Chambers of commerce of these cities and of Ocean View, the Hampton Roads Sanitation Commission, the Hampton Roads Maritime Association, the State Port Authority of Virginia, the Army district engineer, the commandant of the Fifth Naval District, the commandant of the Fifth Coast Guard District, and various private firms and individuals gave the problem their thoughtful attention.

The course of action decided upon can truly be said to represent the joint thought and study of an alarmed and determined community. Everyone worked together for the common good.

The service about to be inaugurated will provide a barge to receive the oil-bearing refuse. Ship owners will pay a nominal charge for the service, and revenues from this source together with income from oil reclaimed are expected to pay the cost of providing the service.

Existing law forbids dumping oil-bearing waste in coastal waters. Thus, at present, in order for a ship's master to comply with the law he must incur the heavy expense incident to taking his ship more than 50 miles off shore before discharging the material. The other alternative is to violate the law, ignore the damage caused, and run the risk of apprehension and the imposition of penalties.

Enforcement of the law is extremely difficult and penalties now provided have proven ineffective in controlling the situation. My colleague, Mr. BLAND, has introduced a bill (H. R. 4468) to increase the penalties and we should take early action on this legislation.

This new public-service facility at Hampton Roads will be operated by the Hampton Roads Sanitation Commission. Its manager, Mr. Reid W. Digges, is taking every means at his disposal to enlist the voluntary cooperation of ships' masters who enter the port. I am confident that we shall observe a vast improvement in the oil-pollution situation shortly after the facility begins operation, and I feel that early passage of Mr. BLAND'S bill will accelerate the complete elimination of oil pollution from our waterways.

I congratulate our people for their constructive and cooperative efforts. It was a real pleasure for me to work with them and participate in their discussions and planning. I am glad to have had a part also in securing a Federal appropriation of $50,000 for the furtherance of this work.

The rest of the Nation will be interested in observing the development and progress of the forward steps taken by Hampton Roads. Perhaps our pioneering may show the way for solving this problem nationally.

Hon. Ralph Henry Cameron

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARENCE J. BROWN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following biographical sketch of Hon. Ralph Henry Cameron by James M. Barney:

I

Among the outstanding pioneer builders of Arizona must always be included the name of the Honorable Ralph Henry Cameron, last Territorial Delegate to Congress and later United States Senator from this State. Cameron, still hale and robust, is a man of genial temperament, likable qualities and friendly disposition. But above all, he is indomitable and persevering in his undertakings and a real fighter for right and justice—truly a worthy representative of the great Cameron clan of bonnie Scotland, famous in song and story, to whom Ralph Cameron claims distant kinship.

II

Born in the historic community of Southport, Maine, young Ralph Cameron was given the education then available in the public schools of his home county, adding to this well-grounded beginning home study and wide reading. At the age of 20 he answered the call of the West and soon found himself in Arizona, where he resided in various of its counties, pursuing such vocations as were then common to the country. Eventually he settled permanently in northern Arizona, making Flagstaff his home and center of business activities.

III

Exploring the famous Grand Canyon country with others in search of mineral wealth, mining locations were made deep down in that stupendous and awe-inspiring gorge. Then began the building—by slow and laborious effort—of what is known in the historical annals of that country as the Cameron Trail, that leads from the rim of the canyon to the bed of the Colorado River thousands of feet below.

Begun as a mining project, Cameron's associates—one by one—became wearied of the undertaking, for it was a heart-breaking venture, only for men of courage and determination. As his companions became discouraged and wanted to quit, Cameron bought them out. For 13 years Cameron packed copper ore out of the Grand Canyon by trail to the rim and from there hauled it overland 73 miles to Flagstaff for shipment. Those were the days of hand drilling, of the pick and shovel, of pack trains and great freighting outfits. Those were the days when the pioneers of Arizona were beginning to develop its natural resources by hard work and pure nerve.

Later Cameron sold out his mining interests, retaining his trail as an attraction for tourists. This resulted in long years of litigation with the Santa Fe Railroad, a powerful corporation in Arizona, which first brought Ralph Cameron into prominence and gave him wide publicity as a fighter who never knew when to quit. The railroad company had acquired the branch line running from Williams, Ariz., to the rim of the Grand Canyon and the upper end of the Cameron Trail. The railroad people, therefore, wanted Ralph Cameron out of the way. But when the knock-down-and-drag-out struggle was over, the Santa Fe henchmen were indeed glad to limp out of the fight and leave Ralph Cameron master of the field of battle and the Cameron Trail—now known as the Bright Angel Trail.

Cameron has mined and prospected in the Colorado River country from Hoover Dam to Bright Angel Trail and knows all about the Colorado River, from personal experience and from first-hand information.

IV

In Coconino County, Ralph Cameron became widely known and extremely popular. On April 22, 1890, he was appointed sheriff of that county and thereafter was twice elected to the same office. In 1896 he married May Spaulding, of San Juan, Wash. In 1906 he was elected to the board of supervisors and became chairman of the board. Both as sheriff and supervisor, Cameron gave efficient and satisfactory service to the people of this county.

He built many roads and trails in the Grand Canyon country and laid out the first wagon road from Flagstaff to Grand View Point over which tourists could travel in visiting the canyon; and he constructed at that time what is known as the Grand View Trail to the bottom of the big chasm. He was also instrumental in arranging the first stage service from Flagstaff to the Grand Canyon and was the first resident of Coconino County to put up money for the building of the railroad line from Williams to the canyon.

V

It is conceded by most thinking people that every great leader of a state or nation is generally credited with some outstanding accomplishment during his lifetime by virtue of which honor and distinction are freely accorded him by his fellow citizens. To Ralph Cameron will always attach the distinctive honor of being Arizona's Delegate to Congress who secured the Territory's statehood enabling act, a task which he accomplished in the first term of his service at the National Capital. That he was able to secure the help of powerful political allies in order to bring the statehood issue to a successful conclusion reflects everlasting credit on Ralph Cameron, since others for decades had labored long and unsuccessfully to reach the same objective. The fight for statehood for Arizona had been started a score of years before and, although many political promises were made during that time, nothing had ever been accomplished.

So when in 1908, destiny beckoned to Ralph Cameron to take the leadership in Arizona's long struggle for statehood he accepted the challenge and became the Republican nominee for Delegate to Congress with the strict understanding that if elected and he failed to obtain statehood for Arizona, he would never again ask for endorsement at the hands of Arizona's voters. With that tacit understanding, Ralph Cameron entered the electoral contest of 1908 against that redoubtable Democratic leader of territorial days, Marcus Aurelius Smith, who had never up to that time, tasted political defeat. Mark Smith had been repeatedly elected as Delegate to Congress on the plank that he would obtain statehood for Arizona—a service he never performed. After a whirlwind campaign—a typically Cameron campaign—the Republican candidate was elected by a magnificent majority over the veteran Democratic leader. Cameron went to Washington and the statehood bill was passed. Ralph Cameron had kept his first promise to the people of Arizona.

VI

In 1920 Arizonans again called upon Ralph Cameron for help. The farmers along the Gila River, especially in the great Casa Grande Valley, wanted the San Carlos Dam built. For years they had spent time and money in fruitless efforts to have a dam constructed on the Gila River in order to conserve the floodwaters that at times came in torrential volume down that erratic and turbulent stream. Ralph Cameron, the old fighter from Coconino County, again laid aside his business affairs and once more offered to go to Washington and have the San Carlos Dam built. He promised the people of Arizona that if they would elect him to the United States Senate, they could rest assured that their dream of a dam on the Gila would be fulfilled. The people took Ralph Cameron at his word and elected him United States Senator. He went to Washington as Arizona's junior Senator and before his term was up the money for the construction of the San Carlos Dam—now called the Coolidge Dam—was appropriated and work upon the dam started. In due time this dam was completed and is today one of the important and substantial units of Arizona's irrigation system. Ralph Cameron had kept his second promise to the people of Arizona.

And, by the way, Ralph Cameron is the only Republican who has ever been elected to Congress from the State of Arizona, a fine tribute to the personal worth and popularity of the man himself. In the National Capital he was affectionately called the "sage-brush Senator" from Arizona.

VII

While Ralph Cameron was in Congress as Delegate and Senator, the following Federal projects and undertakings—all of the greatest benefit to Arizona—were completed:

The Laguna Diversion Dam across the Colorado River, above Yuma, was completed and put in operation.

The town of Parker, located on the Colorado River Indian Reservation, was laid out and lots sold to the public. Parker is now one of the thriving communities in Yuma County.

Appropriations were obtained by Senator Cameron for the building of the suspension bridge across the Little Colorado River at Cameron, Ariz. This bridge, an important link in Arizona's highway system, has enabled travelers to visit northern Arizona.

Senator Cameron obtained for Arizona the veterans' hospital at Tucson, one of the largest institutions of its kind now operated by the Government.

By using, with skill and discretion, his great influence in Washington, Senator Cameron was able to defeat what was known as the Swing-Johnson bill. This unfair measure was intended to deprive Arizona of all water rights in the Colorado River and, if it had passed, would have meant the ruination of this State.

These are only a few of the activities that Ralph Cameron accomplished for Arizona during his years of service in the National Capital.

VIII

For a decade Senator Cameron's business activities have taken him out of Arizona for much of the time. But on his return home some time since, he found Arizona facing the greatest crisis in its history—a crisis brought about by a long-continued drought. Rainless months have followed one after another until the lack of water is threatening the very life of the State. The people of Arizona—especially the residents of the Salt River Valley—demand a solution to these almost intolerable conditions before it is too late. The remedy, they claim, lies in getting water to Arizona's thirsty acres from the Colorado River.

And Ralph Cameron, casting business activities aside, has again come forth with a vital suggestion—that if the people of Arizona send him back to Congress he will get them water—all the water they want—from the Colorado River. So he has become a candidate for the Republican nomination for Congress from Arizona's First Congressional District, making a Cameron promise that, if elected, he will bring water from the Colorado River to central Arizona. A Cameron promise has never been broken in the past—it has always brought results. And the people of Maricopa County—casting bias and partisanship aside—will do well now to ponder seriously Senator Cameron's potential promise—for the destiny of this rich county hangs today in the balance.

Federal Amusement Tax

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RAY J. MADDEN
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, considerable opposition to the present Federal amusement tax is evidenced by both the public and cafe owners and the musicians throughout the country.

The following article in the Washington Daily News of Monday, August 2, 1948, brings out the facts regarding the serious hardship which this tax is working on all concerned:

CAFE OWNERS AND MUSICIANS ASSAIL FEDERAL AMUSEMENT TAX

It's the consensus of most parties concerned that the only way to bring the entertainment industry out of its near disastrous slump is for an immediate repeal of the 20 percent Federal amusement tax.

In this instance the hard-hit restaurant and night club proprietors see eye-to-eye with the musicians', waiters', waitresses' and barkeepers' union. The third party directly affected—the ever-paying consumer—most assuredly favors such action.

Classified as a luxury assessment when put into being, it has turned out to be nothing of the sort. What it amounts to is this: If you go into a cafe for dinner and a couple of drinks, the question of whether you'll be taxed or not depends entirely upon the type of entertainment the establishment provides. Wired music, juke boxes, television, and like mediums can be used according to the tax provisions without extra charge to the customer.

Musicians may play for listening with no tax. But the minute the same musicians add any singing to their repertoire, the tax goes into effect. The same holds true if they play for dancing.

The results are obvious. The guy who has to pay the tab has stopped going to places where he has to dish out an extra dollar on every five he actually spends. Consequently the bistro proprietors are keeping their entertainment in no-tax categories.

As Paul Schwarz, president of the local musicians' federation puts it, "The tax will just about put us musicians out of business and on relief. It's ironical that the mechanical devices are not taxed but that the same places are penalized if they dare give a livelihood to musicians. These establishments provide the last employment opportunities to the majority of musicians."

A prominent hotel executive who wishes to remain anonymous goes down the line with Mr. Schwarz. He says not only the tax discriminates against musicians, but it has caused him to shut down his supper club.

The man in the street doesn't hesitate to voice his views on the subject. One called the tax "highway robbery," another said he was "staying away from taverns and buying his own bottle." A hack driver believes an adjustment on the amusement tax would increase his night business "three or four times."

Stage acts, whose appearances are all placed in the luxury or 20 percent category, are squawking that the interpretation limits their rights to earn a living.

An informal poll on the part of this writer shows only 25 percent of the places which used entertainment a year ago are using it today.

All concerned are trying to bring the matter up before Congress in the present session.

Inflation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HENRY M. JACKSON
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. JACKSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Denver Post:

INFLATION WEAKENS MIGHTY ARM OF UNITED STATES

(By Roscoe Fleming)

Do you remember the man in the poem, out on the lonely road, who "having once turned his head, turns it no more, because close behind, a frightful fiend doth tread"? Now, there was a gentleman that really was a dope. If any normal man ever saw that close behind, a frightful fiend did tread, he'd break all records for the 100-mile dash.

Or so one would have thought. Now, it isn't so sure. Because the conduct of some of our national political and business leaders makes the guy in the poem seem rational by comparison.

They are trudging phlegmatically along, trying to ignore the reality of the most frightful fiend of our time and the fact that they are at least partly responsible for materializing it.

This fiend is inflation. It is a very special sort of demon. It slides its filching hand into the poor man's purse, and places what it finds there in the profiteer's pocket.

It especially hates pensioners, people living on annuities and on the income from savings, and on insurance; white-collar workers, and in general all poor folk, the two-thirds of our people who live, because they must, on small incomes. It sneers in their faces even as it picks their pockets.

This is that demon we were warned against and begged not to help during the war; from which we were truly told our country was in more danger than from Hitler, Mussolini and Tojo put together.

This demon weakens the mighty arm of Uncle Sam, weakens his ability either to wage war or to maintain peace. Had it not been curbed during the war, our public debt would now be a third of a trillion dollars.

This is that demon which since the war—and particularly since its friends took over Congress—has robbed the ex-GI of his prospective home and the civilian of his hard-won savings, those savings with which he bought Victory bonds to help win the war.

This is that demon which silently, like a thief in the night, is taking from the pockets of all Americans who dont have big incomes, 5 or 10 times as much as the Republicans boast of having saved them in the tax-reduction bill.

In other words, if your income is such that you will pay $10 less taxes in 1948 than in 1947 because of that tax bill, you must hand it right back out, and about $90 more, just to live not quite as well as you did last year. But the Republicans don't boast of that.

This demon prepares the way for eventual recession and panic. He does this by raising the price of goods so high that the people who make them, the great solid body of our buying public, can't afford to buy them. This has been the immediate cause of all panics.

But this demon is more than a fiend and a precursor of panic. He is the best friend communism has on this earth. He goes before, to prepare the way for the Red destroyer that sets the torch to liberty, freedom, and opportunity.

Inflation does this by making poor people, at long last, so sick and hopeless of the struggle to live that they do not care what happens, and figure that no matter who takes over, their lot can be no worse. There is abundant evidence, everywhere communism rules, that they are wrong. But in other lands they have found this out only when it is forever too late. Will the demon eventually so anesthetize Americans?

Our President has called a special session of Congress in part to deal with the demon. His congressional opponents are scoffing. They say he is playing politics. (If so, it is better politics than theirs.) They say the American way of life does not permit our Government to chain the demon.

They are threatening a do-nothing session, a sit-down strike. Little more would be needed to convince the American people that the blunders, and the service to stupidity, cupidity and the demon, of which some of them are guilty, are inherent in their politics and philosophy. Or that such men are not to be trusted with the full control of our Government.

An Anti-Inflation Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. BYRNES
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the matter of remedying the rising cost of living is everybody's job. It has always been everybody's job. The principal reason we have failed to solve this problem is that the President has failed to recognize this fact. He has followed the old New Deal line of thinking that every ill can be cured by legislation, Government regulation, and control.

During the special session of Congress last fall, I suggested a plan of action to deal with this problem. It called for voluntary universal action to curb the menace of rising prices. The plan was American because it was based on voluntary cooperative action. The plan was American because it called for the cooperation of capital, labor, agriculture, consumer, and the Government to meet the problem.

It is still not too late to put this plan into operation. I again urge its serious consideration.

On December 15, 1947, I urged that the President originate a program of voluntary cooperation by taking the following action:

First. The President should summon to Washington representatives from every element in our economic structure—industry, small business, labor, agriculture, and finance—to meet in conference with the Council of Economic Advisers to the President and leading Cabinet members representing the executive branch of the Government and the Joint Committee on the Economic Report and the Senate and House Committees on Banking and Currency, representing the legislative branch.

Second. This group should agree upon the basic and contributing causes of the inflation. We must determine causes before we study remedies.

Third. The conclusions of the group as to the causes should be given the very fullest publicity in order that all the people may know the full nature of the enemy they are called upon to combat.

Fourth. The conference should break up into economic groups to determine what it can do in its own self-interest to mitigate or remedy either contributing or basic causes of the inflation. Each group should determine what it will do by itself but also what it would be willing to do on the basis of concessions made by other groups.

Fifth. The full conference should then hammer out a voluntary program to curb inflation to be followed by all the groups involved. The conference should call upon the representatives of the executive branch for action which it believes the President should take to further their program and it should call upon the representatives of the legislative branch for action on the part of Congress which it believes Congress should take in aid of the program.

Sixth. The final program should be publicized and promoted with all the vigor that we possess.

Such a program would be equivalent to an all-out national war against inflation—its causes and effects. Such a program could not fail because it would be based upon the genius and the spirit of America. A united America has never failed. A united America would not fail today to meet the problems of inflation.

Last November I also suggested certain aspects of an anti-inflation program that should be given consideration. I suggested:

First. The amount of inflationary money in circulation must be reduced. The Government must reduce expenditures. The Government must operate with a surplus. This surplus must be used to pay off the national debt held by the banks because this portion of the debt is inflation pure and simple. I further suggested that savings bonds sales to individuals be pushed and the proceeds likewise used to reduce the bank-held debt.

Management should refrain from short-term credits which increase check money volume and banks should refrain from lending money for purely speculative purposes.

Second. We must take action to alleviate the impact of the huge domestic demand for goods and services.

Installment buying and consumer credit should be restricted. Bank loans except for productive purposes should be discouraged by increasing the reserve requirements of banks. Speculation on the commodity market should be halted.

Individually we should put off purchases of anything that we do not absolutely have to have. We should put our savings in savings bonds.

Third. Every effort should be made to bring our exports and imports into balance. The Government should exercise its power to control exports. Only those goods should be sent abroad during this inflationary period that are absolutely necessary to meet our foreign commitments.

Fourth. We must concentrate on increased production. We must all take part. The Government must provide an atmosphere in which increased production is possible, and this cannot include restrictive price-control measures. It must encourage investment in productive enterprise; our tax structure must be such as to encourage venture capital seeking new and better ways of producing goods. Our farm program must be geared to a program of plenty rather than a program of scarcity. Labor, working with management, must increase its output per man-hour. Management must increase efficiency, engage in industrial research and seek better ways of producing. It must hold the line on prices, cutting them wherever possible, and its savings in increased production should be passed on to its labor and to the consumer.

Mr. Speaker, when I made these proposals last year, I did not claim that they would end inflation overnight. They are not dramatic; they require hard work, thrift, and the cooperation of all. It is, however, the American way of doing things and I for one have confidence in the American system.

I have only one fear and that is that the driving force to initiate this program is lacking at the present time. The program calls for leadership by a Chief Executive who has confidence in the American system. It calls for leadership of a Chief Executive who has a sincere desire to stop the spiral of inflation and who is willing to assume the responsibilities that are his.

I am pleased, Mr. Speaker, to find that in many aspects the proposals that I made last year and that I repeat today are concurred in by the American Federation of Labor and by the Chamber of Commerce of the United States. The fact that these two great organizations—one representing business and the other labor—still have faith in a voluntary program should give us courage.

Mr. Green, president of the A. F. of L., appeared before the resolutions committee of the Republican National Convention the latter part of June and presented his program to cure inflation. I quote:

> We demand an effective and comprehensive program to curb inflation. This program should mobilize the voluntary efforts of all groups of citizens, business, labor, consumers, farmers, and supplement voluntary effort with Government action where and when necessary.
> For more than a year inflation has been cutting away the purchasing power of the American people. Large segments of our population, workers, pensioners, annuitants, persons living on small incomes, are seriously affected. Due to high prices, several million families are unable to buy sufficient quantities of the necessities of life. More than 12,000,000 families spent more than they earned in 1947, either to meet high living costs or to buy the family equipment they needed, according to a Federal Reserve Board study just released.
> The consumer price index of the Labor Department, after declining from January through March, rose again in April to a new all-time peak, slightly above the previous high point. Prices of the necessities of life will probably continue to rise unless effective measures are taken to check inflation. The demand for American goods under our program for European aid and our increased military appropriations exert an upward pressure on prices which further threatens the standard of living of American workers and other low-income groups. While consumer prices rose 14 percent in 1947 over 1946, incomes of American consumers rose only 10 percent. A program to check this price rise is essential.
> Already a number of leading manufacturers have shown their desire to bring about a much needed downward adjustment of prices. Inflation can be checked, however, only by a concerted effort of all groups. Under a free enterprise system the first step should be a vigorous program of voluntary action. Such action must be initiated by the Federal Government calling upon citizens' organizations to develop a joint program and mobilize their efforts to make it effective.
> The program of the Republican Party to curb inflation should make the following provisions:
> (a) Authorize the economic advisers to call into consultation cooperating committees of business men, labor, agricultural and other groups to develop a joint program to check inflation. The full influence and prestige of the United States Government should be placed behind this voluntary effort.
> (b) Strengthen the voluntary allocation program for scarce materials already operating under the United States Department of Commerce.
> (c) Follow monetary and fiscal policies which will check abnormal increases in money supply and bank credit.
> (d) Carry on a vigorous program to sell United States savings bonds to American consumers.

In its publication Business Action, the Chamber of Commerce of the United States on July 23 presented the following program to meet the problem of inflation:

> 1. Restraint should be exercised by agriculture, business, and labor in the determination of prices and wages. No single type of income—to farmers, workers, or businessmen—can alone be regarded as the cause of increases in the cost of living. All are the result of inflationary factors, although each contributes to the final result.
> 2. Intensive study should be given to monetary and fiscal measures designed to reduce the rate of increase in the supply of bank deposits and currency. The appropriate agencies of the Government should make strenuous efforts to develop and apply a monetary policy capable of curbing inflation.
> At present opinion is divided in this field. The administration seems never to have faced the implications, for Treasury and Federal Reserve policy, of the possible rejection or failure of its proposed remedies.
> Federal Reserve officials are not in agreement concerning the possibility of control with existing powers and there has been little public discussion of the possibility of preserving short-term order and stability in the bond market and curbing expansion in the longer run.
> In peacetime, fiscal and monetary measures, rather than direct economic controls, are the most effective means of dealing with inflation.
> 3. Strenuous efforts should be made to reduce the expenditures of Federal, State, and local governments, through a search for and the elimination of waste, inefficiency, and unnecessary expense.
> Services necessary to national security, safety, health, and productive efficiency should not be impaired and aid programs should not be blindly slashed, but the latter should be carefully scrutinized to ensure that their benefits are commensurate with their costs. Long-term improvements—Federal, State, and local—involving capital outlays should be postponed wherever possible.
> 4. Appropriate public and private agencies should give every encouragement to increased savings by consumers and should urge caution in the utilization of all forms of credit.

Mr. Speaker, I agree thoroughly with the program called for by these two organizations. They represent what is to me the only true American answer to the problem of high prices.

If the President is sincere in his expressed desire to curb the menace of inflation he should immediately take steps to put this program into operation.

Labor-Management Relations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WAT ARNOLD

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Speaker, when Congress began considering a revision of laws covering relations between labor and management, the country had for a long time been experiencing the dire effects of very serious work stoppages due to strikes. Something had to be done for the good of the whole economy.

That consideration resulted in the passage of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, known as the Taft-Hartley labor law, which you will recall was extremely controversial at the time it was under discussion and when it was passed.

The act was necessary to bring the relations between labor and management more nearly into balance, which, as I see it, is the prime function of the Federal Government in any instance where the welfare of more than one State is affected.

We have in this country three great pressure groups, legitimate pressure groups, not the intensely organized minority groups which are purely selfish lobbies for a specific piece of legislation. These pressure groups constitute the basic segments of our economy—labor, agriculture, and business, and by business I include industry and finance, as well as the distributive and service businesses. I consider it the duty of the Federal Government—all government, for that matter—to try to maintain an even balance between the three, for, unless there is balance, our entire economic machine will run down.

From time to time one group or the other may be in the ascendancy. This was true of management for a number of years, and as a result labor's progress was behind that of management and our economic machinery suffered.

In order to right that wrong the National Labor Relations Act was adopted during the mid-thirties. The Congress recognized that labor required some legislation to correct unfair advantages in the hands of management. The law was adopted in the House of Representatives by voice vote, so clearly was the need recognized.

During the subsequent years it developed that the labor relations law needed some overhauling because that law, in practice, was placing too much power in the hands of labor leaders. The Labor-Management Relations Act was designed to correct the weaknesses of the National Labor Relations Act of the thirties.

I think we did a pretty good job. When you compare the task of the Federal Government with that of a baseball umpire, or football referee, and use similar standards to judge our decisions, it looks like we did a very good job in adopting that legislation. Labor leaders, particularly unscrupulous labor leaders, did not relish that legislation. On the other hand, the National Association of Manufacturers is not satisfied with it either.

And the real test of any law is whether the general public is better off after enactment than it was before. The 1947 Labor-Management Relations law passes that test with flying colors.

We are into the new year with more equitable industrial relations prevailing and in prospect than in any year in recent history. Some differences will arise, of course, but the over-all picture for stable industrial relations during 1948 is definitely encouraging. With the exception of the wage issue, which is always present, most of the bitterly fought controversial issues have been handled so as to greatly reduce their potential for friction at the bargaining table.

However, the wage issue will always be present and a vital issue it is. The cost of living is always high. Consumer price indices are nice to talk about and point to, but the cost of living is still high regardless of what the indices indicate. Wages never seem adequate.

The rights of working men and women to seek higher wages, to seek them through organized collective bargaining, and to strike in order to obtain higher wages are not abolished by the 1947 Labor-Management Relations Act. The rights of czars to dictate to union members and locals were, however, restrained, and that was good.

Woodrow Wilson once said, and I quote:

> The history of liberty is the history of limitation of government power, not the increase of it. When we resist, therefore, the concentration of power, we are resisting the processes of death, because concentration of power is what always precedes the destruction of human liberties.

That is what we did when we passed the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947. We helped resist the concentration of power in the hands of labor leaders. It mattered not that the majority of those leaders were able, wise and unselfish men seeking only to improve the welfare of the workers. What mattered was that some few were unscrupulous and selfish, seeking only to extend their own power. These were the men who were wrecking the labor movement and who were undermining the economy of our Nation.

Briefly, the 1947 Labor-Management Relations Act, more often referred to as the Taft-Hartley labor law, does four things. These are:

First, it places labor and management on a par as to their bargaining powers and makes them both responsible for living up to their signed contracts.

Second, it brings peace to the troubled field of labor relations.

Third, it eliminates undesirable labor practices that had developed under the National Labor Relations Act, such as the jurisdictional strike and the secondary boycott. Such strikes and boycotts, aimed not at "scab" labor but at a rival union, were costly to employer and employee alike, and to the general public, and never added one dime to the pay check of the worker.

Fourth, and finally, the act makes paramount the interest of the general public over that of any minority group, whether employer or employees.

Milions of rank-and-file union members favor the provisions of the 1947 Labor-Management Relations Act. If you ask these workers whether they like the Taft-Hartley Act, they will tell you "No," but the majority of them favor the individual provisions of the act.

Opinion Research Corp., an independent organization, recently conducted a poll of employees. In polling workers, the researchers highlighted the contradiction I have just mentioned that although a majority of the workers said they were opposed to the so-called Taft-Hartley Act as a whole, when polled on specific provisions of the act they overwhelmingly expresed their approval of them. The results of the poll among union members themselves reveals that the majority of union members favor the Taft-Hartley labor law.

The percentage of favorable answers from all workers was somewhat higher in each category than was the percentage from union members only. Among all workers there was a majority favoring every provision. Let me repeat that—among all workers there was a majority favoring every provision. And we must remember that the responsibility of Congress does not extend just to organized labor; that responsibility extends to every man and woman who works for wages or salary.

Why are rank-and-file union members more and more expressing themselves as favoring the provisions of this law? Because it has given the local unions greater control over their own affairs and emphasizes the rights of individual union workers as against the power of union leaders.

In fact, many union leaders, while publicly still opposed to the bill, are privately beginning to acknowledge that it is not nearly so bad as they have painted it. What has brought them to this realization is the shocking and sobering impact of a law recently passed by the Labor Government of England, giving that Government the power to direct where every man between 18 and 50 must work, and also where every woman between 18 and 40 who is not tied down with children must work. The law carries a fine of $500 and 3 months in jail as a penalty. That is a real slave-labor bill, and that term has no application to the 1947 Labor-Management Relations Act.

Let us run down a few provisions of the act and see just what it does for labor.

In the first place, there are many provisions to protect the individual. Take one example: As an individual, a worker may bring an unfair-labor-practice charge against his employer or against his union if he is threatened, discriminated against, or if the union causes him to lose his job for any other reason than nonpayment of dues.

The right of workers to organize and bargain collectively is guaranteed and protected. Employers are prohibited from coercing or intimidating workers when they exercise their rights. In addition, unions are in turn prohibited from coercing or intimidating employees to induce them to join the union.

The check-off is not banned, but if the worker does not consent to this method of payment of union dues, it is not compulsory. Furthermore, there is a protection against excessive or discriminatory dues.

The act provides that an employer or a union may be sued in court for violation of a collective-bargaining agreement. But any money judgment obtained against a union for contract violation applies only against the organization, or its assets. No liability arises against an individual member or his assets.

The constitutional right of an individual to quit work at any time, for any reason, is recognized and protected. Union strikes are legal unless they violate a contract, are called because of a representation or work jurisdiction dispute with another union, involve a secondary boycott, or are found to constitute a national emergency.

A national emergency is a strike or lock-out which a Presidential fact-finding board determines would imperil the national health and safety. If a court grants a Government request for an injunction, such a strike or lock-out would be illegal for a period of 80 days. If the dispute is not settled during the 80-day period, the workers involved would then vote secretly whether to accept the employer's final offer of settlement or to go out on strike. Even in cases of national emergency a strike is only delayed, not prohibited.

The union shop, wherein workers in the bargaining unit are required to join the union within 30 days is permissible if approved by a majority of all eligible employees by secret ballot after union-management agreement. However, the requirement of union membership before accepting a job is not permitted. A union member may not drop his membership if the contract requires him to remain a dues-paying member.

Unions are required, however, to file an affidavit that local and national officers are not members of the Communist Party. If any such officers are party members, or if any union fails to file an affidavit, that union loses its right to appeal to the National Labor Relations Board. Unions must provide membership with a complete financial report each year.

Labor organizations, as such, are prohibited from making political contributions. This same law applies to corporations. Union members may contribute all they want to, and may engage actively in politics.

The law further provides continuing studies in the field of labor-management relations. Recognizing that labor has the right to organize and bargain collectively, and that its only weapon is the right to strike, no one wants to take that right away. However, some way must be worked out whereby labor and management can settle their differences, and protect the basic right of folks to work as well as the right to strike, without resorting to serious and prolonged work stoppages which cause everyone to suffer.

This was a bipartisan effort and when it was finally passed, Democrats and Republicans joined hands in voting for it; in fact it could not have been enacted into law without the Democrat votes. A splendid example of the unity of the Eighteth Congress when the welfare of the Nation was involved in the issue.

Congress Has Thrown Away the Rubber Stamp

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALBERT L. REEVES, JR.
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. REEVES. Mr. Speaker, as a part of my remarks, I include an excellent statement made a few days ago by George S. Benson, president of Harding College, Searcy, Ark., with regard to the record of the Eighteth Congress:

The Eighteth Congress was our first post-war Congress, and it faced mountains of problems. Moreover, it was a Congress of a different party from that of the President. Thus handicapped, the Eighteth Congress worked hard to get as far as it did. By working hard, sometimes despite disagreement with President Truman, the Congress that recently adjourned ran an independent course and made a great record.

During depression days a bewildered Congress took orders straight from the strong man. This was approved by many as the best kind of unity for the Nation. Unity is a fine thing. When purposes are sound and methods are right, unified action can benefit the people. But the United States Congress was not created by the founding fathers to always say "Yes" to the Nation's President.

NO RUBBER STAMP

The whim and fancy of a political leader, no matter how great the leader, may not be to the best interest of our people. That is perhaps why the founding fathers created the three branches of our Government as they did: the legislative to pass the laws, the executive to carry them out, and the judicial to provide justice. Knowing these things many persons wondered whether Congress would ever regain its rightful place.

The Eighteth Congress has done just that. If ever a Congress denied the rubber-stamp process, this one did so. The stature and dignity of Congress appears to be returning. It would hardly be possible for Congress in a nation like our own to please everyone. But every one of us can be thankful that the Eighteth Congress has done much to restore the integrity and strength that our National Legislature should have.

THE PEOPLE'S SAFEGUARD

This Congress did not always say "Yes" to the President. There were times when it said "No." At least four major bills were passed over the veto of the President. The Eighteth Congress was doing things upon its own conviction, following its own best judgment. Doing this, Congress showed that the ultimate welfare of the Nation was its objective.

There was no vindictiveness, but instead a determination to rely upon its own judgment rather than upon that of the Executive alone. Our people can find no quarrel with this, once they think about it. It is only that kind of Congress which will continue to safeguard the welfare of our Nation under the Constitution. We can never afford to forget the importance of Congress as the people's will in this Republic.

MORE THAN 1,000 BILLS

The hard work of the Eighteth Congress is shown by the fact that it passed more than 1,000 bills and conducted numerous investigations. It studied and acted upon nearly 30 major pieces of legislation. Among these was the Taft-Hartley bill—called the slave-labor bill—which has not enslaved but has already shown its workability. Of great significance too was the leadership that Congress showed in world affairs.

The Eighteth Congress led the Nation out of isolationism and into the leadership of freedom-loving nations of the world. Congress did much to retrieve lost prestige for America in the realm of international affairs. I believe every citizen should appreciate the great job the Eighteth Congress did in bringing back the integrity of a legislature which was set up to represent the people. I am grateful to our hard working legislators.

Do-Nothingism Disgusting

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK M. KARSTEN
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. KARSTEN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Peter Edson, from the Washington Daily News of July 31, 1948:

DO-NOTHINGISM DISGUSTING

(By Peter Edson)

It just ain't fair to the human mind, body and spirit, at the fag end of a hot July, to be subjected to the stuff now being dished out in Congress.

When the last of the three political conventions ended in Philadelphia, you could almost hear the cross-country sigh of relief. Along with the rustle of the hot wind in the growing corn you could hear the national whisper. "Well," it said, "thank goodness we don't have to go through that again for another 4 years."

You came wearily back to Washington and what did you find? You found that all three national conventions had merely been moved to the Capitol.

So here you are stuck, with your vacation plans canceled, listening to the same old political speeches by the same old political hacks. The Republicans accuse the Democrats of "playing politics." Of course, the Democrats are playing politics. Of course the Republicans are not playing politics. In a pig's eye they're not.

Cockily confident they'll win the November election, the GOP leadership has openly embarked on a policy of delay and do-nothingism.

The party line seems to be that everything is now just dandy, and the less that's done, the better Republican chances will be.

House Majority Leader CHARLIE HALLECK, of Indiana, gets on the air and says this year's Republican tax cuts reduced the price of everything we buy, "from a haircut to an automobile."

That was the day your wife told you the price of round steak for grinding into hamburgers had gone up from $1 a pound to $1.30. That was also the week in which General Motors announced it was raising the price of all autos 8 percent.

You would think even a Congressman could understand $1.30 a pound for hamburger and that something ought to be done about it.

But no. These master minds like to confuse it all up. So they say the high cost of hamburger is not due to high-priced steers or worn-out old dairy cows, nor to the high cost of corn to fatten them. They ignore completely any thought that high support prices on all major farm products have anything to do with the fact that the cost of food has gone up 47 percent in the last 2 years, since price controls were removed. That would be too simple, too direct.

Instead, they start talking about stabilizing the dollar. They start talking about sterlizing the gold hoard and the debt. They talk about trade balances, export controls, and the need for having the United Kingdom revalue the pound sterling. They talk about controlling the volume and velocity of credit. And they start talking about raising the bank reserve and rediscount rates.

To the average hamburger consumer, if you take all these $2 words and grind them up, what you get is not cheaper hamburger, but political baloney which, at $2 a word, is pretty high.

If that's all they do, they might as well go home now. And stay there. Good riddance. Don't come back. Let the voters elect a brand new bunch of Congressmen in November and send them on to Washington next January, when it will be cool enough to think about changing the Federal Reserve rediscount rate, and trying to understand it without getting mad.

All that's wanted now is a simple little cut in the cost of hamburger, haircuts, and autos.

As for this crowd of Congressmen who refuse to do anything about such matters now, phooey!

Water Pollution—Sold Down the River

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE G. SADOWSKI
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. SADOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include a very powerful and sensible editorial which appeared in the July–August issue of Outdoor America, the official publication of the Izaak Walton League of America. This editorial was written by Kenneth A. Reid, executive director.

SOLD DOWN THE RIVER

No subject in the whole conservation field has received so much talk and so little action as water pollution. If there is a subject under the sun that has been investigated to death it is water pollution. Yet after the House committee got through butchering the already weak Barkley-Taft bill (S. 418) the resulting abortion which Congress then passed would spend another one hundred and thirty-odd million dollars over a 5-year period to support and aid technical research to devise and perfect methods of treatment of industrial wastes which are not susceptible to known effective methods of treatment.

The effect of this poisonous declaration of policy by Congress is threefold—and all bad.

1. It admits something that is not so, namely, that for the great majority of industrial wastes there are no known effective methods of treatment.

2. It encourages, and gives a statutory base, for a recalcitrant industry to make such a claim, even though it may (and in most cases does) know how to treat its own wastes.

3. It transfers from industry, where the responsibility belongs, to government, where it does not belong, the job of discovering and developing industrial-waste treatment methods.

It is hard to believe that the House committee members, who framed this amendment, were so naive as to believe that this amendment was needed to make the bill effective. We know that certain die-hard polluters wanted just such language in the bill to relieve them of their proper responsibility. The saddling of that responsibility on government gives them a legal alibi to sit back and do nothing until government, at great and needless expense, attempts to duplicate the knowledge on treatment methods which industry, in most cases, already possesses but does not use because it is not obliged to do so.

If the intent was to enact an industrial polluter's protective measure, the Congress succeeded admirably. In effect, this amendment says to industry, "Don't bother about further research for methods for proper treatment of your industrial wastes. If you don't know how to treat them, simply say so, and Uncle Sam will do the job for you. And, until we are able to give you that information, the law protects you."

Many industries have squarely faced their problem and solved it. Others are in the process of doing so. Still others have been stalling these many years. The natural effect on industry will be a cessation of further research, since that responsibility is transferred to government.

There is no more reason why Congress should accept the responsibility for discovery and development of industrial-waste-treatment methods than for it to take on the responsibility for discovering and telling industry methods of manufacturing its products. Should such a law as the latter be enacted there would be a mighty howl from industry against government interference. There is no howl from industry in this case. The reason is obvious.

In the Senate hearings on the Barkley-Taft bill, the preponderance of testimony favored strengthening the bill. Yet, when the bill came out of the Senate committee, it was watered down by a hamstringing amendment requiring the consent of the affected State before the Federal authority could become operative. When it went to the House committee, all the weakening amendments were retained and the poisonous declaration of policy, discussed above, plus certain appropriations to support it, were added. It is pertinent to inquire why committees of Congress hold hearings if they entirely disregard the preponderant weight of testimony, as was done in this case. Is our Government "a government of the people, by well organized special interests, and for well organized special interests"?

Even after the weakening amendments by the Senate committee, the bill might have been considered a very small step forward. But, after the House committee got through with administering the industrial polluters' prescription, it became a definite step backward and a victory for continued pollution. In effect, it declares a 5-year moratorium on continued industrial pollution—at an expense to the taxpayers of approximately $130,000,000. Congressmen and Senators who prate about economy should hang their heads in shame for authorizing an expenditure of $130,000,000 for a 5-year insurance policy for continuing industrial pollution under the guise of a pollution-control bill. Congress has clearly evaded its responsibility to the public and attempted to administer a dose of soothing syrup while doing the bidding of those who want no interference with the continuance of their present polluting practices.

We wish to make the prediction here that 5 years hence, we will be forced to admit that the present bill was a failure. But we will not only have lost 5 years—we will have gained another costly bureau which will continue indefinitely feeding at the public trough.

KENNETH A. REID,
Executive Director.

Housing Show-Down

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN E. FOGARTY
OF RHODE ISLAND
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. FOGARTY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Washington Post of July 31, 1948:

HOUSING SHOW-DOWN

The arrogance of the Republican runaround on housing is rivaled only by its political inanity. If the GOP leaders in the House were bent upon alienating war veterans and the army of other Americans desperately seeking places to live, they could have chosen no more effective means than their present outright refusal even to consider a housing bill urgently recommended by the President, sponsored by the leader of their party in the Senate and indeed passed by the Senate during its last session. This amounts to an open proclamation that the building and real-estate lobbies completely govern housing policy so far as the House leadership is concerned.

By deciding to recess for 3 days of what was called as an emergency special session. House leaders have effectively barred any chance of discharging their Rules Committee from further consideration of the Taft-Ellender-Wagner bill before August 23—the first discharge day the bill could be forced out by petition. And Republican leaders now assert that they mean to bring the special session to an end before that date. There are already more than 150 signatures on the discharge petition toward the 218 necessary to make it controlling. We hope that Representative HELEN GAHAGAN DOUGLAS is correct in asserting, "They won't dare adjourn if a majority of the House signs."

The country is entitled at the very least to a show-down vote on this measure. It seems to us, therefore, that Walter Reuther, president of the UAW-CIO, was quite justified in demanding from Governor Dewey "an immediate expression of your attitude on this vital issue." The Republican nominee for the Presidency can no longer escape commitment on housing. Continued silence on his part will constitute consent to the conspiracy to kill the Taft-Ellender-Wagner bill. By the exercise of affirmative leadership, he can revive it and bring about its enactment into law, together, as we have already said, with the allocations which would enable the measure to produce the houses.

Inflation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. GLENN BEALL
OF MARYLAND
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. BEALL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an editorial appearing in the Cumberland Daily News, Cumberland, Md., on Saturday, July 31, 1948:

BLAME FOR INFLATION TO REST WITH PRESIDENT TRUMAN

Unless we miss our guess, the Republican-controlled Congress is going to unfold the truth about the start of inflation, and in the end place the blame on the doorstep of President Truman.

It has been disclosed that Mr. Truman was handed the key to a deflationary move when Marriner Eccles, a member of the Federal Reserve Board, testified before a congressional committee that some of the proposals the President now makes (and demands that he be given power to put them in motion) were presented him nearly a year ago but he did not, with a Presidential election in the offing have the political courage to accept them. Instead he demoted Mr. Eccles for suggesting the plan to check inflation.

Mr. Eccles has told the Senate committee on banking that the proposals Mr. Truman now advances are, in the face of present conditions, about half deflationary. He said further that it is too late to control inflation, and the country is certainly going to have a bust.

It does little good to talk about inflation without mentioning some of the things which are principally responsible for it—big wage increases, big exports under the Marshall plan, increased consumption by Americans under the influence of higher earnings. And always back of price controls is the ugly reality of the black market.

It is an established fact that nobody is more to blame for inflation than Mr. Truman himself, unless perhaps it is Mr. Henry A. Wallace. Both of them had the bright idea that it was possible to have big wage increase without corresponding increases in prices. Every intelligent school child knew that wasn't true, and it has proven most untrue in practice.

As an illustration, Mr. Truman, according to accurate records as pointed out by Mark Sullivan in his column on this page today, helped start the inflationary period 18 months ago. Today he finds that it has, because of his false theories, got out of hand, and he is now endeavoring to cover up his odd thinking by attempting to place the blame on the Eightieth Congress, which came into being 11 months after he made his first faulty move.

It will be recalled that in January 1946, a year before the Republicans gained control of the legislative branch of the Government, that Mr. Truman, after earlier adopting a policy of raising wages, intervened in a strike of the CIO steel workers' union and through this intervention, a wage raise of 18½ cents an hour was made. The very next day Mr. Truman disclosed, at a press conference, that the Government pricing agencies had agreed to grant a $5 a ton general increase in the steel industry to compensate for the raise in wages. It resulted in starting the climb of the cost of living. It has continued. Now he wants to pass the buck to Congress. Few will be fooled by his tactics.

Further, spokesmen who were to detail Mr. Truman's plans hesitated to do so. Secretary of the Treasury Snyder backed away from his task when called to testify before the Senate Banking Committee, suggesting that Chairman McCabe, of the Federal Reserve Board, precede him. Mr. McCabe finally agreed, but the testimony he offered did nothing for Mr. Truman's case. He said that for him, price controls would be the last resort. He certainly did not offer anything which would convince the Congress and the American people that Mr. Truman was prepared to lead them out of inflation.

In other words, Mr. Truman was not prepared to submit a concrete program of operation when he called Congress into special session. He and his aides are still groping about in the dark in a desperate effort to hit upon something, and at the time try to dispel a conclusion the American people have already come to, that the whole set-up was a political maneuver of a man striving to ward off defeat at the polls next November.

High Cost of Living

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN E. FOGARTY
OF RHODE ISLAND
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. FOGARTY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter:

INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF MACHINISTS,
DISTRICT LODGE NO. 64,
Providence, R. I., August 2, 1948.

Hon. JOHN E. FOGARTY,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: It is with great concern over the present economic plight of the common people who face the daily increase in the cost of living and of the inactivity of the present leaders in Congress, that I am writing to you to bring all possible pressure on these people responsible for this inactivity.

Surely, no group of men, regardless of their political beliefs, can deliberately sabotage a program which would grant immediate relief to millions of workers and their families, a program such as has been laid before them by President Truman.

I urge you to use your influence among your fellow colleagues, to the end that the people of this great Nation will be given some form of protection against the present exploitation by profit-hungry businessmen who are certainly not serving the Nation in this great crisis.

Respectfully yours,

JAMES A. ANNABLE,
Business Manager.

Special Session of Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. VITO MARCANTONIO
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am including herein a radio speech delivered by me over Mutual Broadcasting System, Monday, August 2, on the special session of Congress:

I wish that this special session of Congress could be on television. The American people would witness a most revealing spectacle. It would convince Americans that there is no real difference between the Republican and Democratic Parties. For instance, if the Senate proceedings of the last few days were on television, you would see an Alphonse-Gaston act being performed by the Republicans and the Dixie Democrats on the issue of civil rights. You would see the politest filibuster that has ever been put on in Congress. Newspapers try to give you the idea that there is a real fight going on here between the Dixie Democrats and the Republicans. However, television would show you that they are both shadow boxing and hitting each other with powder puffs.

The Republicans are pretending to get passed legislation abolishing the poll tax. The Dixie Democrats are putting on a filibuster. The Republicans are doing nothing to break the filibuster. In a day or two you will witness the burying of the anti-poll-tax bill again and a love feast between these two fighters. Yes; you would witness a phony fight if the special session were televised. Now, you may ask, where are the Truman Democrats, who, with Truman, have been going around proclaiming their friendship for civil rights and for the Negro people. They are where they always have been; far, far away from the fight. Television would show you that they are not even near this fixed fight. They have never fought for civil rights; no more than Harry Truman has ever fought for them. President Truman talked big at the Democratic convention about civil rights and his last two Executive orders proved exactly what we Progressives have always said about his big talk; that is, that when it comes to action the Negro people get nothing. His last two Executive orders proposed some more commissions and investigations. The Negro people are tired of being commissioned and investigated. General Bradley has since announced that segregation will continue to be the policy of the armed forces. This announcement exposes the emptiness of President Truman's Executive orders. Yet the Truman Democrats, relying on this last gesture of the President, are playing their usual role in the Senate. They are not lifting a single finger to break the filibuster of their Dixie colleagues. Yes; television would show you the amiable and friendly cooperation of the Republicans with the Dixie Democrats, and with the Truman Democrats nowhere in the scene. You can definitely expect no civil-rights legislation out of this Republican, Dixie-Democrat, and Truman-Democrat Congress. It is the same old merry-go-round; the Republican-Democrat merry-go-round.

How about the high cost of living? You are now paying $1.30 a pound for meat, $1 a pound for butter, and 24 cents a quart for milk. I can tell you right now that this special session of Congress is going to do nothing about it. Why? First of all, we must remember that both parties are controlled by the same big monopolies that destroyed price controls 2 years ago and who do not want price control now.

President Truman has asked for stand-by price controls. Anyone who knows anything about the subject knows that this will not do the job, for what is needed is a roll back of prices to January 1947 levels and real price control with teeth in it; with power given to the Government to seize any industry that refuses to produce at Government fixed prices. Further, President Truman's record is a bad one on this score. In 1946, he removed controls on meat, and in early 1947, he removed all price controls. The Republicans demanded the removal of controls, the National Association of Manufacturers beat the drums against price controls and Truman surrendered. Now, he asks Congress to undo the damage that he himself helped cause. Prices have been going up and up since price controls were removed. Remember who did it. The Republicans and Democrats in Congress, and the President in the White House. How can anyone expect this same combination now to do anything to bring down prices? They will blame each other; but do nothing. It is the same old merry-go-round—the Republican-Democrat merry-go-round.

Let us see what the story is about housing. The Republicans have repeatedly killed housing legislation. This Congress will not pass the Taft-Ellender-Wagner housing bill which would provide housing and give some measure of relief to the suffering millions who find themselves without homes. The Republican leader, Senator TAFT, the other day, disowned his own bill, and stated that it would not be passed at this session. The Democratic record on this score is no better. In the Seventy-ninth Congress it was a combination of Republicans and Democrats that killed the housing bill in committee. In the Eightieth Congress, with a few exceptions, the Democrats have with the Republicans in the House given aid and comfort to the real-estate trusts in sabotaging the public-housing program.

As for housing for veterans, it is to be recalled that it was President Truman himself who scuttled the Patman law by lifting controls and yielding completely to the free-enterprise boys of the Real-Estate Trust. So here again we have the same old merry-go-round, the Republican-Democrat merry-go-round.

However, there is a much more fundamental reason why this Congress or any other Republican-Democratic Congress will never be able to give the people of our Nation housing and relief from inflation. No country can make any progress as long as it exists on an imperialist war-economy basis. War economy means high prices; war economy means Taft-Hartleyized labor; war economy means no civil rights; war economy means no housing; war economy means no social progress. You can't have housing, you can't have effective price controls as long as the economy of a nation is geared to war. There will bo no housing program, and there will be no control of inflation as long as the Republican-Democratic policy of cold war continues. President Truman himself stated on March 17, when he asked for draft and universal military training, that we must prepare to pay the price. Yes; the price that you are now paying is the high cost of living, ever spiraling inflation, no housing, enslaved labor, and no civil rights.

We are now spending for the present cold war almost twenty-one billions; six hundred and forty-two millions for Army civilian programs abroad; five hundred and fifty-five millions for so-called foreign aid, tax refunds; nine hundred and forty-nine millions for supplemental national defense, cash; two billion two hundred and seventy-five millions for supplemental national defense, contract authorization; six billion seven hundred and five millions for national military, 1949; three billion seven hundred and forty-nine millions for Navy, 1949; and six billion thirty-one millions for Marshall plan, 1949.

It is impossible to say what the future costs will be for the next 2 years. Some estimates go as high as thirty billions a year from 1950 on. You can easily see that the country is being daily placed into a war strait-jacket.

On this cold-war program the Republicans and Democrats do not even make a pretense at disagreement. The record shows that they are in unanimous accord in placing our Nation in a war-economy strait-jacket. It is the program of the big trusts of Wall Street. It is Truman's program. It is Dewey's program. It is a program of Wall Street's Forrestal and Snyder, the two dominating figures of Truman's Cabinet. It is the program of Wall Street's John Foster Dulles and Chase National Bank, the masters of Dewey's Republican Party.

Is it any wonder, therefore, that this Republican-Democratic Congress will not give you housing and will not control inflation? And all for what? Not for defense. We are in no danger of attack. Yes; in no danger of aggression from the Soviet Union, despite the tons of newsprint and the billions of radio words to the contrary. All this suffering and deprivation is for the benefit of the Wall Street trusts who seek to control the world for profit and more profit and at your expense.

We of the Progressive Party are united behind Henry Wallace on a platform of peace based on aid to the needy people of the world through the United Nations, and on collaboration with the Soviet Union. We propose to fight the big trusts who control both old parties, and defeat their plan to embroil this world into another war. The Republican and Democratic Parties stand for an imperialist war economy. I repeat, this means no housing, no relief from high prices, and no civil rights. The record of this Congress is clear proof. We of the Progressive Party stand for peace. We recognize that only a peace economy will bring housing, low prices, freedom, and abundance. That is the big, big difference between us and the Republicans and Democrats.

Americans today have been put on the merry-go-round; on the Wall Street Republican-Democratic merry-go-round of boom, bust, and war. We of the Progressive Party fight to take you off this old merry-go-round and no amount of smear, hysteria, and red-baiting will deter us.

Industry Is Termed a Convert to the Psychology of Inflation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAY LeFEVRE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. LeFEVRE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include an article by Mark Sullivan which appeared in today's New York Herald Tribune.

Mr. Speaker, this article by Mr. Sullivan brings up a matter which has greatly concerned me ever since the United States Steel Corp. announced its latest price increase. Personally I believe big business is making a grave mistake in advancing their prices at this time. They should consider the effect of their increases on all small business and the consuming public. They would be the first to howl if the Congress approved of rationing and price controls. Everyone in industry should be willing to work on smaller margins of profit due to the continued demand bringing on greater turn-over. In turn, labor is getting an all time high wage, and with full time employment, they too should be willing to cooperate during this critical period.

Mr. Sullivan's article points out that business statistics again and again show price indexes at an all time high. Thank Heaven there is another all time high which in my opinion, will help reduce the cost of living more than any one thing we can accomplish by legislation, and that is the agricultural reports showing this year's grain crops at an all time high. After these crops are harvested we have every reason to feel that this increase in production will reflect in the prices of cereals and the prices of meat.

Mr. Sullivan's article follows:

INDUSTRY IS TERMED A CONVERT TO THE PSYCHOLOGY OF INFLATION—MARK SULLIVAN WARNS THAT THE NEW ATTITUDE OF BUSINESS INDICATES A SPIRIT OF SURRENDER THAT EXPECTS THE TREND TO CONTINUE

(By Mark Sullivan)

WASHINGTON, August 3.—That inflation and cost of living are at a new height is common knowledge. The public learns it at every counter; those who follow business statistics see the price indexes again and again accompanied by a phrase "all-time high." What is less readily noticed but more ominous is that inflation has increased greatly in mass and momentum; the forces and conditions pushing it are stronger, those resisting it have diminished.

An example is the attitude of heads of industry. Some 2 weeks ago, July 16, the United States Steel Corp. raised wages 13 cents an hour. The raise—and this is the important point—was voluntary, without strike or other controversy. Five days later the corporation took the corresponding step and increased the price of steel $9.34 a ton. Previously, in May, the General Motors Corp. raised wages 11 cents an hour, and last month increased the prices of its cars by 8 percent.

This pattern, raise of wages without resistance, accompanied by increase of prices, is now being followed throughout large industry generally; it is ominously familiar. What is significant is the change of attitude on the part of industry heads. In 1945–46 General Motors fought a strike for more than 3 months. During the same period the United States Steel Corp. and the steel industry fought a strike for a month, yielding only under pressure from President Truman and upon simultaneously receiving from the Administration permission to raise the price of steel $5 a ton.

TOOLS FOR FIGHT USED

The change of attitude from 3 years ago until now is the more marked in that at the earlier time resistance to strikes was made difficult by the Wagner Labor Act, which strongly favored unions. Now, an employer, because of the Taft-Hartley law, is able to meet a strike with some approach to equality. Also, 3 years ago, wage raises were formally supported by the Truman administration as a policy.

Whatever the motives for the change in attitude by heads of industry, the sum of them is an acceptance and sharing of the psychology of inflation. Individual industry heads may have felt that they paid dearly for their resistance to inflation 3 years ago. Or that it is useless for them to stand out in opposition to inflation when the Government itself is promoting it—every demand for a wage raise gives one reason, increase of cost of living, principally food, and the high price of food is kept up by the Government policy of price support for farm products.

Some heads of industry have come, however regretfully, to a realistic conclusion—inflation is here; it produces enormous buying power for a public willing to pay any price, they can sell all the goods they can make, so why fight the tide?

NEW ALINEMENT CREATED

The change of the industry heads created a new alinement of groups and forces. Throughout, labor and agriculture have accepted inflation as giving them advantage, while industry resisted it. The prospect of greater momentum for inflation is obvious.

Adoption of a policy by so important a group as heads of industry cannot but be at once a reflection of a general public mood and a cause of it. Acceptance of inflation, in a spirit of "what's the use fighting"? is a spreading phenomenon. Acceptance of the present degree of inflation carries with it inherently a complacency or spirit of surrender which expects more.

This spirit, as it becomes general, and unless it is formidably checked, passes into a definitely marked stage in the classic course of acute inflation. If people generally expect that goods are going to cost more, that the dollar is going to have less purchasing power, they tend to pass into one of the late stages of inflation not far from the final one. In a spirit of either recklessness or despair they begin to feel it is unwise to hold money, that it is better to exchange money for goods. Such a public mood causes increases in prices to become cumulatively rapid.

Housing

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. A. L. MILLER
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, since Congress a year ago took the controls off houses, starts and finishes have jumped. Private industry will build nearly a million houses in 1948. This is more than in any other year.

In 1946 Congress passed a housing bill and Mr. Wilson Wyatt came as its director. He was given complete power over allocation, prices, subsidies, priorities. He was the Housing Expediter and had unlimited power plus millions of dollars at his command. Yes; he was going to build 2,750,000 houses in 1946 and 1947. What was the result? Less than 500,000 or about one-half the number that private industry will build in 1948.

Mr. Wyatt soon learned that you could not build houses without pipe, brick, lumber, nails, and so forth. Yes; he had the OPA to deal with, some 300 brick plants had closed because of the OPA regulations and prices. All production for legitimate trade was gone, the blackest of black markets had taken over all business. Mr. Wyatt's program died a natural death. There are some now who would revive the creature with all its evils.

Mr. Speaker, President Truman's housing bill would not add one carpenter, bricklayer, or electrician to the labor force. It would not reduce their wages or cause them to produce more. The socialized Federal housing as advocated by Mr. Truman would mean an army of bureaucrats with a host of Government regulations. It would increase inflation.

The President's program would increase the competition for what manpower and materials that are now available. This would increase the cost of housing. It would mean not more houses but more expensive houses. Mr. Speaker, all available materials for houses and the manpower are now being used to the utmost. Some relief in costs could come if the labor produced more. Many complaints come to my office that the bricklayer, for instance, lays half the number of bricks he used to lay but receives twice the pay. This is true all down the construction line. Some of this comes about because of building codes that are outmoded. Some because of union rules under which the worker must comply or lose his job. Would a law cure these evils?

Mr. Speaker, if this country would cut down on our huge exports of lumber, steel, and other items needed for houses, more material would be available and cheaper houses could be built. We just cannot continue to waste, yes, give away our short-supply materials all over the world and not feel the effects at home. In that connection, Mr. Speaker, I was interested in an editorial from London; it states in part:

> Food prices in Britain are only one-half as high as in the United States. British housewives pay 30 cents a pound for butter, 40 cents for rib roasts, 48 cents for bacon, and 4 cents for a pound of bread.
> Big subsidies, United States help, and special deals with foreign supplies are the secret of Britain's low prices.

Mr. Speaker, this means that every family in America helps to pay the grocery bill of our English cousins. We gave them four and one-half billion 3 years ago. Now, under the Marshall plan, more billions. A lot of Americans must realize that through the give-away policies of this administration they pay higher taxes so the British and others can buy for less. This country pays the subsidies. It makes for scarce items and inflation at home. The money of the wage earner is here but the goods they produce are sent all over the world. Just how long can this last?

Now, back to housing, Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the members of this House desire to do everything possible to meet the housing need. Any reasonable action will be taken. I have felt that title 6 of the Housing Act should have been renewed. I realize that a racket has grown up among some contractors and builders and instead of getting a loan of 95 percent on the appraised valuation they were getting up to 125 percent. This must be stopped, safeguards can be applied. If a renewal of title 6 will assist in building low-cost rental housing it ought to be reinstated.

Mr. Speaker, it is folly to talk about building more and cheaper houses if our present export and give-away policy continues. It is foolish to talk about cheaper and better houses until labor produces to the extent it is able.

Mr. Speaker, the answer to the housing problem as I see it, is:

First. Less exporting and giving away of the materials needed for houses.

Second. More production at home of items going into housing.

Third. Labor must be more efficient and give an honest day's work for wages paid.

Fourth. Modernizing our out-moded building codes.

Fifth. Renewal of title 6 of the Housing Act.

I am confident that our America, which now has the highest standard of living in all the world, will move steadily forward with more and more people enjoying the benefits of our form of government. It cannot be done if we take the regimented road of government knows best. We cannot regiment and socialize the life of every American family without losing our liberties.

Food Resources—The Foundation of Greatness

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLIFFORD R. HOPE
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include an editorial from the August issue of the Country Gentleman, entitled "Food Resources—The Foundation of Greatness."

FOOD RESOURCES—THE FOUNDATION OF GREATNESS

It is time for an all-important fact to be recognized. A nation can have a strong and expansive economy only if it has abundant food-producing resources.

The high American standard of living and our thriving industrial system, with its many employment opportunities, both rest upon this foundation. They developed because we had such abundant resources, and their permanence depends on the continued productivity of these resources.

It is a simple economic truth that has long been unheeded because nobody had to think about it. Food has always been plentiful in this country, in the greatest variety to be found anywhere. With the exception of the periods following the two World Wars it has also been relatively cheap—sometimes too cheap for the good of those who produced it. This abundance of food at a moderate cost has had a vital significance. Over the long period in which records have been kept by the United States Department of Agriculture, food has taken an average of only about 24 percent of the spendable personal income. The food bill was more often below than above this figure.

This left a large margin of the people's earnings to be spent for the products of industry. Nowhere else in the world has so much been left, after food needs were met, to be used in raising the general standard of living. It is this broad margin that has made possible the varied development of industry and the diversity of employment that this country enjoys.

To realize the full meaning of this fact one needs only to look at the contrasting situation in other countries. Even in the low-price years before the last war, and with dominions to draw upon, food took more than 35 percent of the spendable income of the English people. As a result England was never able to develop a high internal standard of living comparable to our own and had to rely on the export of a major share of its industrial production. France and Italy, where the food bill takes even more of the personal income (70 percent of the average workingman's earnings according to latest figures), have lagged industrially behind us. South American countries, because of the low quality and rapid exhaustion of their food-producing resources, have found it hard to develop industrially. In China and India, where food absorbs most of the personal income, there is little industry and a tragically low standard of living.

Food is the primary necessity of life. People spend their earnings for it first. Because we have always had plenty of food at a reasonable cost a large surplus of personal income has been available to support the complex industrial system, widespread employment, and all the variety of professions and services that flourish in this country. The food supply in itself constitutes our biggest industry, providing the main source of new wealth, the largest transportation load, and more employment in production, distribution, and services than any other branch of our economy.

This abundance of food-producing resources and the chain of effects it has created have worked to the advantage not only of the nonfarming public but of the producers themselves. American farmers have been able to apply the intelligence, ingenuity, and large-scale production methods that make our agriculture utterly different from the types existing where land and water resources are poor and limited. Moreover, the expanding population engaged in other pursuits has provided them the greatest market with the highest buying power available to farmers anywhere on earth.

The lesson ought to be so plain that nobody in this country is unaware of it. An ample and permanent food supply is a national essential.

Its assurance requires two necessary measures. One is a program that will safeguard farmers while they are producing an adequate supply of food. The other is the conservation of our food-producing soil and water resources. These resources are now being depleted at a rate that, in no distant time, will surely undermine the foundation of our economy. An effective national land policy that will conserve and maintain them is to the direct personal interest of every individual in this country. It is one issue on which there should be united support.

Abundant food-producing resources are indispensable to the kind of America that we have and want to keep.

In the Interest of Accuracy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LOUIS LUDLOW
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I am asking for this time for a final word on the war referendum resolution. I do so because of two recent references to that proposal which have come to my attention. One of these is by Prof. Robert Phillips, of Purdue University, in a book entitled "American Government and Its Problems." In this book Professor Phillips says:

For several years the sanguine Congressman, Louis Ludlow, labored to secure an amendment to the United States Constitution providing that our Government should never involve us in an "offensive" war against a foreign power unless with permission of the electorate secured in a national referendum. Thus far his proposal does not appear to have met with favor.

One can easily excuse Professor Phillips for not being acquainted with the limitations placed on the war-making power proposed in my resolution which by no means would have prevented "offensive action" without a plebiscite under certain conditions, as he had no personal connection with the events leading up to the introduction of the referendum resolution or the action taken thereon.

But one might well have expected a little closer degree of accuracy on the part of the former Secretary of State, Hon. Cordell Hull, who was one of the leading participants in defeating the referendum resolution. I do not say this in criticism, as I have genuine affection for Mr. Hull, and I am sure he has for me. We have been friends over 40 years. His reciprocal trade agreements plan stamped him as one of the world's greatest statesmen.

In his memoirs now on the bookshelves in all leading book stores Mr. Hull deals at length with the subject. I quote only in small part as follows:

Representative LOUIS LUDLOW, Democrat of Indiana, had introduced in the House in February 1937, a resolution for a constitutional amendment whereby the authority of Congress to declare war would not become effective (except in case of invasion of United States territory) until confirmed by a Nation-wide popular referendum. The resolution having been referred to the Judiciary Committee, which held it without action, LUDLOW sought the signatures of a majority of the House to a petition to bring it before the House as a Committee of the Whole. After months of striving he still lacked sufficient signatures. Then came the sinking of the Panay and within 2 days he had the requisite number. Instantly a group of peace organizations threw their influence behind the resolution. Congressmen quickly began to feel the pressure.

Although the President and I realized that much time, perhaps years, must flow before the Ludlow amendment, after passing Congress by a two-thirds majority, could be approved by three-fourths of the State legislatures, we determined to fight it at the outset. We aimed our guns at the vote that would take place on January 10, 1938, to discharge the Judiciary Committee from further consideration of the resolution.

He then describes how the State Department prepared a letter for the President which the latter sent to the Speaker over his signature, pointing out that the proposed amendment "would be impractical in application and incompatible with our form of government and would encourage other nations to believe that they could violate American rights with impunity." This letter was read to the House.

Mr. Hull wrote a similar letter to the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee and National Chairman Farley telephoned to all of the Democratic Members of the House to enlist their support:

When the measure came up for debate, which was sharp, Mr. Hull adds, Speaker Bankhead left his chair to speak against it. Finally on January 10 the vote was taken and the proposal lost by the close margin of 209 to 188. This episode was a striking illustration of the strength of isolationist sentiment in the United States, since the administration had to exert its whole force to prevent—barely to prevent—approval of a proposal designed to take one of the most vital elements of foreign policy, the authority to declare war, out of the hands of the Government.

He might have added that as the date for the vote approached the President sent Assistant Secretary of War Louis Johnson on a speaking tour across the country to arouse sentiment against it.

Incidentally, Secretary Hull is incorrect in stating that the sinking of the Panay brought support enough to complete the signatures of my discharge petition. I know of a number of Members who believed in the principle of the resolution and who intended to support it but changed their minds after that unfortunate event.

I would have hoped that Professor Phillips and Mr. Hull would have read the actual text of the resolution that was voted on before they made their comment. It was read to the House by Representative Hamilton Fish, of New York, whose grandfather was a member of the Lincoln Cabinet, and it is found on page 278 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 10, 1938. It was as follows:

SECTION 1. Except in case of attack by armed forces, actual or immediately threatened, upon the United States or its territorial possessions, or by any non-American nation against any country in the Western Hemisphere, the people shall have the sole power by a national referendum to declare war or to engage in warfare overseas. Congress, when it deems a national crisis to exist in conformance with this article, shall by concurrent resolution refer the question to the people.

SEC. 2. Congress shall by law provide for the enforcement of this section.

SEC. 3. This article shall become operative when ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by conventions in the several States, as provided in the Constitution.

It will be observed that under this resolution the power to declare war would remain in Congress not only in case of attack on the United States, as stated by these commentators, but there would be no referendum in case of attack or threatened attack on any nation in the Western Hemisphere by any non-American nation. Please note that even the threat of an attack would suspend the operation of the referendum. This is quite a different proposition from the one described by these critics. The resolution was made this broad so as to protect not only the United States but all of the countries of the Western Hemisphere under the obligations of the Monroe Doctrine.

Looking backward, I cannot escape the belief that the defeat of the resolution was one of the tragedies of all time. The leadership of the greatest and most powerful nation on earth might have deflected the thinking of the world into peaceful channels. Instead we went ahead with tremendous pace in the invention of instruments of destruction, frightful bombing planes and, most awful of all, the atom bomb. We used the atom bomb to wipe out two great cities in Japan without giving the inhabitants time to evacuate. That is a chapter of our history which as one American I deplore. There is no doubt in my mind that potential enemy nations, watching our every move, now have all of our secrets.

It is now too late for war referendums. World peace psychology has been forfeited forever. The nation that wins the next world war will be the one that is quickest on the trigger with its fast bombing planes and atom bombs. Largely by our leadership we have ushered in a new age of world insecurity, but I cannot help thinking what might have been.

Do What?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HARVE TIBBOTT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. TIBBOTT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Johnstown Tribune, Monday evening, August 2, 1948. This editorial clearly explains the purpose of this special session of Congress:

DO WHAT?

The hysterical cries to Congress to "Do something! Do something!" are about as helpful as they usually are when mishap impends.

Do what?

Just what can Congress do to avert the consequences of many years of accumulated inflationary pressures?

It can, of course, turn the job over to the President by giving him extraordinary powers over the whole national economy, to regulate, to regiment, and perhaps to stifle productive enterprise. That is the only concrete suggestion that has been made by the national administration and its backers.

Congress does not propose to give the President these powers. It said so at the regular session, and nothing has occurred since then to change its point of view. As a matter of fact, the President was quite aware that Congress would not approve his anti-inflation program when he called it back. And we think a great majority of the public has no wish to return to rationing, price and wage controls, and all the paraphernalia of what the President once called police state economy.

Inflation is not turned on or off like a spigot. It is a product of gradual growth, and it will be cured, if at all, gradually. The cure will require self-restraint on the part of the people themselves—a cessation of wage demands, a willingness to increase the rate of productivity and quit feather-bedding practices, increased production on the farms without unreasonable price supports that give the farmer all, and the consumer none of the fruits of that greater production.

There must be a willingness to quit borrowing to buy unneeded new automobiles and other new equipment, since every borrowed dollar adds to the stream of money in circulation and that stream is already overflowing its banks. There must be a reduction in unnecessary government expenditures, to make up for the extraordinary and necessary expenditures for our foreign policy program. The unproductive Federal pay roll must be reduced.

For too many years the people of this country have been depending on Government to do things for them, and not realizing that in the end they are the ones who must do it—either voluntarily or by government compulsion. It may be, if this attitude continues, that we shall come at last to a semi-totalitarian form of government—perhaps to socialism or some other type of statism—in which Government can tell each of us what we must do, and force us to do it.

But the philosophy of the Republican Party is that we must first exhaust all the possibilities of voluntary cooperation, before those controls are put upon the American people. To these cries of "Do something!" the Congress replies: "Do it yourselves. You have the power, and the ability, and the right." The admonition may be unwelcome to those who subscribe to the theory of statism and State power over the individual. But it is a wholesome bit of advice if we would save the spirit of free enterprise and individual initiative.

No Session Like This One

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIS W. BRADLEY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. Speaker, I commend the following editorial from the Long Beach Press-Telegram, of Long Beach, Calif., of July 27, 1948, to the membership as a clear expression of the thinking of the people in my own congressional district:

NO SESSION LIKE THIS ONE

Persons with a taste for research have been delving into history for a precedent for the session of the Eightieth Congress which opened yesterday and got down to business today with President Truman's address to a joint session of the Senate and House of Representatives. The closest approach to a precedent they found was the special session called by President Franklin Pierce in 1856. Apparently there is no other instance of Congress having been summoned to Washington after adjournment in an election year.

The parallel between 1948 and 1856 is not complete. President Pierce was not nominated for reelection. He did not call Congress to consider an extensive program, but only to pass the Army appropriation bill which had failed of passage in the regular session. President Truman not only has proposed extensive legislation, but he is asking in large part for legislation over which he and the majority in Congress already have disagreed. His contention is that he is giving the Republicans an opportunity to fulfill promises made by them in their recent convention in Philadelphia. However, the present Congress was not elected on the Philadelphia platform. Republicans in the Eightieth Congress have substantially made good the pledges upon which they were elected in 1946. If he wants to hold the GOP Members of Congress to account for fulfillment of the 1948 platform, he will have to persuade the voters next November to retain him in the White House. All of the signs indicate that the people have decided to elect a new President to serve with the Eighty-first Congress.

After his party lost control of Congress in the 1946 elections, Mr. Truman said he wanted to cooperate with the Republican majority. Perhaps he was sincere in making that statement, but, if so, the record of his vetoes of legislation and his bitter attacks on Congress shows that he changed his mind. His present attitude is disclosed by his choosing to announce his intention to call Congress into session in an aggressively partisan speech in the recent Democratic National Convention. There is no precedent for that strange combination of performing an important Presidential function and playing politics.

It would be natural for the Republicans in Congress to play politics, too, in this ill-advised session. However, the crisis in Europe and the continued inflation in the United States are too serious for Members of Congress, irrespective of party, to go about their work in any spirit but a solemn devotion to their country. The duty of the majority, who have a more recent mandate from the people than Mr. Truman, is to draw up their own legislative program.

Address of Hon. Joseph W. Martin, Jr., of Massachusetts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LESLIE C. ARENDS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include in the RECORD the following address of Speaker JOSEPH W. MARTIN, JR., over the facilities of the American Broadcasting network, Friday, July 30, 1948:

President Truman called Congress into special session to deal with what he terms a "national emergency." The Congress, through a formal legislative resolution, invited him to present his recommendations in persons before a joint session of the House and Senate. That address contained very little that had not been presented several times before to earlier Democratic Congresses.

Let me emphasize that, notwithstanding the seriousness of our international situation, where we have been given to understand the issue of war or peace is being determined, not a single word was uttered upon that subject. It has been made clear by the President that our special session is not required by the foreign situation.

No Member of Congress, whatever his party, is adverse to returning to Washington, or remaining here as long as necessary to serve the national interest. What many do object to is to be called back because of an emergency or crisis in the political fortunes of the President.

The Constitution confers upon the President full authority to call Congress into extraordinary session. But that power was vested in the President by the founders in the belief and understanding that it would be used wisely—with discretion—never for narrow partisan purposes.

For the first time in more than 100 years, we find Congress in special session at the President's call, in the midst of a decisive Presidential campaign.

Never before in our whole national history has a special session of the Congress been announced by the President from the platform of a national political convention.

Our people are properly concerned and dismayed by this flagrant abuse of the President's emergency powers.

That this extraordinary power may have been invoked for purely partisan purposes brings anxious inquiries from the country.

If one constitutional power may be abused for political advantage, what assurances have the people that other great powers now sought by the Chief Executive would not be subject to like abuse?

Everything in the recent history of the United States—indeed, everything in the recent history of this troubled world—admonishes us today that Congress should examine with utmost caution and deliberation any and every proposal to grant additional discretionary powers to the President.

Emergency powers should be granted by Congress only when there is overwhelming evidence that they will be directed to sound national solutions—by administrators who have a program.

This administration has no program.

It is confused—torn by bitter political strife within its own ranks.

When the committees of Congress began hearings this week on inflation, the administration advised they were not yet ready to present their program.

They want rationing powers, but they say they would not use them—for awhile.

Republicans in Congress, and throughout the country, are well aware that many grave and urgent problems confront this Nation today.

We know that inflation slowly eats away the substance of the people and lowers the standard of living in every American home. Inflation means high prices.

But the administration will not be ready until next week to send a responsible Cabinet officer to Capitol Hill to tell the Congress how they propose to deal with inflation.

Only yesterday the Washington Star, a great independent newspaper in the Nation's Capital, said in an editorial, I quote:

"In view of all the tub-thumping which has accompanied the President's call for a special session of Congress to deal with high prices, one would think that, at the least, some member of his administration other than Paul Porter, whose real job is that of private lawyer, would have been ready to lay specific proposals before the legislators. But the administration is far from ready."

Neither the Treasury nor the Federal Reserve Board was ready to present a program this week.

As the Washington Star concluded in its appraisal of the situation before us today:

"The effect of all this is to * * * discredit the note of urgency which Mr. Truman has sought to inject into his demand for immediate action by the Congress."

Regardless of the motives which impelled the President to call Congress into special session at this time, it is the sworn and sacred duty of Congress to give serious consideration to all proposals designed to aid in solving our serious national problems.

That we shall do.

I can assure you that the Republican Congress and the Republican Party are eager to check inflation and to build more houses.

But I can further assure you that we are not going to be stampeded into adopting methods which have been discredited and proven faulty through bitter and costly experience. We love our country too much to do that, no matter how alluring such proposals may sound in a campaign year.

We know that we cannot solve our great national problems simply by giving Washington bureaucrats unlimited powers. We have seen them at work—and so have the American people. No Republican Congress will make that mistake.

Everyone recognizes that there is a housing shortage. It has been accumulating for 15 years under the hit-or-miss policies of socialistic regimentation.

But I want to point out that at the present time we are constructing approximately 1,000,000 new housing units a year, and that is being done under the free-enterprise system. That is about twice as many new houses each year as were built under the police-state methods which were in force during 1946, when Mr. Truman and a Democratic Congress were in power and had complete charge of the situation. We are building twice as many houses today as we did before President Truman liquidated his own Housing Expediter.

Mr. Truman talks about inflation. We in Congress tried to do something about inflation by curtailing Federal spending, but received no cooperation whatever from his administration.

We know that big Government spending is inflationary. The President's own economic advisers have told us many times that the best way to stop inflation is to reduce Federal spending. That is why we fought to curb spending, even though it meant postponing many projects which may be desirable when funds are available.

The administration responded by thinking up new spending proposals, knowing that we who have a stern sense of our responsibility to the people, would be obliged to turn down those new requests.

That we were right in our economy crusade is indicated by the recent statement of Secretary of the Treasury Snyder, that the next fiscal year may find us in the red again. The fact is that we would be in the red today, except for our budget cuts, amounting to more than $2,500,000,000.

Yet, despite this warning from the Treasury, the President now asks for appropriations for new projects from the special session which ultimately would require a budget of 60 billions a year if all the Truman program were enacted.

Everybody knows that would mean doubling the income taxes, and that would sink America.

Do you wonder that some men in Congress ask aloud if many of these recommendations are not, for the most part, purely political?

Since Congress convened last Monday, the Members have been working hard on various proposals for legislation designed to correct some of our present difficulties. Committees are holding hearings on various bills, and the leadership is prepared to give the right-of-way to such measures as seem to hold hope of solving our problems.

But let me emphasize that we are not going to pass bills simply because Mr. Truman says they should be passed.

Do not forget that the Members of Congress are the direct representatives of the people. We are your voice in government.

Ours is the duty to make certain that the laws enacted are those wanted by the people not by the President.

As Speaker of the House, I say to you, "We shall never surrender to the bureaucrats."

This great American Nation was once described as "a magnificent spectacle of human happiness."

The purpose and program of the Republican Party in 1948 is to recapture that great vision to bring a feeling of security, and steadfast national purpose into every home in the land.

Your Eightieth Congress has made a fine record to date.

It has reduced taxes. That tax reduction was an increase in the take-home pay of every worker in the land.

It has put the brakes on wild and reckless Federal spending, the real generator of inflation.

It gave the country the first balanced budget in 17 long years.

It made a substantial start on reducing the heavy war debt. It has driven the Communists from high places in Washington.

The people applaud this bright record of constructive achievement.

The American people have faith in their Congress.

They regard Congress as the real defender of American freedom—the real protector of the Constitution.

The people are heartened that this Congress will not let them down; will never accept the defeatism of compulsion, regimentation, and controls.

Controls are not the American solution. These new proposals are but a last desperate grasp for power by an administration which already has lost the confidence of the people in its domestic policies.

This Congress will never rubber stamp left-wing schemes for more spending, and more Government control of everything in America.

In less than 2 years since the Republicans were elected to majority control of the House and Senate, Congress has abruptly reversed America's 4-year drift toward state socialism and eventual national bankruptcy. Today the people have a new faith that the American way of life will be maintained. They have a new faith and confidence in the pledged word of a political party, in the face of the most reckless abuse of the Presidential veto power in all our national history, the Eightieth Congress has made a sure beginning toward reestablishing government by law, not by men.

My fellow countrymen, this is not a time for personal bickering and recriminations.

The world cries for peace, blessed peace, that we may have opportunity to rebuild this shattered planet, and bring security, plenty, and happiness to all.

There is only one country that can lead in this great labor—the United States of America.

For that reason we cannot have disunity, racial, religious, or class warfare.

We have great need to be tolerant and charitable in our thinking and in our actions. We must work, be unselfish, determined to keep America strong, united, and solvent.

We cannot follow false ideals. If we fail, the lights of liberty and freedom will be extinguished for all the world, and the black night of tyranny will engulf us all.

We will not fail.

May God help us, and guide us to His wisdom.

The President's Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. A. L. MILLER

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I feel the Congress should examine very carefully the suggested program of the President and take any action they feel will help stop the spiral of inflation. We must keep our country on an even keel. While it does seem like a continuation of the Democratic Convention when the President informed the delegates he was calling the Congress back, we as Representatives of the people must rise above partisan politics and try our level best to act in the interests of the people. We must examine very closely and with no thought of our political futures all the suggestions of the President. After all he is President and had a constitutional right to call this special session.

INFLATION

The President has rightly said that inflation is our No. 1 problem. I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that if the President needs more power to curb installment buying, credits, interests, and rediscount rates that they be granted but only after a careful study by a committee of experts. The Congress should direct how to apply the brakes on inflation. If he has the power now it should be pointed out to him and their use be urged. I do not agree that another OPA, more subsidies, or that a roll back in prices is the answer.

WHAT HAPPENED TO OPA

Mr. Speaker, the President in his predawn acceptance speech in Philadelphia said the Congress sent him such a rotten price-control bill that he had to veto the bill and then they passed a bill almost as bad and he had to sign it because Congress had gone home. He blamed the Republicans. Well, Mr. Speaker, that was the Seventy-ninth Congress, the House, the Senate, and the administration was under complete control of the Democrats.

The President himself took controls off meat just prior to the election in 1946. He decontrolled most everything right after election before this Republican Congress came into existence. Now he seeks to blame Republicans for high prices. Yes, he says the farmers and laboring men are getting the highest income in history and takes the credit, saying they would be most ungrateful if they did not support his party. In the same breath he blames a Republican Eightieth Congress for high prices. This has a hollow, insincere ring.

The President said in about 15 days we could pass his legislative program. It should be remembered that a Democratic administration had 14 years to pass socialized medicine, Federal aid to education, civil rights, raising minimum wages, socialized housing, and labor legislation; they did not do it. Now why expect a Congress called as it has been, under a political whip, to do in 15 days what his party failed to do in 14 years.

Mr. Speaker, even though the President's proposals seem political, and he asks for supreme dictatorial powers over the people, I do feel that the perils of inflation with its economic chaos must be faced by this body, not as bitter partisans but as conscientious Members of Congress representing the people in an all-out effort to stop the common enemy—inflation. We will differ on how it can be done but by sitting down together as is being done in the proper committees some constructive solution can be reached. Charges and countercharges with name calling is not the answer. Let us consider the President's proposals in a spirit of fair play.

LEADERSHIP NEEDED

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the times cry out for leadership, they call for courage, strength of character, a stoutness of spirit and mind. They call for a ringing and affirmative leadership. This Congress must help supply that type of courage and leadership which will help assure a peaceful world and a domestic tranquility which our people so justly deserve. So, Mr. Speaker, let this Congress get down to a serious, thoughtful spirit of work devoid of politics and do the best job we can for those we represent.

Facts of Civil Rights

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WAT ARNOLD
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an item released by King Features Syndicate, Inc., entitled "Facts of Civil Rights":

FACTS OF CIVIL RIGHTS

By what is euphemistically called civil rights in this campaign is meant the Negro question. And let us call it that from here on. Since the Civil War, the Negro question has been a major American problem, inadequately discussed and considered except by southerners who had to live with it and in recent years by the Communists and their fellow travelers and competing liberals who hope to garner votes out of it.

Under our Constitution and within the sanctions of moral law, the legal equality of Negroes and whites cannot be questioned. Historically and traditionally, the question is not so simple either in the North or the South. Those northern Democrats who make such a terrific to-do about racial discrimination in the South are generally liars—they will not live in Negro areas in their cities; they do not entertain Negroes in their homes; they do not hire Negro secretaries or clerks, except political ones, which is part of the vote-getting technique.

In a word, none of them practice in their private lives what they preach for others. It is a simple matter for a resident of Minnesota or Wisconsin to grow powerfully indignant about a problem that does not face him but that does face a citizen of Alabama or Mississippi. Minnesota's Negro population, according to the 1940 census, was 9,928; Wisconsin's, 12,158. Alabama's 983,290; Mississippi's, 1,074,578.

If the Civil War had not ended in the reconstruction era, we should perhaps today not be facing this problem as the principal campaign issue of 1948.

The northern carpet-bagger and his Negro associates left in the South a heritage of bitterness which has continued to the present time. Franklin D. Roosevelt tried to solve this problem by exporting Negroes from the South to the North, placing them on relief rolls and forcing them into industrial enterprises on a quota basis. Thus, in many northern and western areas, the Negro population increased alarmingly.

The northerners met the problems by segregating Negroes into ghettos. Make no mistake about that: In the North the Negro is as segregated as in the South, in spite of the lies northern politicians tell. Harlem is a Negro ghetto; the Bedford district of Brooklyn is a Negro ghetto; the South Side of Chicago is a Negro ghetto. The technique employed in New York is for the whites to clear out as soon as the Negro moves in.

I am not justifying these conditions either on moral or legal grounds; I am only describing conditions as they exist and I am protesting against lies and liars. The politicians who are shrieking civil rights are seeking Negro votes in the northern cities. They are appealing to prejudice and indignation and they are fanning the flames of race antagonism, not because they want to improve the condition of the Negro in Mississippi but because they want the votes of the Negro in Harlem and South Chicago.

The anxiety of the northern Democrats to be recorded as voting for the civil-rights plank of the Democratic platform after a voice vote had passed it, their insistence upon Senator BARKLEY'S announcement of how they voted, was for the consumption of the northern Negro voter. They fear that if they do not get that vote, Wallace, who represents Soviet racial concepts, will.

Were that the entire story, it would be little more than an appeal for the Irish, the Jewish, or the Italian vote. But this Negro question is pitched on a high emotional level and can result in riots and death. It requires thoughtful and considerate handling. It requires sympathy and understanding. It comes upon us acutely when we dare not have internal disturbances. Those who have gambled upon it may also have gambled upon the domestic peace of the United States.

Price Roll-Back Theory Hit by Record of Facts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIS W. BRADLEY
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. Speaker, the Press-Telegram of Long Beach, Calif., published, on July 30, 1948, the following editorial which I believe to be a fair and well-founded exposition of the record in so far as the President's recent recommendations for price control and roll-back are concerned:

PRICE ROLL-BACK THEORY HIT BY RECORD OF FACTS

Since President Truman forgets or overlooks so much in his proposal to Congress to help the consumers of the United States by rolling back prices, it is necessary to review the record.

With all due respect for him and the exalted office he occupies, Mr. Truman unquestionably is speaking and acting in this matter, not as President of the Nation, but as a candidate. He talks in generalities that have a certain superficial appeal, but which do not stand the test of analysis. He is advocating a theory of Government control of prices which he himself once described as the method of a police state.

Moreover, as Paul Porter, one of the number of New Deal officeholders who tried unsuccessfully to make OPA work, admitted, when questioned by Members of Congress, the bill for a price roll-back sent from the White House to Capitol Hill is a feeble measure which could have no great effect on the tide of inflation which threatens to engulf the United States. An army of bureaucrats on the beaches waving brooms at the oncoming tide might be a spectacular sight, but every sensible person who stopped to think for a minute would know the forces of nature ruling the tides are not impressed by a demonstration of broom wielders shouting their intention to sweep the waters back whence they are rolling shoreward.

Mr. Porter was not definite about the commodities to be controlled by legislation. He mentioned some for "consideration." He tacitly acknowledged that the expression "roll-back of prices" is inaccurate by his statement that what the administration hopes for is not a reduction of prices, but prevention of still higher prices.

Now for the record: All economists agree that the basic cause of inflation, or the high cost of living, is the prodigious scale of Government expenditures in recent years, partly to finance the war. Coupled with this is the effect of the war in cutting down industrial production for peacetime purposes. Furthermore, the exporting of goods to Europe aggravates the economic consequences of reduced production of peacetime goods.

The next most powerful cause of inflation was the administration's mistakes at the end of the war, when it acted on the theory that an industrial slump was about to hit the country and that it was necessary to stimulate the country's purchasing power. President Truman encouraged at that time a general wage increase of 18½ cents an hour, thereby adding to the already great buying power in the hands of the American people. Resulting strikes further reduced the insufficient volume of goods. The double effect of increased costs of production due to wage increases and curtailed production was explosive in its inflationary consequences. The President likewise declined to use credit and currency control. He removed Marriner S. Eccles from the Federal Reserve Board chairmanship because of Eccles' insistence that credit and currency expansion be stopped.

Finally, it was Mr. Truman who in 1946 bowed to the general rebellion against OPA's ineffective restrictions by ordering a free market in meat, which was fast disappearing from legitimate markets and being monopolized by black markets.

Now Mr. Truman urges Congress to try again the methods the country rejected and which he himself found ineffective and called the methods of a police state. To this inconsistency and head-on conflict with the facts, the President is brought by his political advisers' desperate strategy.

The Eightieth Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM S. HILL
OF COLORADO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, there has been considerable discussion, and undoubtedly it will continue, as to the evaluation of the work accomplished by the regular sessions of the Eightieth Congress. As part of my remarks, I wish to include in the RECORD excerpts from an address delivered to the National Retail Hardware Association by William R. Noble, Washington representative of this organization, at their forty-ninth annual convention held in Atlantic City, N. J., July 12, 1948.

The economic life of these United States has grown strong and our standard of living progressed beyond that of any other nation due largely to the organization of independent business firms in villages, towns, and cities throughout our Nation. It is the voice of the retail merchants speaking to you on the work of the Eightieth Congress and their opinions and conclusions are worthy of careful consideration at this particular time when direct attacks are being made not on Members of Congress, but on the institution of the Congress as an integral part of our American Government.

The excerpts from the address follow:

This report will attempt to summarize the legislation considered by the Eightieth Congress, particularly during the second session. The summary and discussion will be confined to those measures which the National Retail Hardware Association has considered to be of most interest to the retail-hardware business.

There have been charges and countercharges relative to the actions of the Eightieth Congress ranging all of the way from opinions that it was the worst Congress in history to the viewpoint that it was one of the best, all of which is entirely natural in an election year. In any event, action was taken on a vast number of bills, many of which involved controversial issues and, of course, many other controversial subjects were bypassed at various stages of consideration.

In general, the Eightieth Congress, which completed its regular session on June 20, can be classified as the most sympathetic to the problems of businessmen of any Congress during the past several years. * * *

In its two regular sessions and one special session last fall Congress took action sympathetic to American businessmen as follows: Refused to grant emergency powers as specifically requested by the President to control prices and wages and to control distribution of scarce goods; rejected proposals to put the Government further in business by turning down Government subsidized public housing, Federal-financed education, and national-health programs; rejected efforts to increase the minimum wage and to increase social-security rates and benefits; reduce income-tax rates for all income brackets, and made the community-property principle applicable for tax purposes in all States; passed the Portal-to-Portal Act and the Taft-Hartley Labor Act; relaxed rent controls and exempted controls on new construction; and provided full public hearings on the need for amendment to the Internal Revenue Code, removing income-tax exemption for competing business cooperatives and the need for clarification of the retail exemption in the wage-and-hour law.

NRHA took an active interest in most of this legislation either directly or in cooperation with other business groups, and by influence exerted through industry committees on which we were represented. Our efforts were primarily focused on three general fields of legislation: (1) At every opportunity we opposed reinstatement of government controls; (2) we assumed a leading role in the fight for a corrective amendment to the Internal Revenue Act which permits cooperatives to escape payment of income taxes on business profits, and we favored a reduction in income-tax rates, particularly through adoption of the community property principle for income-tax purposes in all States; and (3) we actively supported the enactment of the portal-to-portal legislation, and we continued to press for an amendment to the retail exemption in the wage-and-hour law to clarify the retail exemption.

The House Small Business Committee conducted a series of hearings on the co-op tax question early last fall with emphasis on the unfair competitive advantages and its effect on the small-business man. These hearings also established the advantages given cooperatives through Government assistance which is not available to independent business establishments with whom the Government sponsored co-ops are in direct competition.

* * * * *

A series of hearings were conducted last fall by committees of both the House and Senate relative to amending the wage-and-hour law. The hearings arose primarily as a result of proposals to raise the minimum wage from the present 40-cent hourly rate to 65 or 75 cents per hour. We presented testimony to these committees urging a clarification of the retail exemption.

During the earlier hearings before the House Labor Committee, the Wage and Hour Administrator strongly opposed what he termed broadening the retail exemption. During the final stages of the hearings before the Senate committee, the Wage and Hour Administrator himself admitted that interpretations under the retail exemption had resulted in a condition of complete confusion as to the status of retail employees under the act. Although the amendment proposed by the Administrator would not completely remove the threat of coverage for the retail hardware trade, his admission of the need for clarification of the exemption should be of material assistance to our efforts to secure corrective legislation next year. The election year conditions also prevented action on this subject during the last session of Congress, as consideration of any amendment to the wage-and-hour law at that time would have opened the controversial issue of increasing the minimum wage.

Statements made by members of both the House and Senate Labor Committees following the hearings indicate that the chances of securing or clarifying amendment to the retail exemption early in the next session of Congress are extremely good. Examples illustrating the absurdity of present interpretations of the Wage and Hour Division in determining whether sales are retail or nonretail, presented by Rivers Peterson in his statement to the Senate Labor Committee, were most effective in establishing the need for a clarifying amendment. Mr. Peterson pointed out in his statement to the committee: "The sale of builders' hardware directly to home owners for minor repairs in his house is considered retail but the sale of the same item to a local carpenter or contractor performing the same work for the home owner have been considered nonretail. The sale of a lawnmower and 100 feet of garden hose to a home owner is retail, but the sale of the same items to the city for use in the city park would be nonretail under interpretations issued by the Wage and Hour Division. Similarly, the sale of a dairy pail to a farmer for use in the house would be retail but if the farmer intended to use the dairy pail in his dairy operation it would be considered nonretail."

We have been asked by staff members of the committees of both the House and Senate to assist in drafting language which will clarify the retail exemption in the wage and hour law. In the meantime, and as a result of the hearings, it is unlikely that officials of the Wage and Hour Division will take further steps at this time to extend the coverage of the wage and hour law in the retail hardware trade, at least pending such action as may be taken in the next session of Congress.

You are all aware of the reduction in income tax rates as a result of the Revenue Act of 1948, which was passed over Presidential veto and became effective May 1 of this year. This new law provides substantial reduction in income tax rates but in the majority of cases taxpayers of substantial income derive greater and more lasting benefits from the income splitting or so-called community property provisions of the Act. Based on average conditions, a single man earning $10,000 a year will receive a reduction as a result of the new law of approximately $225 as compared with a reduction of approximately $575 for a married man with the same income. At the $20,000 level the single man's saving is approximately $500 as compared to a reduction of more than $2,000 for a married man. On an income of $30,000 a single man will save approximately $1,000, whereas a married man will save more than $4,000. * * * In the event it becomes necessary to raise the income tax rates this next year as has been predicted by some Members of Congress, it seems certain that the community property principle will remain unchanged.

Many small-business men operating individually owned establishments found, previous to the passage of the 1948 Revenue Act, that incorporation of their business would provide a substantial tax saving. The split income tax provision of the new law, however, has in most cases wiped out the tax advantage of the corporate form. Of course, many businessmen will still find incorporation desirable for other benefits but will probably find little, if any tax benefit under the present law from incorporation.

The new law also provides substantial benefits in inheritance and gift tax rates. The split property provision of the new tax law, for example, in effect doubles the tax exemption of a man's estate left to his wife. Many businessmen will find it advisable to consult tax counsel as to the possible need for readjustment in his will, trust funds, and other estate matters.

In the final days of the last session of Congress, action was taken on many bills, some of which may be of some interest to the retail hardware business. Postal rate increases will go into effect January 1, 1949, increasing air mail to 6 cents, providing increases for third class mail, increases in bulk rates, a 28 percent increase in parcel post, and substantial increases in rates for registered mail, c. o. d. mail and money order rates. Efforts to pass a Federal financed public housing and slum clearance program failed and the housing bill which was passed provided only for a secondary market for GI mortgages. The foreign aid appropriation, which had been substantially reduced by the House, was practically restored to the original plan through the efforts of Senator VANDENBERG, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. The appropriation provides for the expenditure of approximately $421,000,000 per month during the next year under the European Recovery Program. Congress extended through 1949 the present farm price support program with a long term revision of parity and price support formulas taking effect after January 1, 1950. Thus the wartime subsidy and price support farm program is extended unchanged through 1949. As a rider to the draft legislation, Congress authorized the Government to impose priority controls for any production materials needed to implement the national defense program. This would authorize the President to requisition any materials or equipment needed for this purpose.

NRHA has kept in close contact with officials of Federal administrative agencies and with the staffs of various congressional committees, including the Senate and House Small Business Committees. We have taken an active interest in the establishment of industry advisory committees, particularly the Retail Advisory Committee to the United States Department of Commerce, which may become particularly important with any increase in demand for reinstatement of Government controls.

[From New York Times of July 13, 1948]

CONGRESS PRAISED FOR BUSINESS AID—RETAIL HARDWARE ASSOCIATION DELEGATES HEAR NOBLE HAIL SESSION AS "SYMPATHETIC"

ATLANTIC CITY, N. J., July 12.—The Eightieth Congress, which completed its regular session June 20, was described today as "the most sympathetic to the problems of businessmen of any Congress during the past several years."

This classification was made by William R. Noble, of Washington, resident representative of the National Retail Hardware Association, at the opening session of its forty-ninth congress at the Haddon Hall Hotel.

Noble told the 800 delegates, representing 20,000 independent retail hardware merchants all over the United States, that the opinions expressed regarding the Eightieth Congress ranging from "the worst" to "one of the best," can be expected in an election year.

"In any event," he said, "action was taken on a vast number of bills, many of which involved controversial issues, and, of course many other controversial subjects bypassed at various stages of consideration."

Among the actions taken by Congress sympathetic to American businessmen, Mr. Noble listed:

1. Refusal to grant the President emergency powers to control wages, prices, and distribution of scarce goods.

2. Rejection of proposals to put the Government further in business by turning down Government subsidized public housing, Federal-financed education and national health programs.

3. Passing of the Portal-to-Portal Act and the Taft-Hartley Act, and a reduction of income-tax rates for all income brackets.

Philip R. Jacobson of Mason City, secretary of the Iowa Retail Hardware Association, urged the use of institutional and good-will advertising on a national basis by the association to meet the need for bolstering the advantage of independent ownership.

Rivers Peterson, of Indianapolis, managing director of the association, reported membership in the association at 20,346 as of July 1.

Intelligence Report on Asia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER H. JUDD

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an article on Communist movements in Asia, by Dr. C. S. Norborg from the biweekly newsletter, American World Intelligence. Dr. Norborg is an exceedingly well-trained and informed man with world-wide sources of information which have proved extraordinarily accurate in the past:

INTELLIGENCE REPORT ON ASIA

Word comes from Haiphong and Saigon that the French General Pierre Salon's occupation army in Indochina is hopelessly bogged down: The dying French Empire has an estimated force of 60,000 troops in action. This force includes soldiers of the Foreign Legion and African colonial troops. To assist this French occupation army, the puppet General Nguyen Van Xuan has raised 40,000 native Annamite soldiers. These soldiers have proved themselves worthless in jungle fighting and are, therefore, kept on garrison duty in the coastal cities.

Hapless General Salon has informed the French Foreign Office that the military situation is impossible, if men and weapons do not arrive on a far greater scale from France. The Schumann government is not in a political or economic position to underwrite such military adventure in Indochina.

The southeast Asia bureau of the Moscow Foreign Office is kept advised of this through its agents in Paris. The Red strategists are also expanding their intelligence network, month by month, throughout central and southern Asia. A most brazen strengthening of the Soviet espionage system happened just last month, when the Soviets opened a legation in Bangkok (Siam) consisting of a staff of 45 hand-picked agents under the shrewd leadership of Minister Serge Niemchina.

The decisive battle for Asia is on. This development was ably predicted in the famous Wedemeyer report, which gave a geopolitical analysis of the Soviet Asiatic strategy in its close cooperation with the native Communist forces, which spread their interconnected and well-informed net throughout all Asia, including American-occupied Tokyo and Nationalist China's Nanking.

Intelligence experts underscore the often overlooked fact that modern short-wave radio makes it a simple matter for Moscow to accomplish in Asia in the next 5 years, what it would have been impossible to do, in earlier years, over a period of a generation or more: to unify a Red front throughout all of east and south Asia.

Today the Soviet lines of communication are spreading out from Urga (Outer Mongolia) and from Kazil Khoto (Tannu Tuva) into strategic inner Mongolia, which is held by the strong Red leader, Ulchi Ocher. Connecting links go on to Manchuria, Chahar, Suiyan, and to the Chinese provinces of Shensi and Shansi. In every strategic area the Soviet intelligence service has established units which keep in constant contact with Moscow. Most active of all is the work in Sinkiang.

Our recent reports emphasize another overlooked fact of the Soviet penetration of Asia, namely, the almost fantastic number of Chinese agents that are at the disposal of Moscow. It now appears that the Soviets made only too excellent use of the war years in Asia to recruit, train, bribe, and discipline thousands of Chinese for the coming postwar conquest of Asia by native fifth columns.

In Indochina, Malaya, Burma, Siam, as well as in China proper, the Moscow experts instructed their underground forces in ideology, intelligence, counterespionage, political tactics, economic sabotage, and military tactics, so that the Red forces could be ready to act, at once, when the white man would give up his empire in an awakened postwar Asia.

The Communist press in Asia was immeasurably strengthened. Its editorials followed the Moscow party line. In Malaya, for example, the paper Min Sheng Pan of Kuala Lumpur editorialized, "British imperialists have ruled Malaya as a colony for a century, destroying her sovereignty and preventing the people from building up a country of their own. They ran for their lives when the Japanese came, but the Malayan Communist Party and the Malayan people resisted the invaders for 3 years and 8 months. Now British imperialism is bankrupt and has to employ direct Fascist methods to control colonial peoples. The people of Malaya should take steps to strengthen their unity and wage a large-scale struggle to hasten the downfall of British imperialism."

Last April, Malaya became the scene of such bloody uprisings and planned guerrilla warfare that observers fear that the general battle for southeast Asia cannot be long delayed.

Everywhere the Soviet propaganda is the same. It contains the following elements: (1) Attack on the white man's colonial history; (2) ridicule of the white man's stamina in standing up to the Japs; (3) bragging about the marvelous underground resistance of the Communists against the Japs; (4) that the white man is a Fascist; and (5) that time has come for the final overthrow of the white man's power, economically and politically.

The other day one of the keenest experts we know on Asia, an American who has lived in the Orient for more than 25 years, pointed out how the Soviets refrain from any mentioning of themselves and their own plans in any Communist propaganda in Asia. They are diabolically careful and clever to let Asia speak to Asia. "Moscow will just come in and gather the ripe fruit when the time comes for a consolidated Red Asia of Soviets," our observer added.

Reports now tell of the ominous uprisings in the provinces of Johore, Pahang, and Perak in Malaya. The picture in Indochina is that of a united nation supporting the veteran nationalist leader Ho-Chi-Minh, who was schooled in the revolutionary strategy by the Third International. From Tibet, the news comes of the pressure brought to bear upon the British to remove the garrisons at Cyangtse and the Chumbi Valley.

In yet another trouble spot in boiling Asia, Kashmir, the Moslems of Lahore, on June 25, were given the following inflammatory speech by their leader Chaudhri Hamidullah Khan, "For the past 18 years we have fought bravely in Kashmir to put an end to Dogra rule. After the British left India, unfortunately Indian fascism came to the help of the bankrupt Dogra feudalism. Our country has been made the scene of general massacre, arson, rape, and vandalism by the Indian freebooters. They are trying to blot us out as a nation. Our goal is to set Kashmir free from Indian domination."

The propaganda pouring out from the Soviet Tashkent radio station leaves little doubt that Moscow would be happy to see the Moslems of the Near East, Pakistan, and the East Indies consolidate and orient themselves toward the new, that is, Soviet Asia. That dream is not likely to be fulfilled, even though the Near East situation is explosive enough to touch off World War III.

In a recent editorial, the American-owned Bangkok Post crystallized the terrifying dilemma which we are facing in Asia, "the vacuum caused by British withdrawal from many areas in Asia is slowly being filled by Russian ideology. The process may be slow, but it seems to be a certain one; and the tragedy of it is that historical reaction seems to be the only alternative."

A pathetic example of this tragedy of historical reaction we have in Siam, where the American Government now deals with Pibul Songgram, who became president by an army coup: This man it was, who made a deal with the Japanese. This man it was who declared war upon the Allies.

In conclusion, this observation: Fifty years ago, in A. D. 1899, the Secretary of State, Mr. John Hay, made this prophetic statement, "The storm center of the world has gradually shifted to China. Whoever understands that mighty empire, socially, politically and economically, and religiously, has a key to politics for the next 500 years."

What Mr. Hay said about China today is valid about all of Asia. Only, we reject that the alternative is either sovietism or reaction.

When one observes how our Zionist fellow citizens pressed both political parties to adopt their demands on Palestine in their platforms, one is impressed by what a group which certainly does not represent more than 1 percent of Americans can accomplish.

Why has the time not come now for American Protestantism, with its tens of millions of believers, to demand of our Gover ment that this greatest power on earth, the United States, write a Christian manifesto for Asia which will make the Marxist manifesto fade away? Whether we like it or not, American policy on Asia and in Asia is today at a fateful spiritual crossroad: We have sent thousands of Christian missionaries to Asia. They preached the gospel of liberty. We invited tens of thousands of students from Asia to our universities. They brought back to Asia with them the flaming idea of political liberty.

Christian liberty and political liberty. Those are the world-shaking truths that America has preached for generations to Asia. That is the third alternative. Let Americans arise and demand that our Government inspire the world by the dare to act on that third alternative. Nothing less will do in Asia today. Anything less, and Asia is lost to the friendship of the West.

Very sincerely yours,

CHRISTOPHER NORBORG.

The Berlin Crisis: Cause and Remedy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN SANBORN

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. SANBORN. Mr. Speaker, it should be evident to anyone that the Berlin crisis is purely a money crisis. When the war ended, Mr. Morgenthau, then Secretary of the Treasury, and our State Department furnished the Soviet Government in Berlin with plates to print money which we were obligated to redeem in gold or American dollars. We have never been told just how much of this "funny money" the American taxpayers have been forced to redeem, but it is estimated at approximately $1,000,000,000. In many instances Russia paid her soldiers a year in advance so that they could legally pillage Germany of everything Russia wanted, at our expense.

In the effort to end this intolerable situation, the United States has issued new money for Germany which is not interchangeable with Russia "funny money." To force us to accept her money, Russia seized the bank deposits of most firms operating in the American zone, since, for some inexplicable reason, these firms were permitted (or forced) to deposit their money in banks in the Russian zone. Russia has offered to lift the blockade if we again accept her worthless money. There are rumors that our administration may do just that, and try to cover such an infamy by pretending that we have won a diplomatic victory by having the blockade lifted.

MONEY MUST HAVE A VALUE OF ITS OWN

Under a sound monetary system, this Berlin crisis never could have arisen, and we might just as well recognize the fact that until we adopt a sound monetary system, there is not a possible chance for peace or economic stability anywhere in the world. To be sound, stable, and dependable, money must have a value of its own, entirely unaffected by the credit or lack of credit of the countries in which it circulates.

To have these qualities, money must be adequately backed by and redeemable in gold and/or silver at fixed and proper ratio, and with the price of both metals pegged by the method provided in H. R. 7012 and S. 2895.

THE SINGLE GOLD STANDARD

The dollar is worth less right now than at any time since the United States became a Nation, and buys fewer goods and commodities and labor than any time since 1782, thanks to the debauching of the currency under the New Deal's unsound policy of managed economy and managed currency.

There is a movement on to return to the single gold standard, but it should be borne in mind that we were on the single gold standard at the time of the 1929 depression and for 4 years thereafter, so that does not offer the solution. The present purchasing power of the dollar is equivalent to only 37 cents prior to 1934. To make this dollar redeemable in gold at $35 per ounce would instantly make the dollar worth the equivalent of 59 cents prior to 1934.

This would mean that the great New York banks whose vaults are bulging with these synthetic 37-cent dollars could convert them into 59-cent dollars overnight by demanding redemption in gold at $35 per ounce and drain away all of the gold now held by the Treasury. Based on the present purchasing power of the dollar, our Treasury gold should be priced at $56 per ounce.

Aside from silver certificates which are redeemable in silver, our currency is not now redeemable in either gold or silver.

This means that approximately 90 percent of our paper currency is irredeemable—merely a debt—a promise to pay. It may be argued that this currency is backed by Federal reserve notes or United States notes, but they, too, are debts—promises to pay. The situation is not unlike that indulged in by individuals sometimes—kiting checks. It is trite to say, "All that is needed is confidence," but having said that, you have said nothing. You might better say, and with more fidelity, "All that is needed is credulity."

A SOUND MONETARY SYSTEM WILL COST US NOTHING

Now a sound monetary system will cost us nothing. It can be put into operation in less than 90 days, and will, in no way, cause any economic disturbance. On the other hand it will give our people and the people of the world renewed confidence in the integrity of money and governments.

For 90 years the price of gold was pegged at $20.67, and until 1873 the price of silver was pegged at $1.29. All that is required to return to a sound monetary system is to peg the price of gold and silver at prices equivalent to $20.67 and $1.29 prior to 1934 when this debauching of the currency started. Since our present dollar is equivalent to only 37 cents prior to 1934, we would have to peg the price of gold at $56 per ounce and the price of silver at $3.50 per ounce. This does not mean increasing the value of gold but merely adjusting its price to the present depreciated value of the dollar, and restoring the 16 to 1 ratio between silver and gold that was fixed by the Congress in 1837.

When that is done, we should restore the monetary reserves back of our currency to a minimum of 40 percent, and restore to the people the right to redeem our paper currency in gold and/or silver at face value, on demand. We already have legislation on our statute books to facilitate this change back to a sound monetary system (see sec. 311, U. S. Code. Ann. (ch. 8, 28, Stat. 4)).

Since all foreign monies are measured in American dollars, all other nations will be forced to adopt a sound monetary system. Then the world will be on its way to permanent recovery, and the United States will enter into the greatest era of prosperty the world has ever known.

WHAT ABOUT RUSSIA'S GOLD SUPPLY

Back in 1895 when we were ready to return to a sound monetary system under bimetallism, gold was discovered in South Africa and Alaska, and greatly exaggerated reports of these discoveries led many people to think that this new gold would take up the slack and make the remonetization of silver unnecessary, but in 12 short years (1907) our banks were forced to issue script in lieu of redeemable currency, because there was not then, or now, enough gold in the world to serve as an adequate redeemable monetary reserve. At the present time there is just half enough, and the other half will have to be supplied by silver.

Again, the opponents of bimetallism are telling about the huge gold supplies of Russia produced with slave labor. "Bunk!" Such stories are on a par with the story that they also have an abundance of uranium for atomic bombs. If so, why are they working the uranium fields of eastern Germany which are of such inferior quality that they would be ignored in Canada where most of the uranium is produced? There would be no incentive for Russia to ship us her gold if we advance the price to $56. She can sell it in the black markets of the world for more than $100 per ounce.

Once we return to a sound monetary system under which money must be backed by redeemable reserves of gold and silver, Russia will need every single ounce of gold she has to back up her currency if she expects other nations of the world to accept it.

Just remember, the United States has two-thirds of the world's gold, and at $35 per ounce that amounts to only $23,000,000,000. The records of the United State Bureau of the Mint show that during the 456 years that have elapsed since the discovery of America, in 1492, only 1,500,000,000 ounces of gold have been produced in the entire world, and in the same period less than 18,000,000,000 ounces of silver have been produced in the entire world. So do not let anyone frighten you about a hidden hoard of gold or silver. It just does not exist.

If it is felt that there is not sufficient time to consider this subject in the present special session, a special joint monetary committee, consisting of Members of both the House and Senate, should be set up to make a complete study of this matter and be prepared to report to the Congress with recommendations when the Congress convenes again in January.

The Truman Technique

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH P. O'HARA
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. O'HARA. Mr. Speaker, an excellent editorial appeared in the Minneapolis Morning Tribune on August 2, 1948, which is an analysis of the special session of Congress, in which I am sure my colleagues will be interested.

The article follows:

THE TRUMAN TECHNIQUE

It is strange how fondly President Truman clings to the conviction that we shall surely have a disastrous depression unless the Eightieth Congress deals with inflation in precisely the way that he marks out.

This conviction runs like a silver thread through his comments on inflation. It was conspicuously present in his mid-year economic report to Congress made last week. It underlies his efforts to create a little OPA, with limited controls over prices and wages, as the only way of fending off the dire catastrophe which he perceives ahead of us.

Unless inflation is combated with much the same restrictions and controls which were endured as a wartime expedient, Mr. Truman seems virtually certain that our peacetime economy will shortly fall apart under the pressure of inflation.

Thus the President resorts to the familiar technique of lighting the fires of a great emergency beneath his desired legislation. If the fires generate enough dread of the prophesied disaster, presto, the job is done. The legislation asked will be enacted in a flurry of hysteria, and the consequences can be considered later, in the cold dawn of reason.

This is the technique of fear rather than of logic.

It is the business of keeping the public in such a continual seethe of anxiety and doubt that it will be ready for any cure-all the administration recommends.

The people have been kept in such a ferment for much of the last 16 years, and there are many signs that they are getting tired of seeing the chain-smoking technique applied to Presidential crises.

There is, to be sure, a problem of inflation and it is a serious one. Mr. Truman is not conjuring the inflationary menace out of thin air, like some evil genie. He is simply putting the worst possible face on that menace. He is building up an emergency which will seem to justify his drastic cures.

The Republican leadership in Congress does not deny the problem, but it is not unfamiliar with the Democratic technique of blowing up emergencies for legislative purposes.

Nor has the Republican leadership forgotten how the very OPA controls which Mr. Truman now seeks to revive on a limited scale once put a sharp brake on production and created black markets on a scandalous scale.

The Republican leadership does not want to see bust follow boom any more than the President does. It is quite as desirous as he that a collapse be averted. But it dissents from what Mr. Truman once called police-state methods. In the reply to the President's message last week it said:

"The President already has wide powers to check inflation if he were willing to use them. He has power to cut the amount of Government spending in many fields, to limit Government purchasing in those fields where commodities are short, to limit bank credit and consumer credit."

Mr. Truman sometimes seems to be so deep in the inflation forest that he cannot see the trees. Perhaps he needs to spend less time crying "disaster" for the benefit of Congress and the people, and more time studying the remedies that lie at hand.

Let Us Keep the Record Straight

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE A. DONDERO
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, granted by the House of Representatives, I include therein an editorial from the Rochester Era, of Rochester, Mich., edited and published by Oliver C. Swords. The Era is one of the important weekly newspapers in my congressional district. This editorial, couched in few words, contains the record on the subject of the decontrol of prices. It speaks for itself.

No one can overlook the statement made by the President on October 16, 1947, in which he termed price and wage controls "police-state methods," and on January 7, 1948, the President requested that he be entrusted with police-state powers.

WHO WAS IT THAT DECONTROLLED PRICES?

(By Charles L. Egenroad)

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 29.—Lest we forget:

July 24, 1946: Democrat Congress passes resolution decontrolling meat, poultry, dairy products, grain, petroleum, tobacco, and setting up Decontrol Board.

July 25, 1946: Mr. Truman signs bill providing for Decontrol Board.

August 20, 1946: Decontrol Board restores controls on meat, cottonseed, and soybeans, but leaves free from control grains, dairy products and poultry.

September 10, 1946: Decontrol Board applies meat controls to wholesale sales; restores meat to controls at higher prices estimated to add $600,000,000 to Nation's food bill.

October 14, 1946: Mr. Truman in radio address directs decontrol of meat and orders lifting of controls be accelerated.

October 15, 1946: President asks for and gets decontrol of livestock, meat, food, and feed products, as Nation approaches congressional election.

October 16, 1946: Fats and oils are decontrolled, including margarine, shortening, salad dressing, cotton seed, peanuts, and soybean oil.

October 24, 1946: All food products except sugar, sirups, and rice are decontrolled; also cosmetics.

October 30–31, 1946: Radios, lamps, small electric appliances, kitchenware, glassware, and hides, skins, leather, and shoes are decontrolled.

November 5, 1946: Election of the Eightieth Republican Congress.

November 9, 1946. Mr. Truman orders end of price control on everything but sugar, rice, and rent. Wage and salary control abolished by executive order.

January 8, 1947. Mr. Truman presents his economic report to the Eightieth Congress, says: "Farmers must realize that last year's exceptional farm prices will fall somewhat as world food supplies increase and as consumers find a more ample supply of durable goods to purchase. Existing price supports afford protection against a severe price decline."

June 11, 1947: Eightieth Congress asks for termination of sugar rationing.

June 12–30, 1947: Agriculture Secretary Anderson calls off sugar rationing and price control on rice.

October 16, 1947: Mr. Truman calls price and wage controls "police state methods."

November 17, 1947: Mr. Truman suggests to special session of Congress his 10-point plan to combat inflation; calls for controls on certain items; explains—"Price ceilings would not be necessary for staple food and clothing items not in short supply or for any delicacies or luxury.

January 7, 1948: Mr. Truman, in state of Union message, again asks for police-state powers.

May 14, 1948: Mr. Truman publicly reiterates demand for 10-point control program.

What About Public Housing?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. NOAH M. MASON
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, do we need public housing? Do we need more Federal subsidies for housing? Or can private enterprise produce sufficient housing? These are questions that occupy the minds of many Americans today. What about the answers to these questions?

We are short of housing. No one can challenge that fact. But we are not as short of housing as the public housing propagandists assert. They say we lack 10,000,000 units. That is a gross exaggeration. The number of new housing units needed, according to careful housing surveys, is somewhere between two and three million units.

Mr. Speaker, the demand for public housing comes from those who say, "We must have low-cost housing. If private enterprise cannot give us low-cost houses then the Government must." Private builders have always given us low-cost houses. Why cannot they do it now? Why do new houses cost so much today? Here are some of the reasons:

(a) As a result of New Deal inflationary policies the dollar today has a purchasing power of only 50 cents, so a $5,000 house now costs $10,000.

(b) Because building materials are in short supply as a result of war needs and large shipments abroad; therefore, they command higher prices.

(c) Because labor costs have risen even more than material costs—the result of increased wages coupled with decreased labor productivity.

Mr. Speaker, a Nation-wide survey that covered 64 cities in 28 States on the question of the decreased productivity of labor established the following facts:

In 1940 it required 2.2 man-hours to install a toilet; in 1946 it required 3.6

man-hours to do the same work—an increase of 64 percent. In 1940 built-in tubs and showers required 6 man-hours of labor; in 1946 they required 9 man-hours to install—an increase of 50 percent. In 1940 an average of seven radiators were installed per man-day; in 1946 an average of only five radiators was installed per man-day—a decrease of about 30 percent. These are just a few examples of slow-down practices that skyrocket the contractor's building costs and the ultimate costs to the consumer. Neither public housing nor Federal subsidies for housing will cure these things.

Mr. Speaker, the following editorial on the subject, Who gets the houses? gives a very clear analysis of what we may expect if the Taft-Ellender-Wagner housing bill becomes a law. I therefore include it in my remarks.

[From the Chicago Daily Tribune of July 30, 1948]

WHO GETS THE HOUSES?

Among his demands on Congress for the enactment of his program of socialism, Mr. Truman included one for passage of the Taft-Ellender-Wagner housing bill. Enactment of that bill would not add a single dwelling unit to the number that will be built without it. It would merely alter the distribution of the new housing, giving it to people who cannot pay for it, and whose rents must be subsidized if they are to live in it, and taking an equal amount of new shelter away from people able and ready to pay for it.

The T-E-W bill provides a series of Federal aids to finance both owner-occupied homes and rental housing. Some of the devices are continuations of methods in use for the last 15 years, and some are new. Many of the housing aids are also embodied in the Wolcott bill, passed by the House in one of its final preconvention sessions.

What the T-E-W bill provides in addition, aside from some farm housing provisions obviously designed to catch the votes of rural Congressmen, is a vast new program of public housing. The Government would spend a billion dollars acquiring slum-land sites for redevelopment, which public housing authorities could use, and it would subsidize as many as 500,000 public housing dwelling units.

It might be assumed from the political furor over the housing shortage that nothing is being done to remedy it. That is not true. The construction industry is already operating at peak capacity. Building labor is in such demand in Chicago and most other cities that union wage scales mean very little. Contractors who want help frequently have to pay premium wages to get it, in spite of their agreements not to do so. There are also shortages of some building supplies.

Federal appropriations, then, aren't going to supply any more housing. All that public housing projects constructed at this time will do is attract mechanics and materials from private building. Families which want homes and are able to pay for them will have to pay more, or perhaps go without, if the public housing program is pushed. Their taxes will be increased if the T-E-W bill is enacted, to pay for homes for those unable or unwilling to look out for themselves.

The self-supporting people who are hardest up for decent homes at present are the veterans. They were away fighting when rent control was started, freezing the stay at homes in possession of apartments and rental houses. Vast numbers of men who were unmarried, living with their parents when called into service, are now married and in need of homes of their own.

Very few—perhaps a tenth—of the million dwelling units that will be built in the country this year will be for rent. Although new apartments are at present free from rent control, builders have no assurance that they will remain so. Mr. Truman did his best to discourage building of rental housing when he demanded stiffer rent controls. About the only way they could be stiffened would be by putting new construction under control.

Federal statisticians say that the average family today is paying only 12 percent of its income for rent. In the prewar period, 1935–39, it paid 19 percent, and even during that period rents were not high enough to encourage much building of new rental housing. At present building costs, rents would have to rise 50 to 60 percent above their controlled levels to insure widespread revival of building to rent.

Long before any such rent rise took place, however, many people would find their housing needs met out of the existing housing supply. One of the effects of rent control has been to encourage wasteful use of the present housing facilities. Small families and single persons are occupying far more space than they need.

They are doing this because rent control gives them unjustifiable bargains at the expense of landlords. The dollar today will buy less than half as much food as it did in 1935–39, only half as much clothing, but more than three-quarters as much housing. The average family has about twice as many dollars to spend as it had prewar.

Public housing is not going to solve the problem of the home-seeking veteran, unless he is also an insolvent veteran. Public housing is for people unable to support themselves. The veteran wants an apartment more often than he wants, or can afford, a house. The way to get him an apartment is to abolish rent control. That will encourage both new construction and more efficient use of existing rental units.

No politician in this country has the courage to end rent control. Mr. Truman wants more of it. Governor Dewey sponsored a State rent-control act in New York. Even Senator TAFT, the most honest and courageous man in Congress, hasn't come out flatly for wiping it out. Nothing else that Congress can do, however, is going to solve the housing shortage.

American People Must Get Back to Hard Realities

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLIFFORD R. HOPE
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include a recent radio address by Senator ARTHUR CAPPER:

The special session of Congress called by President Truman has been in session 1 week.

The Russian blockade of Berlin has been in effect a little more than 1 month.

Foreign Minister Bevin of Britain has informed the British Parliament that demobilization of the army may be halted until a peaceful solution of the Berlin crisis seems assured.

Last week, for the second time in its history, the United States registered men for compulsory military service in peacetime. The other peacetime draft, in 1940, was pushed through Congress in preparation for United States participation in World War II.

Last week also Marriner S. Eccles, former Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board—and still a member—told the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency that the United States is due for further monetary inflation—and then a "bust."

It is too late, Mr. Eccles told the Senate committee, to talk of or plan for preventing inflation. We have inflation, he said. Additional powers to the Federal Reserve System to control credit expansion of bank loans, and to regulate consumer credit could be used to prevent additional monetary inflation. But as for preventing inflation—

"It is too late," Mr. Eccles said, in answer to a question by Senator TOBEY, of New Hampshire. "The door has been open so long that the horse is gone."

Incidentally, Mr. Eccles did not consider price controls and rationing of consumer goods as the answer to high prices. Asked about restoration of price and ration controls, Mr. Eccles responded with the nursery rhyme about Humpty-Dumpty—"Who can put Humpty-Dumpty together again?"

I did not realize it at the time, but President Truman may have rendered a real public service when he announced in his acceptance speech at the Democratic National Convention that he would call Congress into special session primarily to enact price control and housing legislation.

Here is the public service that President Truman may have rendered. There are a lot of people, perhaps including President Truman himself, who believe or who have been led to believe that high prices are caused by the removal of price controls following the end of the war, or rather within the year after the end of the shooting war.

In defending itself against the charge of causing high prices through the removal of price controls. Congress through public hearings and public statements, is proceeding to give itself and the people of the United States a few lessons in elementary economics. Especially in the matter of prices, wages, and Government monetary and fiscal policies.

I tried to make it plain in our talk together over WIBW a week ago today that prices are not something that can be considered separately from the things that go to make up prices.

I tried to make it plain that prices paid for goods also are the prices received for goods. And that wages and salaries, incomes and dividends, profits and pensions, and taxes, are paid out of the prices received for goods and services. In the long run all these things cannot be paid except out of prices received.

Along the same line I attempted to show that salaries and wages cannot be increased from $29,000,000,000 a year to $128,000,000,000 a year; that farm incomes cannot be increased from $2,500,000,000 to $18,000,000,000 a year; that the incomes of independent businessmen and professional men cannot be increased $22,000,000,000 a year, unless the prices paid for their products and services are increased enough to provide the dollars to pay these increases in incomes, salaries, and wages.

I say it is high time that we, the American people, quit thinking in terms of walking on rainbows toward the imaginary pot of gold at the end of the rainbow, and do our walking on the ground of hard realities. If we don't walk on the ground of hard realities we are going to fall, and fall hard, sometime in the next few years.

If out of the special session of Congress the American people get some glimmer of realities, after 15 years of blowing economic bubbles, President Truman will have performed a real public service—although that may not have been his purpose in calling the special session.

I note that President Truman, through Paul Porter, one of the former Administrators of OPA, asked Congress last Thursday to pass a law rolling prices of major cost-of-living commodities back to November of last year.

That recommendation of course has a powerful pocketbook appeal, particularly to the housewives of America. But in the face of realities, it is as fantastic as it is demagogic. Why?

Well, I'll tell you why.

But first I am going to give you a few statements from the testimony of the Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, given the same day before the Senate Banking and Currency Committee. I might say that the Federal Reserve Board is what is known as an independent agency. It is in reality a permanent committee of the Congress of the United States, created to handle the problems of the banking system, the problems of handling the monetary system of the United States.

The Federal Reserve Board is not a creature of the executive branch of the Federal Government, unless the members of the Board (nominated by the President, approved by the Senate) choose to be the creatures of the Executive. Sometimes they are. Sometimes they are not. Judging from the statements of Chairman Thomas B. McCabe and of Marriner S. Eccles, member and former Chairman, the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System at present are not mere creatures of the Executive—of the White House.

I quote the following from Chairman McCabe's formal statement before the Banking and Currency Committee:

"As a net result of war financing, there were increases in the public's holdings of demand deposits and currency from less than $40,000,000,000 in 1940 to one hundred and ten billion at present; of time deposits from less than thirty billion to sixty billion; of United States Government securities, which are readily convertible into money, from a few billion to more than ninety billion.

"The total supply of these forms of money and potential money is now more than three times the prewar total."

Later in his testimony Chairman McCabe said this, and again I quote him directly:

"At present total physical production of all goods and services is probably not over two-thirds greater than at the prewar maximum, while prices have risen about three-fourths." That ends this direct quotation.

There you have an important part of the price picture, my friends.

Total supply of money and potential money has increased three times.

The total physical production of all goods and services is not over two-thirds greater than the prewar maximum.

I ask you, is it any wonder that prices on the whole are three-fourths higher than prewar?

I will say further, that if all the potential money in time and demand deposits and in Government securities for any reason is turned into purchasing power, prices will go still higher.

But, you may well say, food prices have gone up more than three-fourths. They have doubled. For meats they have more than doubled.

That is true. But just see what has happened. The people of America are consuming this year some 145 pounds of meat per capita, compared to 126 pounds prewar. People have the appetite for more meat, and on the whole they have money to supply that appetite—remember wages and salaries have more than doubled since prewar days. President Truman bragged in his acceptance speech at Philadelphia that wages and salaries had more than trebled since the New Deal came into power in 1933.

In his message to the special session, asking price controls to cut down the cost of living, he mentioned the increase in prices only. He did not mention the increases in purchasing power, in the market demand for foodstuffs and other goods.

Incidentally, he forgot in his special message to Congress to brag about the increase in farm income, the increase in business income, the increase in wages and salaries, the increase in national income, the increase in taxes. He just denounced the increase in prices—prices that have to pay for all these other increases.

I will say that the Federal Reserve Board governors, Chairman McCabe and Marriner Eccles, gave much more of the entire pictures.

In addition to the monetary inflation effect on prices, Mr. Eccles also points to these two factors which have decreased the supplies of goods while at the same time increasing the supply of money to aid in the market for the goods:

First, the diversion of scarce materials, especially foodstuffs and things into which steel enters so largely, into export channels to assist in the recovery of Europe—seven or so billion dollars a year financed from the Treasury of the United States.

Second, the huge military preparedness program, 14 billion dollars plus this year, more next year even if there is no shooting war.

These two factors subtract immensely from the quantities of foodstuffs and steel products, particularly, from supplies in our own country; and they add to the supply of dollars available to bid for the goods.

Production of foodstuffs over the rest of the world is getting back toward normal. By next spring prices of most foodstuffs should be relatively lower—perhaps so much lower that farm incomes will be materially affected. But the demands of the military and of Europe for manufactured goods is another story.

Significantly, neither Chairman McCabe nor Mr. Eccles suggested price controls as the way out. They urged restriction of the expansion of bank credit, and regulation of consumer credits, and reductions in Government expenditures, as more needed to slow down the increase in monetary inflation. I could say a lot more about this phase of the problem, but my time is up. Will be with you again next week.

Facts on the Meat Situation by C. P. Ives

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD T. MILLER

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. MILLER of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by C. P. Ives, in the Baltimore Sun of August 2, 1948:

FACTS ON THE MEAT SITUATION

(By C. P. Ives)

How come cheap hamburg steak is $1.10 a pound and other meats in proportion on up the price curve to practical infinity? Mr. Truman seems to think there's some personal devil involved somewheres around here, and Mr. Tom C. Clark, of the Justice Department, is out with that old antitrust gag about breaking up monopoly to lower food prices.

Actually, meat prices are fixed by multiple-unit, wide-open market competition. There are about 6,000,000 farms in this country on any one of which you are likely to encounter a few head of livestock grown for market.

Before the war there were around 300 slaughtering plants in the country in the federally inspected group alone. During and since the war the number has boomed to around 465, and they are not controlled by one firm. Monopoly as the major cause of high meat prices? Don't be silly, Mr. Clark and Mr. President.

For a slant at the real facts, cut back to the years 1935–39. On January 1 of those years the average number of beef cattle on American farms and ranches was 41,815,000. The human population was around 128,000,000. Average disposable personal income per capita was about $535. The people averaged 126.2 pounds of meat consumption per person per year. The Government index of meat prices was 100.

But in December of 1940, and right here in Baltimore, something explosive happened to the price of meat and other foods. The all-powerful American Farm Bureau Federation, in annual convention at the Lord Baltimore Hotel, passed a resolution calling for higher farm prices. And the Government hastened to comply.

Well, corn started up in due course. And commercial livestock is, as every knowing man knows, just a translated form of corn on the hoof. True, everything else was going up under the initial pressure of the war boom.

By January 1, 1942, beef cattle on farms had risen to 49,712,000 head. But the human population had risen to 134,665,000 souls. Average disposable cash income was up to $863. Meat consumption per capita had risen to 139.6 pounds per person and the meat-price index was up 26 percent.

Now skip to 1946, the year in which the wartime meat-price controls were abandoned. In January of that year, beef cattle on farms numbered 55,739,000. The population had grown to 141,235,000. Average disposable cash income was $1,127. Meat consumption was up to 153.7 pounds per person. What meat there was in the legitimate market was up only about 6 percent, thanks to price ceilings fortified by subsidies. The blackmarket stuff was, of course, higher.

And then in 1947 came the bad news—the very bad news—of a short corn crop. Naturally, less corn means less livestock.

With this as a major reason, beef cattle had dropped as of January 1, 1948, almost 2,000,000 head, or back to 53,399,000. But the human population had boomed to around 145,000,000. Average disposable cash income per person is pushing $1,205. In other words, less meat, but more people with still more purchasing power.

And there was something even more important which had happened in those war years. Not only was population and average income up—the latter way up. But the income of the numerically largest groups had gone up most!

By 1947, 66 percent of the families in the population had had a 36-percent increase in real income. The remaining 34 percent of the families (the highest-income people) had had real income increases of only 25 percent.

The result could be guessed easily enough. The high-income people are relatively few in number and have always had plenty of meat. Their increased income added relatively little to meat demand.

The totally unprecedented pressure that has boosted average meat consumption from 126 pounds before the war to 155.2 pounds last year, comes mostly from the very numerous low-income groups whose 36 percent increase in buying power has enabled them to demand meat at a rate quite beyond their prewar dietary practices.

There it is, Messrs. Clark and Truman, and that's the truth. The high-price policy for farmers and the high-income policy for the low-income nonfarm groups were always attractive, but they make a skittish team. The short corn crop of 1947 threw them out of step. Now they have collided head-on in all the meat markets of the land. That zooming noise you hear is the price index shooting to 256 (so far) on the mere 143 to 146 pounds of meat per capita that will be available this year—which is still 20 pounds above prewar.

Extra Session

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM J. CROW
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. CROW. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include therein an editorial from the Somerset American, Somerset, Pa.:

EXTRA SESSION

There are columnists who imagine that because President Truman hauled Congress back to Washington to repent of its conduct and get a clear slate after he had rolled over the Far West to do a hide-peeling job on it at every stop, Congress should bow the knee to the President as its master and enact the legislation he demands.

Congress has made its record. Upon what it has done courageously it should be willing to stand. There is no sound reason why it should enact the role of a whimpering idiot just because the President doesn't like the way it has conducted itself.

After all, Congress is representative of the people, has a mandate from the people.

The President is a political accident with no mandate from anybody, yet he seeks brazenly to impose police-state methods upon the American people. He wants the restoration of authority to fix prices and direct industry, measures such as we experienced and lamented during the late war.

The plan announced by the Republicans in Congress to allow the Dixiecrats to provide the voters with information on the President's civil-rights program and adjourn is sound and sensible.

There was and is no occasion for the extra session and the sooner it goes home, the better it will be everybody concerned.

The fear is entertained that unless the Congress enacts some of the police-state legislation the President demands, the Republican nominees will suffer in the November election.

Pray, why?

There is no more reason for the laws the President asks than there was during the regular session of Congress. It was decided then that such laws as he demands were not needed and the situation has not changed.

The President called the extra session because of a personal emergency. His candidacy is in sore straits and he seems to have felt that he could force Congress to help him out.

Congress, as has been noted, has a mandate from the people and has performed according to that mandate.

Congress should leave well enough alone.

EXAMPLE

"Our country is too large to be directed by a single government," said Thomas Jefferson.

Yet Harry S. Truman would have Washington direct the police affairs of the States, contrary to the design of the founding fathers.

The President is insistent that there shall be equality in the armed services and that racial segregation shall be abolished. He would abolish slums in all the cities of America. He would do a host of other wonderful things that may be attractive to voters of one sort or another.

If Mr. Truman would do these things, why hasn't he done them in the field in which he has had opportunities to do them?

The District of Columbia is ruled by the President and Congress. Yet there is racial segregation in the public schools in Washington. There are slums in Washington.

The President would abolish lynching.

In 1947 there was one lynching in the United States. What is the use of a Federal prohibition of lynching when the States without a Federal law have been able to exhibit such a record?

The President is using the word "lynching" in a restricted sense. The preceding statement has used it in the same sense.

There have been many lynchings however, in the broader sense. A lynching is the exercise of force by any group other than is set up by law for the enforcement of law.

Dayton, Ohio, was the scene of lynchings last week. Violence was employed by a labor union to obtain an advantage that had been denied it by a vote of the workers in a struck plant.

There have been many other instances of lawless violence motivated by dictators of the Hitler type who insist on determining the conduct of workers.

There is no freedom where all men are not free.

President Truman is not as greatly opposed to lynching in the broader sense of the word as he would have the unintelligent believe.

The Taft-Hartley Act is an antilynch law. President Truman would have it repealed.

The fact is that the President is more interested in getting elected in November than he is in the cause of righteousness and justice.

The President regards advocacy of antipoll-tax, antilynching, antislum laws more profitable than employment of his powers for the eradication of these things in an area where he has and has had authority. He believes that the purchase of the votes by promises concerning these things more profitable than setting before the people examples of what he would do.

Don't Rob American Soil

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KARL STEFAN
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, in parts of Europe when it rains and when the sun shines, wheat yields 90 and 100 bushels to the acre. But the farmers there tell me that to secure such yields they have to put about $60 worth of fertilizer per acre into the ground.

Mr. Ole Hanson, general manager of the Farmers Cooperative Creamery at Orleans, Nebr., sounds a warning to American farmers in a recent statement which I include in my remarks:

ARE WE COMMITTING SUICIDE?

Now don't get excited and take me too literally. But, how about a bunch of thoughtless men dancing around a "golden calf"? Farmers, businessmen, and bankers alike. All trying to get hold of a lot of land so that they can hire someone with an "iron horse" to stir up the soil for them, and raise some wheat, corn, or alfalfa to sell to somebody for cash, of course.

I hope you appreciate what I am driving at: Namely, we are selling our birthright to our land for a mess of potatoes. Our topsoil is disappearing little by little by this kind of farming. If we don't change our method very soon, I fear that we will all be sorry.

Mr. Farmer of the Louisiana tract, won't you please take a lesson from history? I believe you are selling Napoleon's old empire short.

Many, many years ago, millions of happy and contented people lived in the fertile valley of the Nile in Egypt. This valley was exceedingly rich and the people prospered, but, yes, there was a "but" in it, for today this Egyptian fertile valley of the Nile is no more.

Why?

Simple enough the answer—just unwise farming.

The Egyptians were good tillers of the soil all right, but they violated the laws of nature. They took crop after crop from the soil for many generations and exchanged them with foreign countries for life's luxuries, but, they neglected to put anything back on the soil in return.

What were the results?

Depletion of the soil and disaster to the nation, the downfall of a mighty empire.

Mr. Farmer of the Middle West, I think you market crops too often in the wrong way.

You ship out too much alfalfa, corn, and wheat to enrich the soil in other lands, where your unfinished product is turned into finished products for the market.

By doing that, you sell the fertility of your soil little by little and soon you will have nothing left but the title to your land, and you can't eat that, nor sell it.

Why not stop this economic waste?

Why not begin to feed up your own product on your farm and turn natures own life restorer back to your soil where it rightfully belongs?

Get yourself some more good dairy cows, pigs, and chickens, then ship out your surplus in the form of such finished products as butter, eggs, and pork.

Put your waste material back on your land and if you will do this intelligently and manage it properly you and your children for generations to come will always be able to live in the Nile valley of the world.

The Liberty Bell

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES P. KEM
OF MISSOURI
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. KEM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "The Liberty Bell," written by Fred Brenckman and published in the National Grange Monthly.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE LIBERTY BELL—HOW IT BECAME AN AMERICAN TRADITION

(By Fred Brenckman)

Its golden tones muted for more than a century, but boasting a glorious past, the historic Liberty Bell, which reposes in Independence Hall at Philadelphia, is the most priceless relic of the American Republic. Among all the famous bells of the world no other has been associated with events of such vast moment to humanity as the Liberty Bell, the symbol of independence and the prophet of our greatness as a nation. Its defiant clangor was heard on the memorable day when independence was proclaimed; it pealed joyously when the arduous work of the American Revolution was completed; and it was tolled in sorrow when the chief architects of our liberty passed on.

In recounting the history of the Liberty Bell it may be said that Independence Hall was the first statehouse of Pennsylvania. It was erected in 1736. The tower and belfry, which form such a conspicuous feature of Independence Hall, were not added until roughly 15 years after the completion of the building proper.

It was on November 1, 1751, that the superintendents of the statehouse, Isaac Norris, Thomas Leech, and Edward Warner, sent a letter to Robert Charles, agent of the Province in London, ordering the bell. It was specified that the bell should be cast by the best workmen and that it should contain, among other lettering, the following inscription, "Proclaim liberty throughout all the land unto all the inhabitants thereof," which is a quotation from the tenth verse of the twenty-fifth chapter of the Book of Leviticus. In view of the later history of the bell, these words were truly prophetic.

The bell was delivered in Philadelphia in August 1752. It was placed in position in the belfry of the statehouse, but upon being tried for sound it was broken by a stroke of the clapper, even before the ship that brought it had left port. Discouraged, the superintendents of the building wanted to ship the bell back to England to be recast. But the captain of the ship that brought it had a cargo on board, and he declared that he had no room for it. The bell had been cast by Thomas Lister, of Whitechapel, London, and 100 pounds sterling had been sent in advance to pay for it. It weighed 2,080 pounds, or just about a ton.

Up to that time no large bell had ever been cast on this side of the Atlantic. But now two American workmen, John Pass, a native of Malta, and Charles Stow, Jr., whose father was the doorkeeper of the executive council of the province, were authorized to recast the bell. They decided that the metal of the original bell was too brittle, so they added an ounce and a half of copper to each pound of the old bell. But when the new bell was tried, the sound was not satisfactory, too much copper having been added to the metal. Thereupon the bell was again recast by the same workmen and hung in the belfry of the statehouse in the summer of 1753. It was the third bell, cast in Philadelphia, that pealed forth the news of independence in 1776.

As is well known, the Declaration of Independence was adopted and signed on the Fourth of July. It was first read to the public in what is now known as Independence Square at Philadelphia on July 8, 1776.

The platform from which it was proclaimed had been built for an astronomical observatory in 1769. It was a wooden structure, surrounded by a balcony and railing, reached by a stairway from the outside. A diarist of the times describes the event in these words:

"There was a large assembly of people in the yard who had been summoned by the tolling of the Liberty Bell, as there had been many times before on the occasion of some public event. Passing through the assembled crowd the procession of officials, who had charge of proclaiming this state paper to the people, reached the platform, at which the Liberty Bell ceased ringing.

"Col. John Nixon, to whom the high sheriff of Philadelphia had delegated the reading, stood up in silence. He was a strong-voiced and open-featured man. He began reading with the words 'In Congress, July 4, 1776, a declaration of the Representatives of the United States of America' and read through the important document, and it was accepted with general applause and heartfelt satisfaction."

At conclusion of the reading, the bell ringer tolled the Liberty Bell once more.

On the first anniversary of the adoption of the Declaration of Independence, the bell rang again, this time on the Fourth of July, a custom that was continued so long as the bell remained intact.

On September 11, 1777, Washington's army was defeated at the Battle of Brandywine by the superior forces of General Howe, who commanded the British Army. This meant that Philadelphia would soon be occupied by the enemy. All movable supplies that would be of material advantage to the British were, therefore, ordered transported to other places. This order included the Liberty Bell and all the church bells of the city.

The scene now shifts to what was then the quiet town of Bethlehem, Pa., seat of the Moravian Church in America, about 50 miles northwest of Philadelphia in a straight line.

The journal kept at the Brethren's House at Bethlehem contains this entry under the date of September 18: "A continual train of Army wagons came into the place." On September 24 the entry for the day reads:

"The whole of the heavy baggage of the Army, in a continuous train of 700 wagons, direct from camp, arrived under escort of 200 men, commanded by Col. William Polk, of North Carolina. They encamped on the south side of the Lehigh and in one night destroyed all our buckwheat and the fences around the fields. The wagons, after unloading, returned to Trenton for more stores. Among the things brought here were the church bells from Philadelphia and the wagon, in which was loaded the statehouse bell, broke down in the street and had to be unloaded."

The tradition has been handed down that John Jacob Mickley, a patriotic farmer, hauled the bell to Bethlehem, where, as already noted, his wagon broke down, when it was transferred to Frederick Leaser's wagon, who brought it to Allentown. There the Liberty Bell and the chimes of Christ Church were secreted beneath the stone floor of the church erected by the Zion Reformed congregation in 1774.

While there were conflicting stories for many years as to how the Liberty Bell was saved, some claiming that the bell was sunk in the Delaware, and others maintaining that it was sent to Lancaster, the foregoing account is undoubtedly true.

With the lapse of time, the bell came to be looked upon as an object of veneration and was only used on special occasions of rejoicing, or to commemorate some public event of importance.

On September 29, 1824, the bell rang to welcome Lafayette to Independence Hall during his memorable tour of America as the guest of the Nation which he helped to establish. Its sharp tones were heard on February 22, 1832, when the centennial anniversary of the birth of Washington was celebrated. During the same year it tolled the death of Charles Carroll, of Carrollton, the last of the signers of the Declaration of Independence to die.

On July 6, 1835, John Marshall, Chief Justice of the United States, and a veteran of the Revolution, who had spent the winter with Washington's army at nearby Valley Forge, breathed his last in Philadelphia.

Two days later the bell was cracked as it was being tolled in Marshall's memory while his body, with a distinguished escort, was borne through the streets of the city to the wharf, to be sent to his late home in Richmond, Va., by boat. It is interesting to note that this was precisely 59 years after the day when the bell proclaimed liberty to the American people.

The edges of the crack in the bell as it appears today are serrated, revealing marks of a drill. In 1846 it was suggested that the bell should be rung to celebrate Washington's birthday, and the crack was drilled out to separate the parted sides, with the hope that this would improve the sound. But the experiment proved unsuccessful.

The Liberty Bell became the property of Philadelphia when Independence Hall and the spacious square on which it stands were sold to the city for $70,000. That was in 1816, at which time the capital of the State was temporarily established at Lancaster, prior to its removal to Harrisburg.

Today the Liberty Bell is a silent memento of the historic past. But while its tongue is stilled, the old bell is more sacredly treasured than any other bell on earth.

International Wheat Agreement

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MILTON R. YOUNG
OF NORTH DAKOTA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement signed by A. S. Goss, master of the National Grange; Allan B. Kline, president of the American Farm Bureau Federation; and James Patton, president of the National Farmers Union, together with a synopsis of questions and answers regarding the international wheat agreement.

There being no objection, the matters referred to were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE NATIONAL GRANGE,
NATIONAL FARMERS' UNION,
AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION,
Washington, D. C., August 4, 1948.

HON. MILTON R. YOUNG,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR YOUNG: We, the heads of the three general farm organizations of the United States, appeal for your support in getting the International Wheat Agreement considered and ratified at this special session of Congress. The principal reasons in support of our appeal are—

(a) That the agreement assures to our wheat farmers the maintenance after World War II of the export markets lost to them after World War I;

(b) That the agreement stabilizes on the international level the world's most important commodity and thus stoutly reinforces our domestic agricultural price-stabilization and support programs:

(c) That the agreement precludes our being compelled by the weight of the stocks of wheat and other grains held by our Government under the commodity-loan programs to return to the extremely costly headaches of acreage reduction, marketing quotas, and all their concomitant and distasteful regulations;

(d) That the agreement guarantees to the United States, over and above our exports to the occupied areas of Germany and Japan and to any nonsignatory importing countries, an annual export market of 185,000,000 bushels compared with annual average exports of wheat, including wheat flour, during the 10-year period 1931–32 to 1940–41

(excluding 1935–36 and 1936–37 when the United States was a net importer) of about 60,000,000 bushels.

(e) That the agreement precludes cutthroat competition between three of the four principal wheat-exporting countries thus greatly reducing the cost to the United States Treasury of the export subsidies required to maintain exports of wheat and wheat-flour when the international price is below the market or support prices in the United States;

(f) That the agreement, in exchange for our guaranty to provide 185,000,000 bushels per year at a uniform ceiling price of $2 per bushel, guarantees an international price for our annual export quota of 185,000,000 bushels at not less than $1.50 per bushel in the first year, $1.40 in the second, $1.30 in the third, $1.20 in the fourth, and $1.10 in the fifth;

(g) That the agreement records, in the case of wheat, the success of the United States fight against bilateral discriminatory agreements; failure to ratify the agreement at the present special session of Congress would be a critical set-back;

(h) That the agreement is an integral part of the economic aspects of our bipartisan foreign policy;

(i) That the agreement contains the first fruits of the leadership the United States has given in international councils in the development of a world-wide program of cooperation between nations to expand production and consumption and thereby avoid a repetition of the economic waste which followed in the wake of the First World War;

(j) That the agreement makes a substantial contribution to the general economic welfare which is so potent an influence in strengthening peaceful and democratic processes;

(k) That the agreement assures, if ratified by the present special session of Congress, much more favorable terms to our wheat farmers than any agreement which could be renegotiated in the foreseeable future (with the sole exception of the United Kingdom, all the countries which participated in the negotiations at the International Wheat Conference held in London in the spring of 1947 were then prepared to sign an agreement which provided a ceiling of $1.80 per bushel; the present agreement provides a ceiling for 5 years of $2 per bushel; clearly the bargaining position of the exporting countries is now, and in all probability will continue to be, much weaker than it was when the agreement was negotiated in February of this year);

(l) That the agreement assures an adequate supply of wheat to the European nations which tried to become self-sufficient after World War I and should thereby prevent a repetition of uneconomic wheat production behind prohibitive tariff walls and would thus permit our wheat to flow in natural channels;

(m) That the agreement will cost the United States Government little or nothing because under the Economic Cooperation Act we are already committed to supply hundreds of millions of bushels of wheat at whatever the cost may be; such deliveries can be applied in most cases against our commitments under the wheat agreement; and

(n) That the agreement can be ratified subject to the condition that Australia and the United Kingdom (both of which declared to the International Wheat Council on July 6 that their withdrawal was solely attributable to the failure of the United States to ratify and that in the absence of any prediction that the United States Senate would ratify the agreement in time to bring it into force in the 1948–49 crop year they felt they had no legal alternative to withdrawal) accede under article XXI to the agreement on its present terms and that the majority of the other importing countries which have not so far ratified, or which have withdrawn also accede by a date to be fixed by the International Wheat Council.

In concluding this appeal to you, Mr. Senator, we should like to emphasize the importance we attach to keeping the wheat agreement within the framework of our nonpartisan foreign economic policy just as we are so keeping all other international economic questions such as those being dealt with by the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (the FAO).

In the councils of the FAO and the International Federation of Agricultural Producers (the IFAP—a nongovernmental body consisting of the independent farm organizations of 20 countries) the farm organizations of the United States have played a prominent part. Our leadership has been recognized and accepted as objective, fair, and democratic. We cannot overemphasize the importance we attach to the retention of the international good will we have so far succeeded in establishing.

Through the annual conferences of the FAO, and in other international agricultural forums, our Government, strongly supported by the farm organizations of the United States, has advocated the solution of international economic problems, such as the threatened wheat-surplus problem, by multilateral commodity agreements. The world has accepted this approach. The wheat agreement is the first attempt to apply it. We cannot afford as the architects of that agreement to let it fail.

In the hope that it will be helpful to you in considering the arguments for and against the ratification at this time by the United States Senate of the International Wheat Agreement, we enclose a synopsis of the questions which have been raised regarding it and our answers thereto.

Sincerely yours,

A. S. Goss,
Master, the National Grange.

President, National Farmers Union.

SYNOPSIS OF QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS REGARDING THE INTERNATIONAL WHEAT AGREEMENT SIGNED IN MARCH 1948 BY THE UNITED STATES AND 35 OTHER COUNTRIES

1. Is it not too late to ratify the agreement because several countries, including the United Kingdom and Australia, have withdrawn?

Answer. While it is true that, due to an oversight in drafting, the International Wheat Council was not given authority under the terms of the agreement to extend the period of ratification in the case of exporting countries as it was in the case of importing countries, article XXI prescribes: "Subject to unanimity of the votes cast, any government may accede to this agreement upon conditions as the Council may lay down." Under this accession article the United States and the other countries late in ratifying, and also those countries which have withdrawn, could readily become parties to the agreement on its present terms by the simple procedure of those countries which now constitute the Council passing unanimously a resolution to that effect. The farm organizations of the United States are completely satisfied that the present Council would adopt without any hesitation such a resolution.

2. Does the agreement not mean more Government control and statism?

Answer. The farm organizations of America believe that the acreage reduction, marketing quotas, and unilateral export subsidizing, which failure to ratify the agreement would bring, would lead inevitably to much more governmental regulation and control of not only the wheat farmers, but of the grain and milling trades as well, than the maintenance of the large export trade which the agreement assures.

3. Is the agreement not prejudicial to the interests of the private grain, milling, and feeding trades of the United States?

Answer. The farm organizations have no quarrel to pick with these trades. Indeed, we would have welcomed their assistance in the past, and would welcome it in the future, in framing recommendations to the Congress on price support and other constructive agricultural legislative programs. The terms of the agreement leave each signatory country entirely free to use whatever marketing machinery it thinks best suited to carry out its obligations. Signatory importing countries can, under the terms of the agreement, buy from nonsignatory exporting countries, but they would do so at the risk of being called upon to make good their guaranties to buy at the floor prices the quotas of the signatory exporters. This should provide a strong incentive to buy at prices between the floor and ceiling even when nonsignatory exporters cut prices. Having greatly benefited ourselves by participating in the proceedings of the International Wheat Council, we recommend that the United States delegation to the Council and also its executive committee and its standing technical advisory committee on price equivalents should be reinforced by the appointment of two representatives—one nominated by the grain trade and one by the milling trade. The range between the guaranteed floor and ceiling prices of the agreement increases by 10 cents per bushel per year from 50 cents in 1948–49 to 90 cents in 1952–53. While we frankly confess that in our judgment this range is too wide, there can be no doubt of its offering every inducement to the private export trade to take the maximum advantage of the Government's policy, which we unanimously endorse, of encouraging private versus governmental enterprise.

4. Is the agreement not worthless because of its escape clauses?

Answer. One of the three so-called escape clauses permits the United States and other signatory exporting countries in the event of a short crop to be temporarily relieved of their obligations to supply the whole of their annual quotas at the ceiling price of $2 per bushel. We would naturally resent any hint from any quarter that the United States would invoke this sensible provision to meet unforeseeable contingencies in order to get out of her obligations. The only other so-called escape clause of importance is the one under which, in the event of an emergency with respect to its balance of payments or monetary reserves, an importing country may appeal to the Council for temporary relief. This clause was inserted in the agreement before the Economic Cooperation Act was adopted by the United States Congress to remedy the precarious balance of payments and monetary reserve positions of certain countries of western Europe. We believe that act will achieve its objectives and if it does there should be few if any grounds on which an importing country could successfully invoke the escape clause under reference. Moreover, should that clause be invoked the country concerned must first establish its case through the International Monetary Fund (in the councils of which the United States has an important voice) and then through the International Wheat Council (on which the exporting countries hold half the votes) and then still have to demonstrate that it has not bought any wheat, or any grains substitutable therefor, with negotiable assets from any nonsignatory exporting country.

5. By holding only 370 of the 2,000 votes will the interests of the United States not be at the mercy of foreigners?

Answer. The terms of the agreement—the essence of which is a multilateral long-term contract—protect the important interests of the United States and of the other signatory countries. The discretion granted to the International Wheat Council—the body set up to administer the agreement—is very much less than that normally delegated by legislation to administrators. There is every reason to suppose that on important issues the interests of Australia, Canada, and the United States will be similar if not identical. These three countries hold 50 percent of the votes and can therefore prevent any decision by the Council inimicable to their interests because all consequential matters require a majority or two-thirds of the votes held by the exporting and importing countries voting separately. Up to a late stage in the negotiations the terms of the draft agreement prescribed that decisions of the Council required a two-thirds affirmative vote by the exporting and importing countries voting separately, thus permitting a veto by a country holding only one-sixth of the total votes. At that time it was expected that, as in the case of the 1942 agreement, Australia, Canada, and the United States would agree each to hold an equal number of votes. Certain of the importing countries protested that such arrangements would give the United Kingdom a veto on too many issues. The United Kingdom accepted a proposal by France to amend the draft agreement to provide for the retention of a veto by the United Kingdom—and also by the United States and Canada—on only a few vital issues. Having observed with consternation the frustrations of the Security Council of the United Nations caused by the excessive use of the veto, we commend rather than censure the wheat agreement for minimizing the right of any country to stand out against an overwhelming majority.

6. Does the agreement not give insufficient protection to the flour-milling industry of the United States?

Answer. During the negotiation of the agreement the representatives of several importing countries persistently argued in favor of prescribing in the agreement the maximum quantity of flour which each importing country could be asked to take. Realizing that on this point the bargaining advantage would lie with the exporting countries when prices were at or near the ceiling and with the importing countries when prices were below that level, the exporting countries, supported by the United Kingdom, argued that this matter should be left for negotiation between the buyer and the seller. The preparatory committee which was asked to make all the necessary preparations to put the agreement into effect on August 1, 1948, unanimously recommended that this admittedly difficult problem should be dealt with simply by instructing the secretary of the Council to record against the guaranteed quantities of the exporting and importing countries concerned the flour sales reported to him by the exporting countries and that these records would be changed only in the unlikely event of the importing country establishing a case that the price its importers had agreed to pay for the flour was inconsistent with the wheat price provisions of the agreement.

7. Are the terms of the International Wheat Agreement not inconsistent with the provisions of the charter of the proposed International Trade Organization?

Answer. The terms of the draft wheat agreement prepared at the London Conference, held in the spring of 1947, were—except that the prices prescribed by it were substantially lower—practically identical to the agreement signed in Washington in March 1948. At the United Nations Conference on Trade and Employment, held recently in Habana, the United Kingdom representative, supported by the representatives of the United States and other countries, repeatedly emphasized the fact that the provisions of chapter VI of the draft ITO charter, which deals with intergovernmental commodity agreements, were based on the provisions of the International Wheat Agreement. The IFAP—on which the three general farm organizations of the United States are represented—would not have supported at the Habana Conference the adoption of chapter VI had its terms been in any way inconsistent with those of the wheat agreement.

8. Will the agreement work in the absence of the Argentine, Russia, and her wheat-exporting satellites?

Answer. The U. S. S. R. was the first country invited to join the International Wheat Council established in Washington in 1942 by the Governments of the United States, the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, and Argentina. She declined. The U. S. S. R. was invited to attend the London Wheat Conference in 1947 and the Washington Wheat Conference in 1948. No reply was received to either invitation. Owing to the great increase in her population and the semiarid nature of her wheat-growing areas, Russia is not, and cannot in the future be, a natural exporter of wheat. The Argentine participated in the proceedings of both the London and the Washington Wheat Conferences. At the London Conference and again at the Washington Conference, the representatives of Argentina gave as their Government's reason for not joining in the international effort to stabilize the price of wheat the lack of stability of the prices of the things Argentina imported. The other countries decided in London, and again in Washington, that while they would much prefer an agreement in which Argentina was a cooperating member, they would also much prefer an agreement without the Argentine than no agreement. Having been charged for wheat during the past few years by Argentina all the traffic would bear, and having watched her wheat production steadily decline because the farmers of Argentina were given only a fraction of that charge, it seems to us inconceivable that the importing countries would give a preference to Argentina in their wheat purchases. Should the Argentine cut prices as a means of inducing signatory importing countries to buy her wheat the importing countries, if any, tempted to buy it would be effectively restrained by their pledged word to buy from signatory exporting countries their full export quotas at not less than the guaranteed minimum prices. The agricultural changes which reduced the wheat-exporting capacity of Russia are now taking place in Hungary, Rumania, and Yugoslavia. It is not expected that these countries would be able, should they wish to do so, to disturb by their wheat export programs the effective operation of the International Wheat Agreement.

9. Would the agreement not oblige the United States Treasury to pay enormous export subsidies?

Answer. Under the terms of the agreement the United States is obliged, if called upon to do so, to supply up to 185,000,000 bushels of wheat, and flour expressed in terms of wheat, at $2 per bushel. Although we presume that the United States will, in order to protect and maintain its export markets, meet the prices of the other signatory exporting countries she is under no obligation throughout the life of the agreement to sell any wheat at less than $2 per bushel. At the moment the market price of wheat at country points is about 11 cents under the loan-supported price level. Roughly speaking, the United States could at today's market prices meet its obligation to supply wheat at the ceiling price of $2 per bushel with an export subsidy of 20 cents per bushel. In future years with the support price declining, with the expected increase in exportable supplies the rate of export subsidy, if any, should be substantially less. But much more important than the unpredictable precise rate of export subsidy is the fact that in the absence of the export outlets that the wheat agreement guarantees, the price-support program for wheat might well break down and enforce the imposition of acreage restrictions and marketing quotas.

School-Lunch Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN L. McMILLAN
OF SOUTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. McMILLAN of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, the school-lunch program has proven to be one of the most satisfactory laws ever enacted by the Congress. Our greatest asset is our children. We can expect the future affairs of our country to be handled by the boys and girls who are trying to secure an education, some of whom are making great sacrifices to prepare themselves to take over the burden of our national affairs when we have passed on.

I think the least we could do is to see that they receive proper nourishment and the school-lunch program does more to take care of this situation than any other one thing I can mention at this time.

I am inserting in the RECORD a letter which shows that the school-lunch program has been administered and worked out satisfactorily in my State:

UNITED STATES
DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE, PRODUCTION AND MARKETING ADMINISTRATION,
Columbia, S. C., July 20, 1948.

Hon. JOHN L. McMILLAN,
Member of Congress,
House of Representatives,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. McMILLAN: For your information, I would like to give you a brief summary of the recent price-support operations of the Department of Agriculture on Irish potatoes produced in South Carolina.

Due to weather conditions, the potato crop in South Carolina was extremely short, the total yield being less than half of the yield for 1947. In spite of this short crop, however, the market conditions at the time of harvesting of our potatoes were such that it was necessary for the Department to purchase approximately half of the potatoes harvested in the State. The equivalent of 400 carloads of 300 bags per car was purchased by the Department.

In disposing of these purchased potatoes, the outlets were as follows in round figures:

Outlet:	Number of cars
School lunch and charitable institutions	16
Industrial alcohol	123
Livestock feeding demonstrations in South Carolina	243
Potato flour manufacture	9
Sales to the South Carolina penitentiary	7

The most interesting development that came out of the potato situation this year was the use of surplus potatoes in feeding livestock in South Carolina. Arrangements were made between this office and the South Carolina Extension Service for the Government to donate the surplus potatoes as purchased to the extension service for the purpose of conducting these livestock feeding demonstrations throughout the State. There exists practically no experimental work on the feeding of Irish potatoes to livestock. Of course, in actual practice, many individual farmers, particularly in the potato area, had in past years fed potatoes to their livestock. The farmers in this State became very much interested in this demonstration and actually placed orders with the extension service for approximately 600 cars of potatoes which, in turn, the extension service place with us. We were only able to ship to livestock feeders 243 cars. However, arrangements were made through the Department of Agriculture so that an additional 250 cars were shipped into this State from surplus purchases of potatoes in North Carolina.

The reports now coming in from farmers through the county agents in the various counties indicate that the feeding demonstrations were very successful. The potatoes were fed to dairy cattle, beef cattle, hogs and, in some instances, to poultry.

The amount of purchases in hundredweight and the amount of money actually paid to the growers in the various counties of this State are given below:

	Hundredweight	Amount
Horry County	22,879	$65,138.14
Georgetown County	79	225.15
Marion County	41	112.27
Dillon County	32	46.40
Total, Horry area (19 percent)	23,031	65,521.96
Beaufort County	18,121	47,361.50
Colleton County	4,722	11,705.67
Hampton County	924	1,899.17
Allendale County	57	86.92
Total, Beaufort area (20 percent)	23,824	61,053.26
Charleston County	72,669	181,414.32
Dorchester County	500	1,307.90
Berkeley County	226	579.75
Total, Charleston area (61 percent)	73,395	183,301.97
Total for State (100 percent)	120,250	309,877.19

Of course, it is always regrettable when the Government has to step in and support prices by purchases of commodities from the growers. It would be much more satisfactory to everybody concerned if the market would take the product at a reasonable and fair price. However, since the market would not take our potatoes, it can be said that the Government's price support kept many of our potato growers this year from going bankrupt. With the combination of an extremely small crop and no commercial market for the potatoes as occurred this year, it would have meant financial ruin to many of the growers if it had not been for the price-support program.

With kindest regards and best personal wishes, I am,

Very truly yours,

R. W. HAMILTON,
Executive Officer.

Why Meat Prices Get Out of Line

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. REID F. MURRAY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, many, many times I have called the attention of the Congress to the fact that, first, the New Deal agricultural program is antilivestock in its operations; and second, it subsidizes soil-depleting crops.

Section 32 funds are obtained by setting aside 30 percent of the custom receipts from imports, and the announced purpose is to distribute surpluses. Most agricultural products imported are livestock products, and wool imports alone have provided a large percentage of the funds provided.

What happens to the money obtained largely from the wool and the livestock products imported?

Just analyze the following table which is a recent report on this year's operations in the use of section 32 funds:

Exportation and domestic consumption of agricultural commodities; approved programs and obligations by commodities (July 1, 1947, to May 31, 1948)

What do you find? First, you note the livestock industry is being used as a pawn to get rid of Virginia apples. Second, you note the livestock industry is being used as a tool in order to get rid of surplus potatoes and other vegetables and fruits. Third, be sure to note the cotton subsidy. Cotton gets under three tents. First, $2,600,000 for export subsidy; second, for insulation to the tune of $1,000,000 for this year; and third, under the guise of paper making. Fourth, then be sure to note the $8,200,000 out of this year's funds that is being spent for subsidizing tobacco exports. Is it surprising the tobacco lobbyist can give $10 to $25 banquets to the faithful? Fifth, you will note that these funds are also being used to administer the marketing agreements. These agreements should be administered by appropriated funds.

Would you believe that a few corporations—the bad corporations that the New Deal always complains about—has had millions of dollars as a subsidy for using cotton? Just try to get someone to deny this if you can.

This, my colleagues, is just one of the many injustices accorded the livestock industry by the present administration.

The livestock industry accounts for a large percentage of the national farm income and it should not be used to continually subsidize cotton, peanuts, and tobacco, and other soil-depleting crops.

Is it surprising that sheep numbers have been reduced by 37 percent, hogs by 40 percent, and cattle numbers by 6,000,000 head? Is it surprising that meat is short in the market place? Do you like to pay taxes to furnish millions of dollars for subsidizing nonfood crops? Do you like to raise hogs and sheep, produce beef, and also milk the cows to provide funds to subsidize in the millions the exportation of cotton and tobacco?

We have a lopsided, unscientific, uneconomic, sectional program that depletes the soil regardless of the vocal expressions to the contrary.

Exposure of Communist Activities

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALEXANDER WILEY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a statement which I have issued on the subject of the exposure of Communist activities in government. In this statement I have attempted to discuss the larger implications of the current investigations that are being made by congressional committees on espionage activities in government.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COMMUNIST EXPOSÉ PROVES ADMINISTRATION GUILT IN CODDLING REDS

The current shocking exposure of the key Communist, Red sympathizers and fellow-travelers who have occupied immensely important positions in Government demonstrates the folowing facts:

CODDLING OF REDS IS ELECTION ISSUE

1. The issue of the administration's coddling of Reds and Red sympathizers in government is going to be a crucial issue in the coming political campaign. It has become obvious that the present administration, in spite of its pious protests against communism, has served as a fertile breeding ground for Reds during the last 16 years. It is perfectly ridiculous for the administration to be claiming that it is "standing up" to the Reds in Berlin at the same time that abundant proof is available that this same administration has been making things perfectly easy for Soviet agents in our own country to gather key information, to exercise policy functions, etc.

NO SMOKE SCREENING

2. The exposure of the Communist menace in Government should not be used to take away completely our attention from other significant issues facing the Nation, notably the foreign policy crisis and the issue of inflation. On the other hand, it is obvious that the administration and its apologists are trying to ridicule the present investigation of the Communist menace and to attempt to smear it as a "circus," as "unnecessary," as "repetitious," or to otherwise poison the minds of the American public against those who are conscientiously trying to ferret out Red agents. The administration hopes that it can throw up a smoke screen against this Red investigation. It hopes that by constantly emphasizing high prices (without using any of its powers to control high prices) it can draw the public's attention away from the issue of communism. This anti-Red investigation should not be used as a smoke screen; neither should smoke screens be used against it.

HAMSTRINGING OF FBI

3. There are indications that the FBI has been constantly hamstrung in its efforts to expose key Reds in Government or at the very minimum to have them removed from Government positions. I am sure that had the counsel of J. Edgar Hoover and his organization been respected and followed, these Soviet agents who have now been exposed would long ago have been ejected from the Federal pay roll.

MENACE OF COMMUNISM

4. Once again it has been demonstrated that communism is not just an idle tea-time political philosophy, not something that can be laughed off as the futile activity of a few long-haired radicals. Communism is a world-wide conspiracy, a fanatic irreligious and antireligious crusade, an international espionage movement, which will utilize every last device and tactic in its devil's arsenal in order to gain its objectives. These facts once again underline the importance of legislation to control communism in our midst—legislation similar to the Mundt-Nixon bill, which has now been revised in the Senate Judiciary Committee, of which I am chairman.

MUNDT-NIXON BILL

It is obvious that sufficient time is lacking in the special session to take up this bill. It is further obvious that unless a strongly Republican Senate and House are voted into power in November, an adequate anti-Communist bill may not be enacted by the Congress. Therefore, it is essential that a strongly Republican Senate and House be elected in order that the Eighty-first Congress may take decisive action on this anti-Communist legislation.

It is notable that the present administration's Department of Justice took away three precious weeks in delaying its report on the Mundt-Nixon bill after such report had been requested by the Senate Judiciary Committee. This report on constitutionality was promised by the Department day after day, week after week, and arrived only in the closing days of the Senate session. Thus, the bill was in effect partially sabotaged by the very administration which claims it is anti-Communist in its foreign policy.

CONFIRMING ALL ANTI-RED EVIDENCE

It is important that all of the evidence which has been presented before the congressional committees on the Red network be fully corroborated wherever possible. In the past, the Communists have been successful in smearing these anti-Red investigations because, in part, some evidence in these probes has not been fully confirmed. Therefore, it is essential for the sake of justice and for the sake of the effectiveness of this anti-Red campaign that the fullest care be taken to substantiate all of the charges which have been leveled at individuals and organizations.

There is common talk that the special session was called by the administration as a smoke screen against this exposure of Communists which it knew was in the offing. Such smoke screening must be vigorously smashed.

Tributes to Kenneth W. Simons, Late Editor of Bismarck (N. Dak.) Tribune

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MILTON R. YOUNG

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement prepared by myself in tribute to Kenneth W. Simons, deceased, who was for 20 years before his untimely death the editor of the Bismarck (N. Dak.) Tribune, together with a statement prepared by M. J. Connolly, secretary of the North Dakota Automobile Club and assisistant secretary of the Greater North Dakota Association.

There being no objection, the statements were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY HON. MILTON R. YOUNG, OF NORTH DAKOTA

Mr. President, the State of North Dakota lost one of its outstanding citizens last April 20, a man who contributed much to the progress and development of the great State in which he lived.

I speak of Mr. Kenneth W. Simons, who was for 20 years before his untimely death the editor of the Bismarck Tribune—one of the great newspapers of my State, and, indeed, of the Nation.

Professionally, as a newspaperman, Ken Simons was among the most able in the entire country. It was under his leadership that the Bismarck Tribune won the most coveted prize in American journalism—the Pulitzer prize for "the most disinterested and meritorious public service rendered by an American newspaper for the year 1937."

His editorials were oftentimes brilliant pieces of analytic, to-the-point writing. His political comments were keen, accurate. His news writing was on a general plane that few newswriters are able to achieve. Most important, he was a man of vision and ideas, and it was this quality together with his ability to put visions and ideas down on paper and into action that made him the powerful influence he was.

Ken Simons probably will be longest remembered, outside of the newspaper profession, for his contribution to the water development program in North Dakota. He recognized, long before most others, that the exploitation of the State's water resources was the answer to its economic problems. He saw irrigation as the answer to droughts such as that which almost ruined our great State in the thirties.

Recognizing this, Ken Simons did something about it. With the active support and guidance of his publishers, the late George D. Mann, and in more recent years Mrs. Stella I. Mann, he used the columns of the Tribune to tell the people of North Dakota what irrigation could do for them. For years he hammered away on this theme. As a result, Ken Simons served, under three governors, as vice chairman of the State water commission. It won for the Tribune a Pulitzer prize. But more important, it probably was as important as any other single influence in winning for North Dakota the water development we are now having.

The effects of Ken Simons' work and influence will be felt for generations in North Dakota. They will be seen in the Garrison Dam, in the irrigation projects in northwestern North Dakota, and on the Heart River, in the future stability we hope the economy of our State will attain as a result of these projects.

But they will be felt in other ways, too. Because Ken Simons' interest and influence extended to every phase of community life. Wherever the interest and welfare of his State and community were involved, Ken Simons and the Tribune were interested.

I personally knew Ken Simons as a real and valued friend. I knew him as a real progressive of outstanding courage and integrity, and as an independent thinker of sincere intellectual honesty. I knew him as a man of boundless energy and endless interests.

His loss was a great loss not only to his friends but to the community and State which he served so well.

KENNETH W. SIMONS—A TRIBUTE

(By M. J. Connolly)

Kenneth W. Simons was a friend of mine. He made that statement as he introduced me to Col. John S. Seybold of the Army engineers 4 days before his death, which occurred April 20.

Ken Simons was my friend from the day I met him, when as a stripling he came to North Dakota as manager of the Associated Press and came to Medora as the Greater North Dakota Association entertained a congressional tour in the North Dakota Badlands, urging that a portion of this scenic area be set aside as a national playground—preliminary work toward the establishment of the Theodore Roosevelt Memorial National Park. Ken rode horseback all the forenoon. He would have ridden all the afternoon had I not induced him to remain with me to take a "sun-kissed" shower bath and to lie in the shade at the Peaceful Valley Ranch during a lazy afternoon when we had time to get acquainted.

I treasure memories of this visit with Ken, and of hundreds of other visits which went on into the night at his home or mine.

Ken Simons had a remarkable mind. He was a great reader and during a lifetime of interviews with prominent people he got the benefit of the thoughts of others. He was a good listener. He was a student of books and people. He was a keen judge of human nature.

Ken was one of the most independent thinkers I have ever known. All his reading and his contacts influenced him, but only to the extent that they caused him to think. He was never alergic to new ideas, but the ideas had to stand the test of his logical mind. Saying "Yes" and "No" hundreds of times a day gave him plenty of practice in exercising judgment, which I feel he did to a remarkable degree.

I thought Ken Simons reached the right answer for a vast majority of the problems he faced. But I didn't always understand why he reached the conclusions he did. But I was his friend, and when next we met I asked him why—and my admiration for his splendid mentality grew. I also gained a great respect for his innate honesty, decency, and tolerance.

Ken Simons was a strong character. He had strong opinions on many questions and voiced them without fear. He was an able opponent and a great fighter for principle and frequently his ideas clashed with those of other strong-minded men.

I always considered, for instance, that the political column, Pertinax, was one of the most able columns ever published in the State.

Loyalty was another characteristic of Ken Simons. Publisher George D. Mann, who hired the young AP manager as editor of the Tribune, paid tribute to his loyalty in a clause in his will. That this confidence of Publisher Mann was not misplaced was nationally recognized when in 1937 Ken Simons won the Pulitzer prize for the Tribune as the editor who had done most to serve his home community in the educational work looking toward the establishment of irrigation in North Dakota. While willing to give credit to many other able workers, perhaps, I will be pardoned, as a friend, if I state that in my opinion Ken Simons did more than any other citizen to bring about the big State-wide water development program.

Ken Simons was a crusader who served his State well. He did fine things for other people, and served rather unselfishly. He ran a good race, fought a good fight, and was enriched only by the experience and the satisfaction which comes with the thought of a job well done.

Ken Simons was my friend and I do not deny I am prejudiced. Perhaps you may be one who will say this tribute to Ken's memory proves this, although my endeavor will be only to recite some facts I have actually witnessed of things which I learned first hand.

I introduced Ken to W. W. McLaughlin, head of the irrigation division of USDA, who gave the State invaluable assistance as the educational program for irrigation and water use was launched in the State. It was McLaughlin who suggested the necessity of a State water conservation commission and certain laws. It was Ken Simons who did the big job in getting this legislation written and the first appropriation carried. I wrote the legislature for KFYR that winter. I saw Ken at work. As a matter of fact I may have helped a bit. So, knowing what I know, I feel like giving Ken considerable credit. Ken Simons had opposed Governor LANGER during several elections, still Governor LANGER, now Senator LANGER, appointed Ken Simons to the water commission, where he served as vice chairman under three governors and up to the time of his death.

Gov. John Moses leaned heavily on Ken. Once there was a special session which remained in session after having accomplished its work; remained in fact until the Bismarck Tribune burned the solons until the senate voted to take away the courtesies of the floor and threatened to bring Simons before the bar of the senate. They might have done it, too, except there may have been a fear Ken would have accepted the invitation. The special session adjourned.

There was another time when conditions were so bad during depression days that few saw any way out but to call a special session of the legislature which was being demanded by the political opposition. It was Ken who suggested to Governor Moses that his answer was to be found in a good look at the growing crops and a demand that department heads cut down expenses 18 percent.

When the St. Louis Post-Dispatch started the publicity for "one valley and one plan," it was Ken Simons who carried the ball in North Dakota. There are some today who would say Simons was a Communist for advocating an MVA, but his agitation was for a purpose, and the purpose was served when the Army engineers and the Bureau of Reclamation got together on the unified program for the Pick-Sloan plan. The wedding of the agencies has been called a "shotgun wedding." I have always felt that Ken Simons held the shotgun, but again I may be prejudiced.

Then when it was known North Dakota was to have the great dam at Garrison and the vast Missouri-Souris irrigation projects, there were times when Ken Simons was called upon as the minuteman of the hour. Once an Army plane came from Omaha to Bismarck to take Ken to Washington to alone speak for the State. Again he went with others to secure appropriations for the Missouri-Souris. As a member of the water commission, he was perhaps the best friend in official circles that the reclamation forces have had, but he took more abuse than any member of the board. Of course, he was always the axman for Gov. John Moses and people got the habit of blaming him for decisions of the board under the Aandahl administration under which Ken never did claim to have advisory powers. Governor Aandahl could testify that Ken helped put down one or two revolutions. There were several organized campaigns against Simons. Agitation went forth against him because he favored a Missouri Valley Authority; because he was opposed to a Missouri Valley Authority. But his most active opponents respected Simons as a worthy adversary. Bill Langdon, who writes speeches and news stories for the Army engineers, knew where Simons stood at all times. So did Gen. Lewis A. Pick, as did Commissioner John Page and others who worked with him when Simons was president of the North Dakota Reclamation Association.

I always felt Ken Simons was eminently fair. I knew he was honest, loyal, able, and fearless.

Ken did have a way of irritating people, especially people in the stuffed-shirt class. Many said he was hard to handle and those who said this spoke the truth. Staid people, who voted the way their grandfathers did, will tell you he was erratic, progressive.

Ken did seem to keep things stirred up. Someone did a powerful lot of agitating for the American Legion home-building project at Bismarck. Simons may have been one of the principal agitators. Certainly he handled a lot of publicity. He was a pusher. The project was built. He was capable of planning, too.

And, speaking of planning, I think I know that Ken Simons did almost all the planning, all the writing, all the managing for the campaign which elected John Moses to the United States Senate. And as the governor was a sick man, Ken wrote and delivered his final report to the joint session of the North Dakota Legislature.

I have never known a better political prognosticator than Ken Simons as far as North Dakota is concerned. He guessed right more often than anyone I have ever known. Of course, that is personal, and I'll admit I may be prejudiced.

I always hoped to stick around long enough to see Ken Simons get the thanks and recognition I knew he deserved so well. I guess he was as often criticized by Mandan people as by any section. Still I doubt if any other man, unless it was A. J. Dexter, of the Northern Pacific, who did more toward pushing through the Heart Butte Dam, power and irrigation project, protection for Mandan against floods.

Banker Bill Davidson called Ken long distance to tell him he was going to fight him for the 1,830-foot level for the Garrison Dam. Ken said that when the fight was over and the dam was built to the 1,850 level they would shake hands and admit it had been a good fight. Davidson is still fighting and is making his influence felt. Perhaps, we can say that Ken is still in the fight, for his memory will long remain green and his influence will live after him.

"What builds the Nation's pillars high
And its foundations strong?
What makes it mighty to defy
The foes that round it strong?
No gold, but only men can make
A people great and strong;
Men who, for truth and honor's sake,
Stand fast and suffer long.
Brave men who work while others sleep,
Who dare while others fly—
They build a nation's pillars deep
And lift them to the sky."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES E. MURRAY

OF MONTANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial appearing in the Jewish Floridian, of Miami, Fla., Friday, July 23, 1948. The editorial is in regard to the services of my distinguished colleague the Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER].

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SENATOR CLAUDE PEPPER

(By Harry Simonhoff)

Listening to the Dixiecrats orating about States' rights, our own peculiar civilization, white supremacy, brings back memories of school days. These speeches have overtones of the great debate between Lincoln and Douglas. With eyes closed, one could, readily imagine himself back in the year of Grace, 1848.

Heaven knows we have enough complaints against Mr. Truman. But on the issue of civil rights, he happens to be on the side of the angels. Southern reactionaries resemble Bourbons: they neither learn nor forget. For them, the Russian revolution, the defeat of Hitlerism, the two World Wars were a pure waste. They still dream of a feudal society, with a white oligarchy riding on the backs of a Negro serfdom.

But there is another South, thank Heaven. In this camp are the Ellis Arnalls, the Hugo Blacks, the Ralph McGills, the David Cohns. These progressive spirits would rescue the South from pre-Confederate obscurantism. Their most eloquent spokesman is our own Senator PEPPER.

When CLAUDE PEPPER gets up in the morning, one can readily imagine, he rubs his eyes and asks himself, "Where am I? Washington? The United States Senate? Is it possible, or am I dreaming?" With what humility he carries himself. Not the assumed Uriah Heep pose of the politician who before election puts on a ragged suit and rants how hard he worked to support his pore old mother. PEPPER has a Lincolnesque quality—the humility of the truly great. Whether in a corridor of the National Capital, or in a swanky hotel on Miami Beach, or on his farm at Tallahassee, he is always approachable—even to the humblest.

PEPPER THE LIBERAL

It so happens that our Claude is gifted. As an eloquent speaker he has no peer in Congress. On the stump, he's a masterful campaigner; on the platform, lyrical and forceful; on the floor of the Senate, a logical debater. But his international reputation is not due to his gifts. Goebbels was also talented. It is PEPPER, the liberal, who has captured the imagination of progressive, forward-looking people everywhere. It is PEPPER, the liberal, whom we would like to see President of the United States.

CLAUDE PEPPER comes naturally by his liberalism. Forces shaped his destiny. In college, at Tuscaloosa, he worked his way by helping to wait on tables. At Harvard Law School, he came under the influence of Felix Frankfurter. Under F. D. R., he was a militant New Dealer. In the 1930's, PEPPER was an uncompromising hater of Hitlerism. All his life an enemy of anti-Semitism, he advocated a Jewish Commonwealth in Palestine long before Israel became a state.

Not that PEPPER is a starry-eyed idealist. He is shrewd and canny. He knows the devious ways of practical politics. He is no Hency Wallace who could let the Presidency slip through his fingers. It is the American tradition to be a great idealist and yet conversant with all the tricks of the political game. The biographies of Jefferson, Lincoln, Wilson, and both Roosevelts will demonstrate this quite clearly.

It is because PEPPER is a skillful, resourceful politician, who knows the score, that all the more credit is due him. Any child knows that it is dynamite for a Southern politician to favor rights for the Negro. Yet PEPPER worked to abolish the poll tax; he favored a national antilynch law. He is known to sympathize with the unpopular civil-rights measure. Last year, when in Tallahassee, I heard him address the Florida Legislature. He opposed sending aid to Greece. In so serious a step that might lead to war, our Government should have referred it first to the UN. He did not flinch before the hostile lawmakers, who under their breath were calling him a Communist.

PEPPER has the moral courage to take the unpopular side. He maintained a militant liberalism in the face of strongly mounting reaction that followed the death of F. D. R. A champion of the forgotten man, CLAUDE PEPPER stands out as the greatest figure in history of Florida.

James E. Watson

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM E. JENNER

OF INDIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. JENNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD a poem in tribute to the late Senator Watson, of Indiana, by Mark E. Winings, of Elwood, Ind.

There being no objection, the poem was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TRIBUTE TO THE HONORABLE JAMES E. WATSON

When the artist paints a picture
Of a long and winding lane,
With a tall and handsome figure
Marching to the Hall of Fame;
Or the poet sets to music
And the author makes you thrill
With the life of James E. Watson
In the town of old Rushville.

There he dwelt in friendly fashion
Sharing friendships, pride, and love;
In communion with his neighbors
All inspired from above—
Proud and boastful of their honor
For they all were much akin;
But they never used his title—
Everybody—called him Jim.

He was one of those good fellows
That you always want to know,
With a charm and warmth of laughter
That will set the heart aglow—
They still meet in congregations
Though the ranks are growing thin;
All defending their religion
And their politics by Jim.

With a magic voice of wisdom
And the logic of the gods,
He espoused a cause eternal
Regardless of the odds—
He believed in two worlds,
This one—and the next—
And he proved it by the Bible,
From where he took his text.

The State and Nation claims him
But a Hoosier, through and through!
Like Riley and the Mortons,
And the Harrisons we knew—
For he helped the wise and foolish,
The sinner and the saint;
And there are some crowns of glory
That no artist dares to paint.

Oh, the story reads like fiction
And it seems to have no end,
For it's hard to tell the story
Who was everybody's friend—
On the battlefields or oceans
Where the bugler sounds his taps,
You will hear some soldier whisper—
"Jim was sure a friend of Pap's."

When the future paints this picture
And the angels set the time
There will be a Master Artist,
Who will write and paint divine—
Then with deft and handy fingers
He will write upon the scroll,
The name of James E. Watson,
"A kindly, generous soul."

Consumer Credit Out of Hand

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCIS J. MYERS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article by Gregg MacGregor entitled "Consumer Credit Held 'Out of Hand,'" published in the New York Times of August 1, 1948.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONSUMER CREDIT HELD "OUT OF HAND"—RETURN OF INSTALLMENT CONTROLS WOULD CURB INFLATION SPIRAL, RETAIL EXECUTIVE ASSERTS

(By Gregg MacGregor)

Agreement with the view that national consumer credit is "getting out of hand and adding to the national inflationary spiral" was voiced last week by the credit manager of a department store with an annual volume in excess of $60,000,000.

"Although many credit experts point out that the ratio between consumer credit and the total national consumer income is currently much below the ratio in the 1935-to-1939 period," he declared, "we are still getting into deep waters. We are not in a normal period."

He said it is his belief that the majority of retailers throughout the country agree with him privately, but decline to declare themselves publicly on any form of Government control.

This is true, he said, because of the "blind opposition" by many retailers against controls. An honest opinion frequently causes much internal dissension, he asserted, giving that as the reason for asking that his name be withheld.

LITTLE MAN LIMITED

"The argument has been advanced that reimposition of installment credit controls would limit the buying power of the little man. They say a higher down payment works a discrimination in this respect," he declared.

"They are right, it limits his credit to what he can afford. When down payments are down to the point where installment buying becomes an impulse on the part of the consumer," he emphasized, "trouble is in sight."

The credit official pointed to the small but steady increase of repossessions. Under regulation W, he said, repossessions were negligible, because few people will make a substantial down payment and then lose their merchandise for lack of meeting installments.

He admitted that in theory a store can regulate its own installment credit terms but said that when a competitor eases terms the same terms must be met or sales will be lost.

Charge accounts are a different matter and have never been a large problem to credit men, he asserted. In his opinion those who have charge accounts are usually not as vulnerable to economic changes as the average installment buyer. He added that charge accounts are settled within a comparatively short time.

Current outstanding consumer credit is tying up working capital and worrying many retailers, he said. What will happen to the millions of dollars owed to retailers by consumers if a recession sets in, he asked. An economic reversal will mean the closing or output curtailment of many industrial plants, and this in turn will mean that some people will no longer have the money to pay installment obligations.

"Collections are down sharply from last year," he warned. "This is another danger signal. Any further undue increase in consumer credit will only accelerate the downward momentum of a decline when it comes."

The relationship between consumer credit and inflation is clear, he stated. As inflation brings up the national income the ratio with consumer credit becomes smaller. This, some credit men still insist, means more credit should be extended to bring up the ratio to that of normal times. But any retailer following this theory will wake up with an awful headache, he warned.

Democratic Party Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD V. ROBERTSON

OF WYOMING

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. ROBERTSON of Wyoming. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Impulse for Suicide," written by Doris Fleeson and published in the Washington Evening Star of August 4, 1948.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IMPULSE TO SUICIDE—DEMOCRATIC MEMBERS OF CONGRESS ACT AS IF PARTY IS NOT WORTH FIGHTING FOR

(By Doris Fleeson)

The Democrats' impulse toward suicide is proving too much for President Truman's gallant efforts to overcome.

The President, for all his mistakes in judgment, his lack of prescience and his inability to pick a competent staff, is showing a willingness to fight on against odds.

His party acts not only as if the cause were already lost but as if it were not worth while to make the record show what they were fighting for.

Like a man in the dentist's chair they sit dumbly and wait for the worst to happen. At times they seem even to have got past the point of wincing when the drill hits a nerve as in the current spy revelations. The impression given is that they are only waiting for it to be over.

LIKE A FUNERAL HOME

Democratic headquarters has all the vivacity of a funeral home.

Democrats in Congress have been taking their own sweet time about attending sessions and few bother to attend the sparse committee hearings the Republicans have allowed or go to the floor. This situation got to be such a scandal that special efforts are now being made to arrange some fireworks for adjournment if not before, with interested parties preparing powerful diatribes that Senators and Representatives seem unable to think up for themselves.

But up to now the Republicans have had it all their own way with no comments from the side lines.

Their Presidential candidate, the "sheltered" Governor of New York, has rested undisturbed in the half-in, half-out position he prefers to take on controversial matters. No rude questions by Democrats have intruded upon him.

The barrage laid down by Republicans against the special session has not been adequately countered. The transparent Republican tactic of moving into a filibuster on civil rights in the Senate has had no Democratic attention. Not a single Democrat was present when the Senate Banking and Currency Committee examined the President's inflation chief of staff, Paul Porter, Monday.

EXCEPTIONS TO INERTIA

There have been exceptions to the inertia. Representative HELEN GAHAGAN DOUGLAS, California Democrat, put Speaker MARTIN on the spot with regard to housing Monday when she swiftly moved for suspension of the rules so the Taft-Ellender-Wagner bill might be considered. The Speaker, plainly annoyed, announced that all such requests had to be cleared through the majority leader and refused to entertain the motion.

Senator PEPPER at the same time was ironically leading Senate Leader WHERRY through the President's recommendations and getting from him admissions that little could be expected regarding them.

Obviously the Republicans have the votes and no legislation could be forced past them. But the opportunity to spotlight their omissions with their reasons therefor is dribbling away.

The spy scare is also beyond Democratic control but there also answers could be made and motives could be spotlighted, including the question of the timing of the hearings which so effectively steal the headlines.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Speaker, during the approaching months I intend to report to my constituents on various important problems with which the Eightieth Congress has been concerned. Russian Propaganda Feeds on American Feuds

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES O. EASTLAND

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a copy of a letter written to a very noted columnist by the Honorable W. J. Littrell, of Laurel, Miss.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LAUREL, MISS.

Re Russian Propaganda Feeds on American Feuds.

DEAR SIR: Of all your columns, the good they have done and the criticism they may have brought upon you, the recent one on the above subject merits grave consideration by all our people.

Since the Civil War the people of the South have been held up to ridicule and raped economically by the moneyed interests of other sections, aided and abetted by certain politicians. The South has had no Marshall plan except in reverse.

At Philadelphia the Democratic Party, by a vote of about 3 to 1, repudiated the Constitution of the United States when it refused to approve a resolution from the floor pledging the party to uphold the rights of the various States as provided in the Constitution, thereby going on record as being against article X of the Constitution, which reads:

"The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people."

In what States did the German-American Bund openly parade before World War II? From what States come the Communists of today who are being investigated and arrested? Not from the Southern States that are under attack. Out of the South came Bilbo, Long, and Rankin; but out of the North, Kelly, Pendergast, Haig, Kelly, Wallace, ad infinitum. But what of the statesmen from the South in the past, and what is wrong with such men as Byrd, Russell, Thurmond, Laney, and many more? They are simply from the wrong side of the track—the same side that furnished its share of the founders of this great Nation. The birthplace of our Presidents, Virginia, is as much on the political blacklist as other Southern States.

We hear much about "civil rights," "human rights," etc., but what of relieving human misery in this country? All of these "rights" are of little value to indigent sufferers of disease, such as cancer, polio, etc., dependent solely on charity. It is of little help to provide housing, food, clothing, and doctors for those millions of wage earners. It does not protect the returning veterans against the national swindle on shoddy houses or the used-car racket. Why don't politicians stop the "feuding" by doing something about all these things first, then give us all the civil-rights legislation the Communists can think up, not just for the consumption of the southern people, but for all the people.

Our northern politicians say they want to help the Negroes in the South. If our Federal Government is to be thy brother's keeper, why hasn't it done something about the North American Indians, herded on reservations in poverty and disease, not even citizens of these United States? Poll tax don't keep these Indians from voting. Where do race riots occur? Where do gang murders make history under the nose of the law? Did the mayor of Milwaukee know that only recently at St. Paul an employee was murdered by a mob just because of trying to go to work at his job in a meat-packing plant? Do they know that right in Washington, D. C., more heinous crimes were committed in 1947, by far, than in any previous year? Yet, with one lynching in the South in 1947 (gang murder in the North), they bellow for an antilynching law—they want to create a police state of the South, yet wink at the handling of crime in their own bailiwick and that of the Federal Government. They say Negroes are not given a fair trial because they are not on the jury, yet how many Federal juries in the past have had Negroes? But what do they say of the many States that exclude women from jury service? Just how are Indians given a fair trial either in State or Federal courts?

New Hampshire has a poll-tax law. So why is it that all we hear about is the South? Answer, hate and intolerance toward the South. These same people who are too poor to pay $2 per year as a prerequisite to being a qualified elector are paying $1.50 to $2 per month to maintain membership in a union. It is apathy that keeps people from voting in this country more than any other thing.

I believe Lord Halifax once said that those farthest from India could solve her problems best. Thus it has come to pass in this country. California has her race problem with the Japs and Mexicans, and those people are in better position to work them out than if the South nosed in and tried to dictate, and so it is with all States—they have their problems and should be allowed to solve them.

People in the South have faults, many of them, as do all parts of the country. It is one thing to be "anti" this and that in Minnesota where they have less than 10,000 Negroes, and another thing to say what you would do and think, should you live in a State with 2,000,000 Negroes and not many more whites. Give us no more Negroes than Minnesota and we can easily abolish segregation entirely.

Give us more understanding and less agitation.

Very truly yours,

W. J. LITTRELL.

The Special Session of Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER

OF FLORIDA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to incorporate in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial from the New York Times of August 1, 1948, entitled "A Week on Capitol Hill."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A WEEK ON CAPITOL HILL

On the record to date hardly anybody concerned with the special session of the Eightieth Congress is likely to come out of it with increased prestige. President Truman injured in three ways his own chances of getting desired and needed legislation: first, by his disparaging remarks about Congress during his western trip and later; second, by choosing the incongruous occasion of the Democratic national convention's final hours to announce the call; third, by laying out a program which could not possibly be enacted in its entirety, even by a Congress ready to roll over and purr at the presidential voice, during the time now available.

The Republicans and a Democratic minority from the South are in no better position. As part of his civil-rights program Mr. Truman asked for an anti-poll-tax bill. The Republicans are within the letter of the program in bringing this bill forward as the first item on the program, but it is difficult to believe that they have done so with the object of bettering our democracy or of gratifying the President. They knew, as did everybody else, that this bill would produce a filibuster, in which Southern Senators, in the name of liberty, would try to invoke minority rule in Congress in order to continue it in the poll-tax States.

The Senate Republicans have frankly admitted that they do not propose to undertake any legislation which would "interfere with the proper conduct" of the fall campaign. The House Republicans have accepted this principle with even greater alacrity. This is human and natural, since the entire membership must contest its seats this fall in each case where reelection is sought, whereas two-thirds of the Senators are secure for two or four years. Still, there is an inevitable conflict between political ambitions and the Nation's needs.

No one would expect, of ccurse, that Congress at this session should deal with problems not already studied and discussed. But there are other problems which have received such consideration. Housing is one such problem. The Taft-Ellender-Wagner bill has passed the Senate and would pass the House if it were not arbitrarily held in committee. Yet Senator TAFT, one of the bill's authors, has specifically announced that he will not press for action at this session. Little time would be required to authorize the promised $65,000,000 loan to the United Nations for its East River Capitol; to revise the displaced persons law, so that Hitler's and Stalin's real victims could be received here; to correct recently created inequities in the pay of Federal employees; and to reverse the unwise decision by which TVA, chief supplier of power to our atomic plants at Oak Ridge, was forbidden to strengthen its system by building a new steam installation.

The Republican majority in the Senate, with the assistance of the liberal Democrats of the North, has the means to break up any poll-tax filibuster. The Republican majorities in the two Houses have the power to do what actually needs to be done, and to do it within another week or two weeks. It may be objected that the control of inflationary trends is a necessity. Here however, we have a legitimate difference of opinion between the two major parties, and there is no possibility that the present congressional majority will attempt to control inflation along the lines Mr. Truman has laid down. The Republicans have their own program, as announced at Philadelphia. If there is a risk in waiting 6 months to put it into effect this is a calculated risk which a political party, under our system of government, has a right to take.

We have no reason to expect too much moral grandeur in candidates for office in a political year. Such candidates are after votes, just as businessmen are after profits and workingmen are after as much pay as they can get. We can, however, ask our candidates to earn their votes, just as we hope businessmen earn their profits and workingmen their wages. And in order to do this they must lift their eyes above the cloak rooms and committee rooms on Capitol Hill to more distant scenes. Our people desire prosperity and peace. They have a sense of justice and a feeling of crisis. The independent vote this fall will be large and it is likely to go to the party and candidate able to rise above partisanship and above personal interest. But no decision on this basis could be made on what the special session has so far accomplished or proposed. This has not been a fruitful week, and if present congressional majority plans are followed, next week will not be fruitful, either. We believe the Republicans will be wise to expand those plans.

Reimposition of Curbs on Consumer Credit

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANCIS J. MYERS
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial from the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette advocating the reimposition of curbs on consumer credit.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ONE INFLATION CHECK

To one point of President Truman's counterinflation program, presented Congress last November and probably to be submitted in much the same form at the coming special session, there should be little challenge by the Republicans. This concerns curbs on consumer credit.

Viewed in the perspective of the Nation's whole inflation problem, installment buying is not a critical factor. Since Congress permitted wartime controls on consumer credit to die in November 1947, the rise in such types of purchasing has been little more than a billion and a half dollars, which represents only a drop in the cost-of-living bucket.

Yet, the trend—a percentage jump of 13 points since November—is dangerous, and can be even more dangerous in the future, what with the decline in savings among the lower-income groups likely to increase the rate of credit buying.

A relatively lax credit policy means more dollars enter the market place to compete for the short supply of goods, a condition that reflects itself in higher and higher prices. Further, at this time when the Government is engaged in a huge defense program, installment selling of consumer goods tends to step up the bidding for, and thus the prices of, basic materials.

Actually, most credit men throughout the country have voluntarily tightened up installment terms if for nothing else than their own protection. Nevertheless, there are reckless and irresponsible members of any group, and the prospect of beating competition by liberalizing payment terms is certain to tempt some retailers. And it takes only a handful of them to touch off an inflationary credit war.

Fortunately, consumer credit is one element of inflation which can be controlled without much trouble. All that is needed is for Congress to give the Federal Reserve Board the same powers to set installment rates which it held throughout the war.

Pending before the House Banking Committee is a bill, sponsored by Senator BUCK, of Delaware, that would do just this. Certainly, the Eightieth Congress should adopt so elementary an inflation check without further stalling.

Proposed Nomination of William O. Douglas To Be President

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GLEN H. TAYLOR
OF IDAHO
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a telegram from Chester Bowles, Leon Henderson, and Walter Reuther to Mrs. Elliott Dexter, of Encino, Calif., soliciting her aid in trying to put over the nomination of William O. Douglas as Democratic candidate for President, at the Democratic National Convention, and also the reply which Mrs. Dexter sent to those gentlemen.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PHILADELPHIA, PA., July 8, 1948.

Mrs. ELLIOTT DEXTER,
Encino, Calif.:

A people which found Abraham Lincoln to lead them through their valley of the shadow and which brought forth Franklin D. Roosevelt in the hour of world agony cannot endure that in this crisis their choice for world leadership should be restricted to Dewey, Truman, and Wallace. We require a political and moral leadership which offers hope to all men everywhere by virtue of the equivalence of its professions and its practice. We require, also, a President whose personal qualities symbolize the America that we hope for and struggle to achieve. Such a man is Supreme Court Justice William O. Douglas. In view of the events of the last few days it is clear that the progressive forces in our Nation must unite on William O. Douglas for President. The record shows clearly that this man alone of those now available possesses the moral stature and political wisdom required of the President of the United States. The time is late but the issue is not lost. Mr. Douglas can be the Democratic Party Presidential nominee if sufficient support is evident before Saturday night's caucus of uncommitted Democratic delegates called by James Roosevelt. All stand against the current leadership and can unite upon William O. Douglas for President if Nation-wide sentiment demands this. We call upon you and your friends to indicate support of Mr. Douglas through telegraphic reply to the undersigned. We ask you to send to Leon Henderson at 610 Keystone State Building, Philadelphia, your financial contribution to help in this last ditch struggle to secure a President worthy of our great tradition. Let us fight to win with a man who represents the best in America's greatness. There is no greater cause than this. It is now up to you.

CHESTER BOWLES.
LEON HENDERSON.
WALTER REUTHER.

ENCINO, CALIF., July 9, 1948.

LEON HENDERSON,
Philadelphia, Pa.:

Since you listed me as one of Gideon's Angels in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 5 for the benefit of the Thomas committee I am amazed, but not honored, to receive your telegram asking me to support your present program. It has been the continued lack of cooperation of ADA with the other members of the great progressive cause who stood together under Franklin Roosevelt that has put this country in the very position which you deplore now that the Democratic Party is drowning. You insult my integrity, my conscience, and my devotion to America to suggest or even imagine that I or any of my friends, whom I feel are as much devoted to America as was Franklin Roosevelt and are Henry Wallace and many great progressive Republicans and Democrats, would now rally to your support. It is amazing that you are now willing to accept such dangerous elements into your party after you have spent the last 2 years hurling invectives against us. When we have simply followed the dictates of our conscience you would have it believed that conscience is just a slick word for Moscow.

It is a strange day when members of your organization in the press and over the radio insult Henry Wallace by saying that he is controlled by the Communist Party or he is getting his orders from Moscow. It was simply because he could not be controlled by any party that in 1944 those who led the worst elements of the Democratic Party threw off Henry Wallace when he was about to be nominated, even after he had openly stated that the poll tax must go as must many other of our most undemocratic practices which still have never been remedied and are now again going back 50 years.

When Jackson found that Henry Wallace was continuing to win despite these statements he pulled a trick and called a recess. Despite the fact that you and those at the convention knew that Henry Wallace was the choice of Franklin Roosevelt these bad elements of the politicians were allowed to switch the delegates to Harry Truman. You now have what you asked for with the result that America has turned into a land of militarism and is in the hands of only the ruthless, greedy minority of international cartel bankers while every civil liberty that belongs to this land has vanished and we have become a police State with only one more step to take and that is the jails and the concentration camps. When Henry Wallace broke with the Democratic Party, and those who believed in America's rightful heritage went with him, we did so because of the Truman doctrine which started the most disgraceful epic in American history. In the last 2 years the only voices which have been raised against the disgraceful foreign policy of this country and the persecution by the Justice Department of perfectly innocent people and the destruction of all civil liberties without any regard for the Constitution and the bill of rights have been the voices of Henry Wallace and of courageous progressives whether in business, agriculture, labor, or the churches. If we did not have the new party, I and millions of others would vote Republican before we would think of voting for Harry Truman who has in every way exceeded the Thomas committee in his Executive order on loyalty checks on Government employees.

Justice William O. Douglas is a splendid man and he is badly needed today in the Supreme Court when even that body of august men seem to have forgotten the difference between antifascism and fascism. In addition he is too good a man to put in such a position when the international imperialists and the same party bosses who were always the greatest scandal even during the New Deal are in complete control of the party in league with many of the Republicans.

If Thomas Jefferson could stand up to being called a Jacobean and a traitor because of his understanding of the French Revolution then I think that we can stand being called subversives or agents of a foreign power for the sake of this great country and for the people of this country who are being so badly abused because of the lack of courage anywhere among the so-called liberals of America. But we, of the New Party, are in the fight to stay and it is a fight which goes far beyond the shores of America. Those of us who do have a vision of what is happening over the entire universe must carry those who have none during these critical times. It is not comfortable, nor secure, nor peaceful to live in these times, but if we wish to survive, we must fight for peace and the brotherhood of man.

NINA C. DEXTER.

The Third Party

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BRIEN McMAHON

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an interesting article entitled "Truman Following F. D. R.'s Policies; Third Party Hit," written by Alfred Baker Lewis, a member of the American Federation of Teachers.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TRUMAN FOLLOWING FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT'S POLICIES—THIRD PARTY HIT—ON ALL ISSUES PRESIDENT HAS SERVED INTERESTS OF WORKERS—COMMUNISTS BACK THIRD PARTY

(By Alfred Baker Lewis, member of Local 189, American Federation of Teachers)

The assertion by the high command of the Communist Party that they were responsible for launching the third-party movement, headed by Mr. Wallace, is no surprise to those who have been following political events closely. Evidently the Communists believe that the third party and Mr. Wallace are so firmly under their control, and that the innocents still following Mr. Wallace, despite the docility and obedience with which he takes orders from the Communists, are so very innocent that their bold assertion of their responsibility for the third-party movement will do their candidate no harm.

Even if the Communist leaders had not boastfully proclaimed their responsibility for playing the tune to which the third party dances, we would know that Mr. Wallace and his third party are the creation of the Communists. Michael Quill, the head of the Transport Workers Union, who was elected head of the New York City CIO Council by Communist votes, because they thought he was safely in their camp, has had the courage to break with them.

REVEALS MACHINATIONS

He has revealed that the Communists decided on a third-party movement, and then called in their fellow travelers and stooges in the labor movement, and gave them orders to support the third party and Mr. Wallace.

Brother Quill, to his credit, put his loyalty to the CIO, which, like the AFL, has denounced the third-party movement, above his friendship for the Communists. Accordingly, he broke with them over this issue and revealed the way in which they attempted to bully their fellow travelers and dupes in the ranks of organized labor into following their line.

The fact is that President Truman has acted in every respect to serve the interests of the workers. He vetoed the Taft-Hartley bill, and the Case bill before that, in a vigorous effort to save for organized labor the rights which it has won under the Wagner Labor Relations Act.

In an attempt to protect the buying power of workers' wages he has urged Congress to give the Government power to curb inflation by allocating scarce raw materials and by imposing price controls if that should be necessary.

He tried by a veto to prevent the Republicans from passing a tax-reduction bill which greatly favors the rich and is bound to cause further inflation and he urged Congress to adopt an excess-profits-tax law to tap for the Government the gigantic increase in profits which is currently pouring into the coffers of our great corporations.

He has urged an extension of the Social Security System to take in people who are not now covered, to provide for cash benefits and medical hospital and surgical care for those who cannot work because they are sick, and to increase the amount of benefits in keeping with the increased cost of living.

But the Republicans have refused to move; on the contrary they passed a law to take about one-half million workers, mostly salesmen, out of the list of social-security beneficiaries.

Truman has recommended legislation to provide more cheap electric light and power by the extension of the Tennessee Valley Authority system of publicly owned power plants to other river valleys. He has urged greater protection of our civil rights by a Federal fair-employment-practice law, by abolition of poll taxes as a requirement for voting in Federal elections, and by an antilynching law, measures which are favored by both AFL and CIO.

BLOCK TRUMAN PLAN

But again the Republicans have blocked every attempt to enact into law a single one of Truman's recommendations for greater protection of civil rights. Truman has urged legislation for Federal aid to housing.

The Senate, at least, passed such a law, but the Republicans in the House of Representatives have buried it because they are more interested in more profits for landlords than in more housing for veterans. He has urged raising the legal minimum wage, but again the Republican majority in Congress has blocked adoption of this reasonable proposal.

While he has urged opposition to communism by making our American democracy more real and genuine, he has wisely opposed the Mundt bill which would tend to drive the Communists underground, because some of its provisions are dangerous to organized labor and a threat to the civil liberties of all of us.

In every respect Truman has carried on the Roosevelt policies in domestic affairs, except that he could only recommend because he has had a reactionary majority in Congress against him.

In foreign affairs, too, Truman has carried on Roosevelt's program. When the Nazis attacked Russia, Roosevelt provided lend-lease aid to the Russians to help them resist aggression without asking whether Russia's Government was democratic or not.

Similarly, when Greece was attacked by Communists and when Turkey was threatened by the Russian Communist Government which demanded part of her territory, Truman urged aid to these countries even though their governments are not as democratic as we would wish. For aggression is aggression whoever are its victims, as Roosevelt knew, and in order to stop war we have to stop aggression.

PRESIDENT BACKS ERP

Similarly Truman has urged and has persuaded Congress to adopt the European recovery plan to provide economic aid for the democratic countries of western Europe. By strengthening their economy and making it possible for them to provide a higher standard of living for their workers, the ERP, first outlined by Secretary of State Marshall, will make it possible for these democratic nations to halt the growth of communism among their own citizens. This is so because communism thrives on the misery of the masses and tends to die down when that misery is relieved.

But the very fact that the Marshall plan for European recovery will help those nations where political democracy still exists, and the further fact that our aid to Greece and Turkey has strengthened those countries which were marked by the Russian imperialists as their victims, has made Stalin and the Communist dictators of Russia's satellite states very angry. They have opposed and are opposing the ERP with all their might. They are similarly opposing all who advocate and support that plan, especially Truman.

That is why Wallace, and the Communists who are backing him and his third party, are attacking Truman. It is not because Truman has failed to support the interests of the workers and of the ordinary citizens of this country on every domestic issue, for he has.

It is not because he has trampled on our civil rights, for he has recommended greater protection of them. It is simply and solely because Truman opposes Russia's policy of expanding her control over more and more unwilling nations, and the Communists always faithfully support Russia's policy whatever it is, and denounce and oppose all who oppose Russia. They have now gotten Wallace to do the same thing for them.

The Poll-Tax Filibuster

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLAUDE PEPPER
OF FLORIDA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to incorporate in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "The Poll-Tax Filibuster," from the New York Times of July 31, 1948.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE POLL-TAX FILIBUSTER

The abolition of the poll tax in seven Southern States cannot be regarded as an emergency. Even the President's Committee on Civil Rights, reporting last year, did not so treat it. The committee recommended prompt State action, failing which it believed that the Nation, either by act of Congress or by constitutional amendment, should remove this final barrier to universal suffrage. Certainly this meant a year or two of grace. But circumstances have brought the matter to a head at this special session. President Truman at Philadelphia openly challenged the Republicans to enact their civil-rights plank, even if they had to beat down a filibuster to do it. Now they have the filibuster. The House has four times passed this measure. The Senate would pass it if it could be brought to a vote. A minority of Senators, not all of them from poll-tax States, is willing to hold up the Nation's business and prevent legislation of a really emergency character in order to prevent a vote.

This situation presents two issues. One of them is majority rule. Is the Senate maintaining its own dignity and meeting its own responsibility when, under the guise of freedom of debate, it permits a legislative question to be decided by one-fourth or less of its membership? The other issue is the poll tax itself. It has been plausibly argued that Congress has no power to legislate in this field without a constitutional amendment. We cannot be sure on this point until an anti-poll-tax bill has been passed and appealed to the Supreme Court. Obviously the filibustering Senators do not believe the Court would annul the law, or they would not be so desperately trying to prevent its passage.

Whatever the constitutional argument, the practical argument for abolishing the poll tax and other limitations on universal suffrage is that Federal officials elected in communities where universal suffrage is denied make or administer laws for all of us. It is of concern to a citizen of New York or Vermont that these officials be democratically chosen. The poll-tax Senators who are now trying to throw a monkey wrench into the machinery of the special session are an excellent illustration of how grave that concern can be. The Republican majority in the Senate has the power to kill this filibuster. It will be untrue to its own principles if it does not do it.

Tribute to Josephus Daniels by L. P. McLendon

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLAUDE PEPPER
OF FLORIDA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to incorporate in the Appendix of the RECORD a very able and deserved tribute by Mr. L. P. McLendon to a great American who recently passed on, the Honorable Josephus Daniels, of North Carolina.

There being no objection, the tribute was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JOSEPHUS DANIELS, "THE OLD RELIABLE"
(By L. P. McLendon)

Mr. Chairman, fellow Democrats, ladies, and gentlemen, the Democrats of North Carolina have a superlative pride in joining with this gathering of members of our party in honoring here today four great Americans. That sentiment is shared by practically all of the people of my State regardless of their political affiliations. North Carolina gave a majority of its votes three times for William Jennings Bryan for President, twice for Woodrow Wilson, and four times for Franklin D. Roosevelt. The people of North Carolina admired Bryan and recognized in him a new leadership in a new political era. They loved Woodrow Wilson, not merely because he lived during a part of his youth in North Carolina, but because they loved his idealism and his nobleness of purpose. They first accepted Roosevelt and then adopted him as their very own because he put into words and into action the very sort of progressive government they had long believed in.

North Carolina's pride in this occasion is heightened by the fact that her own contribution to this quartet of great American Democrats—Josephus Daniels—contributed mightily to the political stature and success of the other three and enjoyed the confidence and genuine friendship of each of them.

Long before 1896 Mr. Daniels was an ardent admirer of Bryan. In 1896 the North Carolina delegates to the National Convention elected Daniels national committeeman and his leadership for the nomination of Bryan and the vote of the North Carolina delegation made Bryan's nomination a certainty. So powerful was Daniels' influence in the nomination of Bryan that William Allen White, prominent Republican newspaperman of that time, referred to Daniels as Bryan's Secretary of War. These men remained fast friends and on two other occasions Daniels worked for Bryan's nomination, and finally they served together as members of Woodrow Wilson's cabinet.

Daniels was among the first leaders of our party to recognize the statesmanship of Woodrow Wilson and to advocate his nomination as the party's standard bearer. He became the publicity manager of the Wilson campaign for the nomination in 1912. The dramatic events of that convention will long be remembered and recounted when ever Democrats assemble. Suffice it to say that Bryan and Daniels were perhaps the two most powerful men in the successful campaign for Wilson's nomination, a fact recognized by Mr. Wilson himself by appointing both men to his cabinet.

When Daniels became Secretary of the Navy in Wilson's Cabinet, Franklin D. Roosevelt, 20 years Daniels' junior, became the Assistant Secretary of the Navy. Then and there was begun another political and personal friendship which was to affect the fortunes of our party. The depth and sincerity of their friendship is attested by the fact that Roosevelt continuously thereafter addressed Daniels as "boss" and commissioned him as ambassador to our neighboring Republic of Mexico. We North Carolinians suspect, at least, that the apprenticeship of Roosevelt under the older and experienced political leader and keen observer, Daniels, was a real factor in the younger man's remarkably unique political career.

And so it may be truly said that Daniels was the one American who bound together this peerless quartet of leaders of our party. The contribution of these four men to the cause of good Government, to the success of the Democratic Party and to the service of the American people will always be an inspiration, not only to the people of America, but as well to the freedom-loving peoples of the world.

Americans who sincerely believe in good government and who want to advance the prosperity of our people and peace on earth may profitably study the life of Josephus Daniels.

Daniels believed with all his heart in a program of progress for the Democratic Party. He disliked the Republican Party, not because that party cannot be liberal and progressive, but because it never has been either liberal or progressive. He was a Democrat because he knew that the Democratic Party was closer to the masses of our people and he knew the aspirations and hopes of the American people have always been for a government administered in their interests. He was therefore a fighter within the party for progressive, forward-looking platforms and leaders. Let me take this occasion to remind you that it was the progressive and liberal leaders of the South who literally compelled the nomination of progressive standard bearers like Bryan, Wilson, and Roosevelt. If and when the South becomes reactionary it will be in the face of the indisputable history of the Democratic Party that it has been successful only when it has given to the voters of America a united front under progressive and liberal leaders. Daniels realized that truth and asserted it over and over. He therefore took his stand with the advance guard. He relished the idea of being the first to contact the enemy. He did not believe in defensive political battles. He did believe that the Democratic Party with a political offensive could always win in a battle of ballots.

This basic political philosophy of Daniels made him a powerful influence in the political life of North Carolina and of our Nation. He had no patience with littleness and meanness within the party. He was a vigorous and tireless worker for his conception of the best policies and the best leadership for the Democratic Party. He did not always win. When he lost he remained loyal to the party. Believing in the American party system he knew, that to be successful, a political party must keep its organization intact in times of defeat as well as in times of success. For instance, he vigorously opposed the nomination of Gov. Al Smith, but when Smith was nominated he rose in the convention at Houston to make the nomination unanimous. Although North Carolina, in that election, gave the Republican ticket a majority, Daniels fought to the last for the Democratic ticket and every county in the circulation area of his newspaper gave a majority to the Democratic ticket. It was Daniels and many others like him who kept the party together in 1928 and made it possible to present and elect Roosevelt 4 years later.

This same philosophy made Daniels an advocate of the primary election system for the nomination of candidates of our party. He maintained that in primary elections there would always be a disclosure to the people of the character and records of the candidates, and above all an opportunity for the development of real leaders who do not fear to criticize the conduct of public office even by men of the same party. The result, he maintained, is bound to be better administration of public affairs and the choice of leaders in whom the rank and file have confidence and faith.

Daniels' political philosophy was both sound and practical. It can be said without fear of contradiction that his repeated statement of this philosophy in the columns of his newspaper and consistently through numerous political campaigns in North Carolina has been an important factor in keeping the Democratic Party in office continuously for a half century. President Roosevelt once complimented North Carolina by saying that it was "the best balanced State in the American Union." We North Carolinians are too modest to assert that such is the fact. But we can, with justifiable pride, say that no State in the Union can boast a better, cleaner, or sounder government for the past 50 years. Those of you who knew Mr. Daniels only as a national political figure will appreciate him all the more when you understand that among his home folk he was also a fighter, always for the integrity of the Democratic Party and for honest and progressive government.

Roosevelt and Daniels, more than any two men prominent in national political affairs in my lifetime, it seems to me, had a conviction that the continued success of our American form of democratic government demands that the Government must always keep abreast of the need of the people and always ahead of their demands. I do not believe I misinterpret the belief of either of these men by saying that when democratic government lags too far behind the needs of its people, sooner or later they will rise up in angry demand for reform and create the atmosphere in which communism and other antidemocratic philosophies thrive. In this critical hour there is no evidence that the Republican Party has any intention or disposition to recognize the unanswerable logic of Franklin Roosevelt and Josephus Daniels.

In these days filled with complex and difficult international problems it is well to recall that these four men were all sincere believers in the destiny of America as a peacemaker in world affairs. The fact that Bryan's approach to this all-important problem was different from that of Wilson, Roosevelt, and Daniels does not detract from his sincerity or his devotion to the cause of world peace. Throughout the centuries to come Woodrow Wilson's name will stand high on the list of world citizens who blazed the way for the establishment of a system of law for the preservation of the peace of the world. The seed planted by him will some day surely bring forth the fruits of peace. Daniels' administration of the Navy in the First World War will likewise take high rank in history as a demonstration of the efficiency of a democracy in time of trial.

Roosevelt, like Wilson, was not only an American but a world citizen. A man of lesser stature would never have possessed the imagination and vision to bring about the greatest scientific discovery in the history of man—the discovery of atomic energy. We can only speculate as to what he would have accomplished if he had been spared to wrestle with the problems of the postwar world. This much we do know—that he conducted World War II with amazing skill and laid the foundation upon which our Nation now stands as the most powerful nation on earth with the power and the will to promote and preserve the freedom of nations and peoples throughout the world. Daniels as Ambassador to Mexico demonstrated his ability as an Ambassador of good will. Under his guidance, the relations between the United States and Mexico have become more friendly and mutually satisfactory than ever before.

Many people in North Carolina came to refer to Mr. Daniels' newspaper as "The Old Reliable." The term is descriptive of Daniels himself. For almost three quarters of a century Daniels stood in the councils of our party as "the old reliable." There he was, always present, always a fighter for progressive party action, always against the standpatters, always advocating liberal leadership and policies and always a democrat in the finest sense of the term—there he stood—"the old reliable." North Carolina is proud of his courageous leadership and his contribution to the building of a stronger and more dynamic Democratic Party. Our State is proud of his record as a public servant. North Carolina, proud of her distinguished son, is also proud of the recognition this great gathering has accorded his memory today. Sixteen years ago Josephus Daniels originated and organized the first meeting of this kind in honor of William Jennings Bryan. If we could send him a message today it would be—"A great gathering of representatives of the Democratic Party have today added your name to a list of the party's immortals."

A young Confederate lieutenant stood at the feet of his fallen hero, the great soldier and master strategist Stonewall Jackson, and saluting his dead commander, said: "Sir, when you join the spirits of Hannibal, Caesar, and Napoleon tell them we still make war." We North Carolinians would send another message to Josephus Daniels: "When you meet with the spirits of Bryan, Wilson, and Roosevelt tell them that we still make war on the Republican Party and for the preservation of a free America and the liberty of our people."

Mending the Breach

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH R. BRYSON
OF SOUTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an article I prepared and which appeared in the Christian Century under date of June 30, 1948, entitled "Mending the Breach":

MENDING THE BREACH

(By JOSEPH R. BRYSON)

In February 1947 the United States Supreme Court ruled, by a bare majority, that public school funds, raised by taxation, may be applied to pay for transportation of children to a parochial school in New Jersey. This decision is clearly in direct contradiction to the letter and intent of the Constitution, the first amendment to which provides that Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof. In the language of Thomas Jefferson, this amendment is the "wall of separation between church and state." The Supreme Court has made a serious breach in that wall.

Like the "little cloud out of the sea" which Elijah's servant saw arising, the decision in the Everson case portends a terrible storm, the beginning of an assault upon religious freedom in America. To enable America to weather that storm I have introduced in Congress a proposed amendment to the Constitution, which provides "that neither Congress nor any of the several States shall aid any educational institution wholly or in part under sectarian control." This amendment would prohibit Congress or any of the States from furnishing free transportation or free textbooks or other educational supplies, or from otherwise defraying any expenses, for any person attending a sectarian educational institution.

I

Religious liberty is dependent upon strict separation of church and state. If history teaches any lesson, it teaches that religious domination over government leads to cruelties, compulsions, and oppressions. The founders of our republic, viewing the horrors of the Spanish Inquisition, the systematic destruction of the Huguenots and the oppression practiced by various Reformation groups, were determined that free conscience and free worship should prevail in America.

Even in America, for a time, some of the States taxed all their people for the support of the prevailing religious group. But Jefferson sounded the death knell of religious oppression when he wrote the great Virginia statute of religious liberty:

"Almighty God hath created the mind free; that all attempts to influence it by temporal punishments or burthens, or by civil incapacitations, tend only to beget habits of hypocrisy and meanness, and are a departure from the plan of the Holy Author of our religion, who being Lord both of body and mind, yet chose not to propagate it by coercions on either, as was in his almighty power to do; * * * that to compel a man to furnish contributions of money for the propagation of opinions which he disbelieves, is sinful and tyrannical; that even the forcing him to support this or that teacher of his own religious persuasion, is depriving him of the comfortable liberty of giving his contributions to the particular pastor whose morals he would make his pattern."

And the time-honored Virginia statute provided:

"That no man shall be compelled to frequent or support any religious worship, place, or ministry whatsoever, nor shall be enforced, restrained, molested, or burthened, in his body or goods, nor shall otherwise suffer on account of his religious opinions or belief."

Throughout most of its history, the Supreme Court has given strict interpretation to the first amendment in maintaining religious freedom. In the Pierce case, in 1925, the Court ruled that a compulsory education law is complied with when parents send a child to a private or sectarian school. This is in accord with the fundamental principle of religious freedom. But the point at which this principle is vulnerable, and critically so, is taxation for the support of religious schools. In the free textbook and free transportation cases, the guarantee of the first amendment has received deadly blows.

The first blow was struck in the Louisiana schoolbook case in 1929, when an act of the State of Louisiana provided that public funds should be used to furnish schoolbooks for the school children of that State, including children attending private and sectarian schools. As in the recent Everson case, the Supreme Court upheld the Louisiana act on the public-purpose ground. The Pierce decision upheld the right of a person to send his child to a private or sectarian school, yet the Louisiana decision made tax assistance to such a school a public purpose—a completely illogical state of affairs.

The second blow against religious freedom was struck in the Everson case. Speaking for the majority of the Court, Justice Black stated that school-bus money could not be called a Government aid to religion on the grounds that it is paid to parents or children and serves the public good. In a strongly worded dissent, however, Justice Rutledge asked, "Does New Jersey's action furnish support for religion by use of the taxing power?" The purpose of paying bus fares, he declared, is to transport Catholic children to a place where they receive primarily religious teaching and guidance. The use of tax money is therefore for a religious purpose and in violation of the traditional American concept of separation of church and state.

There can be no question that aiding the Roman Catholic parochial schools is equivalent to aiding the Roman Catholic Church. Justice Jackson made this point clear when he observed in his dissent in the Everson case: "I should be surprised if any Catholic would deny that the parochial school is a vital, if not the most vital, part of the Roman Catholic Church. * * * Its growth and cohesion, discipline, and loyalty, spring from its schools. Catholic education is the rock on which the whole structure rests, and to render tax aid to its church school is indistinguishable from rendering the same aid to the church itself. * * * The State cannot maintain a church and it can no more tax its citizens to furnish free carriage to those who attend a church. The prohibition against establishment of religion cannot be circumvented by a subsidy, bonus, or reimbursement of expense to individuals for receiving religious instruction and indoctrination."

Commenting on the fact that 16 of the 48 States now provide for transportation assistance to parochial schools, the St. Louis Post-Dispatch said editorially: "The astonishing thing is that after so many years of sturdy and jealously guarded independence, religion is now considered so feeble as to need Government help."

II

It is significant that 3 days after the Supreme Court decision in the New Jersey case, a bill was introduced in the Maryland Legislature to provide free bus transportation for children attending parochial schools in Prince Georges County. Corresponding proposals were placed before the Texas and Indiana Legislatures.

In Idaho, a similar issue was raised when the State legislature passed a new school transportation act. An attempt was made to amend the act to remove the word "public" from before the word "school," in order to leave the way open for parochial schools to benefit. The wording was not changed, because the author of the amendment said he had been assured by the State superintendent of public instruction that "public school" would not be interpreted to work to the disadvantage of parochial schools. In other words, the present arrangement, under which the leading cities of Idaho permit public-school busses to transport church-school students, will not be changed.

More encouraging was the action of the people of Wisconsin, who voted down by a majority of more than 100,000 a proposed amendment to the State constitution which would have provided transportation of children to parochial and private schools as well as to public schools.

The Supreme Court of Iowa last year upheld a district court ruling that children attending private or parochial schools cannot be carried in public-school busses. In his opinion District Judge Harry Narey stated: "All children in the district have a right to attend public school at any time * * *. Should the parent prefer to have the child taught in an accredited private or parochial school he may exercise this option, but in so doing the child becomes a private pupil in a private school whose attendance must be paid for at private expense, at least so long as the public school is maintained and affords substantially the same or equivalent education."

Similarly, the courts of the State of Washington have twice ruled against the free transportation of parochial school pupils. The first case involved a challenge to the 1941 act of the State legislature which granted such transportation. Judge John M. Wilson ruled that the act violated the State constitution, which expressly forbids the appropriation of money or property for "any religious worship, exercise or institution, or the support of any religious establishment." In his decision Judge Wilson cited the Oklahoma Supreme Court decision in the case of Gurney v. Ferguson, which held that use of public money for transportation of parochial school children is "an expenditure in the furtherance of the maintenance of the school as an organization."

The Supreme Court of Washington upheld Judge Wilson's decision, but in 1945 new legislation was passed and under its provisions a new test case was brought against the Nooksack Valley school district, seeking to compel it to provide free bus service for children attending the Christian Reform School in that vicinity. It was held, however, that the new legislation did not overrule the 1943 State supreme court decision that such transportation is not legal.

In Chester County, Pa., Judge Ernest Harvey ruled that the Kennett Consolidated School could not be forced to provide free transportation for a pupil of St. Patrick's Parochial School in Kennett Square. It was contended in the case in question that the compulsory school attendance law made it mandatory for the State to provide free transportation, but Judge Harvey ruled: "The legislature intended the absence of free transportation to excuse only a child who would otherwise attend a public school in session."

III

In view of the many cases that have come up, and the many more that will undoubtedly come up in the future, there is a clear need for explicit legislation which will resolve the entire issue of aid—in any form—to sectarian institutions. The purpose of my proposed amendment (H. J. Res. 187) is to clarify and extend the first amendment of the Constitution, making it unlawful for Congress or any of the States to permit the furnishing of free textbooks or free transportation to persons attending sectarian schools. The prompt adoption of this proposed amendment is urgently necessary in order to repair the damage already done and to prevent any new assault upon fundamental religious liberties. Unless this or similar legislation is adopted, we may expect abuses to increase in magnitude and to bring serious consequences in our efforts to maintain religious freedom.

It is difficult to reconcile the Supreme Court's decision in the Everson case with its subsequent decision in the McCollum case, in which it ruled out released time for religious instruction in public schools. In the Everson case, expenditure of public funds for sectarian education was involved, while in the McCollum case there was no question of the use of public funds. Here is a paradox. The wall between religion and the state is thus made higher and more impregnable than the wall between the Roman Catholic Church and the state.

Whatever benefits Protestant Christianity expects to derive from attempting to promulgate its faith on public-school time and with public-school facilities are offset by the fact that it is thus widening the breach in the wall that separates church from state. A wall with a breach is not a wall at all; it is a thoroughfare of infiltration. The smallest breach which Protestants make in that wall works chiefly to the advantage of the Roman Catholic Church in its efforts to draw on the Public Treasury. Protestants must be content to ignore the potentialities of the public schools as an avenue of religious instruction, for they cannot do otherwise without compromising their own position in the matter of public-school funds for transportation of parochial-school pupils. The more Protestants agitate against the Supreme Court decision in the McCollum case, the more hollow become their protests against Catholic encroachment in the Everson case.

We must accept Justice Frankfurter's dictum that "separation means separation, not something else." Certainly we cannot give the slightest credence to the charge that the decision in the McCollum case is a triumph for atheism. On the contrary, it is a victory for freedom of thought and freedom of conscience—two principles which lie at the very base of all religious freedoms. We must not allow our religious fervor to blind us to the essential fact that no religious faith is secure when it meshes its authority with that of the state. Separation is not relative. It is absolute, or it is nonexistent. Protestants have more reason to cheer than to fear the Supreme Court decision in the McCollum case.

Protestant energy must be directed, not at fighting for "released time" in its many varieties, but at restoring the principle of absolute separation of church and state where that principle has been weakened or shattered. Let us give our children religious instruction in the home and in the church, without demanding public favors, and let us insist that the Roman Catholic Church, or any church, be required to do the same.

Our public-school system is the bulwark of democracy. In the public schools our children are given an education that teaches them not only how to earn a living but also how to live in accord with those social principles and ideals upon which our Republic was founded. The teaching of religion is left to the will of the parent. The place for religious instruction is in the church and at the family altar, not in the public schools. The Catholic schools, on the other hand, are maintained solely to advance a particular religious faith—a faith which teaches that both the family and the state must bow to the sovereignty of the Roman Catholic Church.

In this connection, I hear again the ringing words of Dr. Charles Clayton Morrison, contributing editor of the Christian Century: "In this open forum of religious liberty, I say, let every church stand upon its own feet. Let it flourish or perish in the spiritual and moral competition provided by our Constitution in this broad domain of freedom. Let every church support itself by its own resources through the voluntary gifts of its members. * * * But let it keep its hands out of the Public Treasury."

In the wall of separation between church and state, a serious breach has appeared. Those who believe in religious freedom must adopt the watch cry of Nehemiah: "Let us build up the wall."

United States Information Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by the Honorable George V. Allen, Assistant Secretary of State for Public Affairs, at the Mount Holyoke College Institute on the United Nations, South Hadley, Mass., Tuesday, June 29, 1948:

UNITED STATES INFORMATION PROGRAM

I believe it would be useful, at the outset, to point out what is to be included in the subject for our discussion tonight, and what is excluded. We are concerned this evening with the efforts of the United States Government, acting through the Department of State, to send information abroad regarding the policies of the American Government and the way of life, the political principles, and the aspirations of the American people.

The Department does this through such methods of disseminating information as are available, notably through public speeches, newspapers, magazines, books, films, and the radio. These are referred to in the trade as "mass media of information."

The Department of State also has a responsibility for informing the American public of the foreign policy aims of the United States Government, but activity in this field is a domestic operation. Since you are concerned at this meeting with foreign affairs, I shall limit my discussion to the foreign information field.

We are frequently asked in the Department to state the aims of our foreign information program. The answer, I believe, is not difficult to formulate. Our information program is nothing more, nor less, than an instrument—one of the instruments—in achieving the foreign policy of the United States. That policy has today one paramount aim, the preservation of democracy as we understand and have always used the term. We seek the preservation of democracy in the United States and assist the free peoples of the world in preserving their liberties. We hope that in due course other peoples who have lost their liberties will be able to regain them.

The information program is but one of the implements we employ in our efforts to achieve our great foreign-policy objective. I would by no means claim that it is our most important implement. Our financial and economic efforts to assist in the economic recovery of Europe are perhaps our outstanding implementation of foreign policy today. What we are remains more important than what we say we are. Doing is more important than saying, or promising, or boasting. Indeed, so true is this doctrine that we waste our energy, our manpower, and our resources if we say anything at all in our information program except what we are, or what we do, or what we genuinely expect or hope to do.

I have frequently tried to assess why it was that Nazi Germany, the country which devoted more time and effort and money than any other nation to the work of information, or propaganda if you wish, had so little propaganda success. Herr Goebbels, the outstanding protagonist of the propaganda technique, succeeded, during the recent war, in achieving perhaps the greatest single success, as far as gaining a large listener audience is conceived, when he put Lord Haw Haw on radio Berlin. Many of you will recall the eagerness with which Americans tuned their shortwave dials during the war, trying to hear what Haw Haw had to say. During the worst days of the bombing of Britain residents of London still tuned their dials to listen to him. There is no doubt that Goebbels succeeded in getting a great and eager listening audience. The Japanese achieved the same sort of success in the Pacific with a girl called Tokyo Rose. Our soldiers sat in foxholes in Guadalcanal and Guam, scanning their watches to be certain to hear her daily transmissions. If the task of a propagandist is to get listeners, the Nazis and Japanese scored tremendous successes.

But no one has produced any evidence that Haw Haw made the British military or civilian population fight one whit less hard through 6 years of war. Nor did the blandishments of Tokyo Rose have any harmful effect on the fighting spirit of our marines at Tinian. Quite the contrary. The German and Japanese propagandists only succeeded in increasing our determination. Their money and effort were worse than thrown away.

Why did they not succeed? I have asked myself this question often during the past 3 months, since I began considering this subject. The answer, I believe, is relatively simple. The Japanese and Nazis failed because they did not tell the truth. They told a few truths, yes, regarding bombing targets and raid objectives—enough to give a similarity of truth and to attract listeners, but the basic underlying theme of their broadcasts was not truth, and our listeners marked it down as easily recognizable propaganda.

Americans have always felt, rather instinctively, that the best way to conduct an information program is to tell the truth, and only the truth; but I had not realized until going into the question, just why this is so. I am fully convinced that if our information program is not based on truth, we had better close down all our broadcasts and call home all our press attachés from our embassies abroad.

The primary advantage we have over the propaganda efforts of totalitarian states today is the fact that we Americans are not obliged to present ourselves to the world as models of perfection. The United States has so many virtues to overcome its shortcomings that we need not fear the effect of our being truly known abroad.

Totalitarian propagandists must picture their country as a paradise on earth, where everything is perfect, and must proclaim that everything in democratic countries is wicked and debased.

In our information activity, we must present our civilization in its true color if we are to be effective. That color is gray—not lily white. We have the enormous advantage in our information program that we are willing to admit our imperfections and to tell the truth as nearly as we can ascertain it.

If, however, those in the State Department and elsewhere who are in charge of our information work should ever become subject to the daily fear that they might say something objectionable to some official, or suppress unpleasant facts for fear of losing their jobs, the result would eventually be that we would water down our scripts until American broadcasts would become merely the counterparts of that of the totalitarian propaganda. American would be presented to the world as the home only of sweetness and light and the world would be no more convinced by our broadcasts than they are by totalitarian efforts.

I do not pretend that the truth is any easier to ascertain today than it was in the days of jesting Pilate. But we must be motivated always by the effort to find it out, and to state it clearly and boldly as nearly as we can.

As many of you may know, the formalized effort of governments to influence people outside their borders through organized information or propaganda programs is a relatively recent development. The first scheduled short-wave broadcasts in a foreign language by any government, for example, was inaugurated by the Nazis in 1936, I believe, when Herr Goebbels put on a Russian-language program beamed to the U. S. S. R. (Private American broadcasters began broadcasting in Spanish to Latin America as early as 1929, but entirely as a commercial venture without Government sponsorship.)

The British Broadcasting System inaugurated its foreign-language broadcasts in 1938, as I recall, using at first German, Russian, and French. Radio Moscow began to speak in German, French, English, and other languages about the same time.

The American Government's entry into the foreign information field came in 1942, as a result of the war. Two independent agencies of the Government in Washington were given the responsibility for this program. These were the Office of Inter-American Affairs under Mr. Nelson Rockefeller, for Latin America, and the Office of War Information, under Mr. Elmer Davis, for the remainder of the world.

At the close of the war, in the fall of 1945, these two agencies were transferred to the Department of State, and that Department found itself charged, for the first time, with responsibility for our foreign information program. The primary job at the start was a liquidating operation. My predecessor, Mr. William Benton, had the task, for example, of reducing the 13,000 employees in OWI by 90 percent.

There was considerable doubt in the minds of Congress, private information media officials, and others concerning the propriety of the United States Government's continuing in the information field during peacetime. Most people hoped that since Nazi Germany, the government which had perverted information to propaganda purposes, had been defeated, the victorious Allies would continue to associate harmoniously in peace as they had in war, through the newly formed United Nations. It was hoped that misunderstandings and misrepresentations of motives among nations would be reduced to a point where no official information program by the United States would be required. Publishers of American newspapers, magazines, and books, and officials of American radio networks and motion picture studios felt they could do a better job than the Government in telling the American story abroad.

Debate on the subject was at its height in the summer of 1947, when many Members of the United States Congress visited Europe and the Near East. They were amazed at the extent of misunderstanding and willful misrepresentation of the United States which they found abroad. They returned to enact legislation, known as the Smith-Mundt Act, signed January 27, 1948, providing for an official foreign information program as an integral part of the conduct of our foreign relations.

It is under this act that we now operate. Our information work is conducted primarily through three divisions, handling radio, press, and motion pictures. We also disseminate information abroad through 50 United States Government libraries. These libraries are considered primarily as educational institutions and are administered under our separate educational program, but the American newspapers and periodicals displayed on our library tables abroad are predominantly informational in character. (There is considerable question whether educational and informational work can be sharply delineated.

Someone has characterized our entire information program as "adult education.")

The most conspicuous of our official information activities, as far as the American public is concerned, has always been the short-wave radio programs beamed abroad, known as the Voice of America.

Much has been heard recently of the congressional investigations of the Voice of America. I do not propose to dwell on this subject tonight, except to say that I regard the investigations as having served as a highly salutary purpose. They have clarified the atmosphere and have brought to light misunderstandings regarding responsibility and laxness in supervision which ought not to have been allowed to continue. I may add that I have often thought, during these recent congressional hearings, of the opinion expressed, I believe, by Lord Bryce in his monumental study of the American commonwealth, that the single most important contribution made by the American Government to political science has been the congressional investigation. This thought has sustained me through many days of such investigations during the past three weeks.

I wish to refer at this time, however, to another voice, which I would like to call the Voice of Democracy. I do not have in mind any radio program, either domestic or foreign. I refer to the Voice, or the synthesis of the voices, of all mankind throughout the world, who believe in the principles of individual freedom and human liberty.

This Voice should find its principal outlet in the various organs and independent agencies of the United Nations. The American people regard the United Nations as having been founded on the principles of democracy as we understand the term. Woven through the warp and woof of UN and all of its constituent parts, notably in the charter of UNESCO, is the concept that the human mind and spirit should be free from the chains of repressive government.

Perhaps the most frequently discussed of the many human rights and aspirations, is the freedom of speech. (And now we have added to that, in the United States, not only the right to speak, but also the right to speak loudly, since the Supreme Court upheld the right, in principle, of a religious group to use mechanical loud speakers in the propagation of its faith.)

A companion piece to the right of man to speak freely is the equal right of an individual to listen, in this modern age of radio communication. To this we must also list, as David Sarnoff has pointed out, the freedom to look, in these growing days of television.

Membership in the United Nations carries with it an obligation on the part of every member government to permit its citizens the full right to speak and the right to read and to listen and to look at news and ideas depicted in the press, radio, and all other information media without regard to national boundaries. Only in this way can the voice of the world's people, the voice of democracy, be created.

The Secretariat of the United Nations has conceived an excellent plan for a greatly increased information program, to disseminate knowledge of the activities of UN through press, radio, and pictures. This is an excellent project, and the facilities of the American Government, especially in the field of short-wave radio broadcasting, will be made available to UN to the maximum feasible extent, to assist in this most desirable project. But the official voice of the United Nations is not what I have in mind. The voice of democracy today is the combined expression of every newspaper and every radio program, every public speaker and private discussion group, in the United States and in every other nation in the world where man is free to make his opinions heard. Anyone at Lake Success who speaks on behalf of genuine democracy is a part of that voice.

The struggle in the world today, as President Truman has recently indicated, is not a struggle between two powerful nations. It is a struggle between two concepts or ideas. I do not hesitate to place it on the level of a struggle between good and evil, the good represented by human liberty and the evil by the totalitarian police state.

My experience in Iran during the past 2 years has caused me to visualize this conflict more clearly than I had before. Some of my Iranian friends who did not understand the nature of the conflict were quite frank in saying to me, "Why must Iran, a relatively small and weak country, continue to be involved, against its will, in great-power struggles? Why can't we be left alone, to live our own lives without disturbing or being disturbed by anyone? As for the quarrel between the United States and U. S. S. R., a plague on both your houses."

If the contest in the world today were merely another contest between two opposing imperialisms, one could sympathize fully with this attitude. But it is not such a struggle. I make that declaration flatly and bluntly, despite certain groups, even in the United States, who regard the present world difficulties in very much the same light as did my Iranian friends to whom I have referred.

In the struggle between the voice of democracy and the voice of totalitarianism, every human being in the world has an equal stake. There are those who promote fascism and communism on both sides of the iron curtain, and those on both sides who are devoted to freedom and liberty. Every individual in the world has a choice to make. Liberty is challenged today on a scale never approached in modern times. This struggle of ideas will not go away and leave Iran alone, nor will it bypass any other nook and cranny of the globe where there are human beings, motivated by human desires and aspirations. There can be no neutrals in such a struggle, whether the contest is within a single village, a Nation, or the world.

The Voice of America is and must remain a part of the voice of democracy. We must strive, in every possible way, to sustain what our experience, and world experience, has shown to be the best system of government and of society yet devised—the system which protects the individual against the repression of his human liberties by the state.

It is wicked for individuals or groups inside the United States or any other democratic country to utilize the freedoms of democracy in order to agitate for a system of government which offers spurious panaceas of equality, but which would immediately eliminate all such freedoms as soon as it came to power. How shallow it is for certain American citizens to visit the Soviet Union and return to this country puffed up with the fact that they were received on a basis of racial or social equality in the U. S. S. R. I saw the same thing happen to tribesmen in the Middle East.

It is true that Uzbeks and Tajiks and Tartars have the same rights in Moscow as the Russians and Ukrainians and Georgians—the equal privilege of voting and speaking exactly as they are told and of going to Siberia if they breathe a word of criticism of the regime. It is true that democracies have not yet achieved all the equalities to which they aspire, but their vision is not clouded by any false belief that the security of the prison or the equality of the animal is the answer.

The United States information program must make these and other facts clear. At the same time, we must guard constantly, in our fight against the Communist brand of totalitarianism, which is most dangerously active at the moment, against the tendency to get in bed with the Fascist type. We must "play it straight down the middle," devoting every ounce of our energies to the preservation of the human personality and the steady advancement toward the achievement of our goals through democratic processes.

Filibusters in the Senate

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER

OF FLORIDA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Filibusters in the Senate," published in the Tampa (Fla.) Tribune.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FILIBUSTERS IN THE SENATE

The United States Senate has a proud tradition of free and democratic debate. But the democratic process is taking an awful beating as southern Senators go blithely along with their filibuster over the proposal to create a permanent Fair Employment Practice Commission.

We have little patience with the filibusterers. By vowing to talk the measure to death, they have employed a device that is the enemy of democratic principles.

But we also haven't any patience with Senator CHAVEZ, of New Mexico, who was guilty of decidedly poor timing in bringing up the bill just now, ahead of legislation that is of greater importance. In addition to tying the Senate's operations in a knot, he has hindered the chances of the bill he was trying to help.

This is not to say that we are opposed to a permanent FEPC. Although we are convinced that the bill now under discussion is impractical and unenforceable, we do concede that a bill which would seek in a conciliatory way to give every American, regardless of race, religion, or national descent, a chance to make a living, would be a good thing. An FEPC based on common understanding of problems, and without drastic compulsions such as possible fines and jail sentences for employers, may be needed. However, legislation affecting vital domestic and international problems is needed more at the moment.

There are two ways out of the present deadlock. One is to break the filibuster by applying cloture, or limitation of debate. This would require a two-thirds favorable vote. The other is for President Truman to exercise leadership in persuading the bill's sponsors to withdraw it until more important matters are settled.

In this critical time, when labor, housing, demobilization, and other domestic problems press for solution and the programs for national security demand action, continuance of a filibuster is utterly ridiculous. Whatever method is employed, the Senate and the administration ought to act instantly.

The Record of Congress and the Issues of the 1948 Campaign

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. MARION T. BENNETT
OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. BENNETT of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, a writer once said: "A campaign is that period of time during which candidates pelt each other for the public good." Indeed, it is a good old American custom and one which has helped make America great. This is one of the few places in the world where we can still elect our own leaders and fire them at stated intervals if they fall down on the job. It has been my job to represent the Sixth Missouri District in one branch of the Congress during the past 6 years. The people have elected me by increasing majorities at three elections, giving me majorities in each of the 11 counties of the district. As Members of the United States House of Representatives we hold office for only 2 years at a time. That means we must run for reelection every other year. That is tough on the candidate but good for the people. It is a system which keeps Congress close to the needs of the people and aware of the demands of public opinion.

In November 1946, at the last general election, the people of America overwhelmingly voted for a change—a change for the American way of life. The issues in that campaign were summarized by the historic phrase which appeared on billboards across the land, "Had enough? Vote Republican!"

The bill of particulars epitomized by that short statement was a long and sordid story of mismanagement in Washington, D. C. That mismanagement was characterized by confusion, corruption, controls and communism in high places. Sixteen years of New Deal control of Congress had led us from WPA to war, and to a shortage of everything including shortening. Strange to find, after 2 years of peace, there was an increasing scarcity of sugar, meat, automobiles, white shirts, toilet tissue, gasoline, soap, farm machinery, lumber, nylon hosiery, and apparently everything else we thought should be a part of American life, including freedom. In place of the necessities of life, we were given propaganda, black markets, regimentation, bureaucracy, class exploitation, deficit spending, machine politics, labor violence, questionnaires, CIO dictation and political answers to economic questions. Those were the melancholy days of Paul "Porkless" Porter, John "Steakless" Steelman, Chester "Beefless" Bowles, and, yes, "Horsemeat" Harry himself.

Republicans promised to get the Government out of the people's hair and back into the people's hands. Republicans promised lower personal income taxes, a labor law putting labor and management on equal footing before the law, elimination of unnecessary wartime controls, a reduction in Federal spending, a balanced budget and elimination from the public pay rolls of thousands of bureaucrats, especially those with Russian accents or philosophies. Those were the promises. How about the performance?

President Harry Truman, a candidate for reelection on the New Deal Democratic ticket, the Pendergast branch of it, not to be confused with the Dixiecrats of the South or the Moscow branch, headed by Henry Wallace, says, "The Eightieth Congress is the worst Congress in history. It is a do-nothing Congress."

That is a challenge and an issue. Do you approve of the record of the Eightieth Congress, the first Republican Congress in 16 years, or do you want to go back to the days of rubber-stamp Congresses, the kind Mr. Truman would praise—the kind which says "yes" to every proposal for spending, high taxation, extension of bureaucracy, appeasement of Communism at home and abroad, controls on business, labor racketeering, unbalanced budgets, and deficit spending? That is the Truman trail, down which he invites America in 1948.

I want to discuss the record of the Eightieth Congress, what it has done, and what it has refused to do. I will point out why it is necessary to have a Republican President who will cooperate with the Congress, starting in January 1949, in order that the mandate of the people as given in 1946 may be fully carried out. I want to discuss the issue, not only of the Congress, but the collateral issues the President has raised—high prices, labor, and housing—and the issues he would like to forget, Pendergastism, and the failure of his administration to meet the great challenges of our times because of lack of ability, ignorance, cowardice, crookedness, and lust for political office.

MAJOR ACCOMPLISHMENTS OF THE REPUBLICAN MAJORITY IN THE EIGHTIETH CONGRESS

During the short span of its existence, and as of the end of the second session, a total of 9,927 bills and 1,914 resolutions had been introduced in the Eightieth Congress. Of these, 900 had become public laws. The President had vetoed 149 bills. Congress had passed six over his veto, including the Taft-Hartley Labor Act, the income-tax reduction bill, and an increase in old-age pensions and extension of social security to 3,500,000 people not previously covered. It takes two-thirds vote of each branch of Congress, the House and Senate, to override a veto. Republicans do not have that large a majority. Members of the President's own party frequently repudiate his leadership to support the Republican legislative program. Here are the major accomplishments of that program:

First. We freed competitive enterprise. The Republican majority in the Eightieth Congress liberated the people from 76,000 rules, regulations, directives, and orders of the jaw-breaking combinations of alphabetical agencies, thereby releasing the energy and the capacity of the people with resulting all-time highs in employment, production, profits, and wages, and a record $200,000,000,000 annual national income. The President claims credit for this change in conditions and says he should be reelected because of the prosperity he has brought America—while at the same time he says Republicans should be defeated for not returning those controls which had prevented this prosperity until the Republican election victory of 1946.

Second. Congress cut the national debt by $7,000,000,000 to fight inflation.

Third. Congress balanced the Federal budget. The United States Treasury for the first time in 16 years is now using black ink instead of red and is no longer resorting to inflationary deficit spending. We ended the 1948 fiscal year on July 1 with the biggest Treasury surplus in all history—$8,419,469,843, seven times the previous high established 21 years ago. Congress thus stopped deficit financing—fundamental cause of inflation.

Fourth. Congress reduced spendthrift budgets. President Truman's padded budget estimates were cut more than $6,000,000,000 and, in addition, we lopped off more billions in hold-over, wartime appropriations in the greatest, most complex Government financial conversion from war to peace in all time. We are getting away from the false idea that everything must be done by Uncle Sam spending our money; that every problem can be solved by a Washington bureau.

Fifth. Congress cut taxes. The Eightieth Congress reduced taxes $4,800,000,000 despite three Presidential vetoes, with 71 percent of the tax relief going to those with incomes under $5,000. Seven million four hundred thousand small wage earners in the lowest brackets were removed from the tax rolls completely, married couples were allowed to divide their income for tax purposes, and special, additional $600 exemptions were given persons over 65, and the blind.

Sixth. Congress improved labor-management relations, and abolished the portal-to-portal pay racket. We passed over Presidential veto the Taft-Hartley Labor-Management Relations Act providing fair and just procedures for peaceful settlement of labor-management disputes. This act, while in no way decreasing the rights of labor to strike or to bargain collectively, has eliminated many of the causes of strikes and provided a method for settlement of others. The record shows it has worked well. Work stoppages previously averaged 395 per month. They have been cut to an average of 201 under the new law, a reduction of 49 percent. The number of workers involved in new strikes each month from VJ-day until the new labor act was 337,000 per month. The average number of workers so involved since the act is 131,000, a reduction of 61 percent. From VJ-day until the new act, the average number of man-days of idleness caused by work stoppages was 7,213,000 per month. Under the new law this figure has been cut to 2,613,000 per month.

The record shows that under the new law, labor's gains, which have continued, are made more often in peaceful fashion than by costly strikes, and thus labor has benefited from protection against lost wages and production, and so has the public. During 1946, the blackest year in work stoppages, workers lost 116,000,000 man-days while at present the annual rate is running about a fourth as much. On the basis of higher wage rates, the savings to workers is in excess of a billion dollars per year.

Under the new labor act's sound principles, our country is building a rule of reason for cooperation between employers and employees for their mutual benefit and for the good of all our people. The President demands that this law be repealed and that we return to the law of the jungle in our labor-management relations.

Seventh. Congress exposed Communists. The Eightieth Congress has battled for elimination of Fascists, Communists, and other subversives from the Federal Government, exposed Communists' infiltration in a minority of labor unions and in the Hollywood film industry; reversed the appeasement policy toward the Soviets; caused the jailing of Communists for contempt of Congress; landed top Soviet spies in jail and advanced legislation for public registration of alien-controlled Communists. We have made real progress, in spite of the President's opposition, in getting the Government out of the red and the Reds out of our Government.

Eighth. Congress aided European recovery with safeguards for our own economy insofar as such an inflationary, bipartisan program, made necessary by the threat of communism and failures of Administration handling of foreign policy, can be restrained.

Ninth. Congress strengthened national defense. The Eightieth Congress rescued our disintegrating National Military Establishment by unifying the armed services, by increasing appropriations to a total of $20,500,000,000 plus contract authorizations, with special emphasis upon air and sea power, and revised the Army system of justice in an effort to assure completely fair treatment under military law for officers and enlisted men alike. Congress also authorized $178,000,000 for merchant-marine expansion.

Tenth. Congress passed 188 bills meeting needs of war veterans, including increased compensation for disabled veterans with and without dependents; increased compensation for dependent survivors of war dead; increased subsistence payments to World War II veterans in institutional training; increased allowances for student GI's; increased proportional pay for veterans in on-the-job training, and cashing of GI terminal-leave bonds; higher pensions for Spanish-American War veterans and aids for veterans' housing. All this was done in spite of the President, who, in his message to Congress, January 6, 1947, said, "I believe our program of benefits for veterans is now complete."

Eleventh. Congress generated a building boom. The Eightieth Congress took the housing problem from the bungling New Deal administration and freed the building industry of stifling rules, regulations, and directives; stimulated construction through Government guaranties of building loans; had Government assume a large responsibility for veterans' loans; and gave war veterans priority in home building and rental of new homes. In 1946, under New Deal regimentation, subsidies, and confusion, 437,800 dwelling units were completed; in 1947, under Republican free enterprise and sound Government aid, 835,100 units were completed, and in 1948 a million dwelling units will be completed in the biggest building boom of all time. Yet, the President demands Congress go back to policies which failed when tried.

Twelfth. Congress helped farmers. The Eightieth Congress adopted a long-range agriculture program pledging price support for maximum production of food; provided twice as much money for rural electrification as any previous Congress and $100,000,000 more than the President requested; appropriated more than half a billion dollars for soil conservation, launched the greatest rural-road-building program in history; fostered stability of agriculture through a new, workable Crop Insurance Act; chartered the Commodity Credit Corporation and expanded Government aid in campaigns against livestock diseases and crop deterrents such as weeds and pests.

Thirteenth. Congress expanded social security. The Eightieth Congress passed over Presidential veto a bill increasing payments by $5 per month for the needy, aged, and blind and increasing payments by $3 per month for each dependent child. Congress overrode a Supreme Court decision and Presidential veto which would have extended social-security insurance payments to independent contractors over whom no employer exercises direct control. Congress thereby prevented a raid on the old-age and survivors insurance trust fund by those who had not contributed to it. At this point it is proper to remark that the President in the recent special session gave Congress a long list of social-welfare proposals he wanted enacted, some of a desirable character, and I hope to see the time when we can afford them. It will take many months to consider them thoroughly and they deserve the objective consideration they cannot possibly receive in the heat of a great national campaign. Democrats controlled Congress for 16 years. Now they say that they failed to deal adequately with social security, education, health and housing and blame Republicans for not enacting the programs they failed and refused to enact during 16 years of authority. I am surprised we made as much progress as we did, in face of the opposition and politics-playing of the administration. I agree with Senator ALBEN BARKLEY, of Kentucky, New Deal nominee for Vice President, who said to the Senate in July:

> I have done what I could to cooperate with the majority in bringing about an adjournment because I think if we sit here until after the convention at Philadelphia, or if we sit here between the conventions or after the the two conventions, the entire time of the Congress will be taken up with political bickering and political legislation and political oratory, and I do not want that to be brought about. I want to finish what we can finish and adjourn the Congress, and I have tried my best to cooperate with the leaders on the Republican side to bring about an adjournment.

When Congress returned to the special session it was confronted at once with a filibuster by southern Democrats protesting the President's civil-rights program for minorities. These Dixiecrats did not want Negroes to vote in the South and their speeches prevented anybody else from speaking or the Senate from considering for 2 weeks legislation their President recommended, such is the disunity in the President's party. Even so, the Republicans in the House eventually put through more inflation control and housing legislation and exposed another tremendous Communist spy ring at work in high administration circles, extending right into the White House.

Fourteenth. Congress established a National Heart Institute and provided liberal funds for a National Cancer Institute, to stimulate research upon and cure of these dread killers.

Fifteenth. Congress provided a cost-of-living pay increase for postal and other Federal employees caught between fixed incomes and rising prices. Congress increased some postal rates to offset the cost.

Sixteenth. Congress passed, over Presidential veto, the Reed-Bulwinkle bill, supported by labor and management, providing rates of rail carriers be approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission as being in the public interest, instead of by the political Department of Justice.

Seventeenth. Congress created the Government Reorganization Commission, a bipartisan group headed by former President Herbert Hoover, which is preparing to submit to the next Congress a comprehensive plan to reorganize the chaotic executive branch of government in the interests of efficiency and economy.

Eighteenth. Congress acted to limit Presidents' terms to two, by submitting to the States for ratification, a constitutional amendment.

Nineteenth. Congress aided small business. It created special committees of the Senate and the House which are seeing that small business, the backbone of American industry, gets a fair break, especially in the awarding of Government contracts for national defense and aid to foreign countries.

Twentieth. Congress extended the Reciprocal Trade Act with reasonable safeguards. This act was extended for 1 year with amendments requiring the President to report to Congress and the people when, in secretly making a trade agreement with a foreign country, he exceeds recommendations made by the United States Tariff Commission pursuant to standards prescribed by Congress, for protection of American industries and agriculture.

As I said earlier, the Eightieth Congress passed over 900 important laws.

I have given you 20. I think I have said enough to convince any reasonable person, however, that this was not the worst Congress, a do-nothing Congress, as the President charges; that it was, instead, an active Congress, a good one—one devoted to the public welfare. In the face of stubborn opposition from the White House, it has kept its promises to the people. This integrity in itself is a refreshing contrast to the callously broken campaign pledges of its New Deal predecessors. The Members have been busy, also, in their offices, handling a vast volume of correspondence and requests from their constituents, and in committees investigating many things in preparation for legislation yet to come, for the Eightieth Congress could not, in the less than 2 years of its existence, be reasonably expected to cure all the mistakes of 16 years of hasty, New Deal rubber-stamp legislation. We are giving careful consideration to all those problems affecting your pocketbook and our way of life. We, the people's representatives, are writing the laws now—not the left-wing bureaucrats. We have established solid foundations for a complete restoration of orderly, constitutional government, responsive to the needs of the people. We have reestablished the people's belief in the pledged word of a political party. We have made good on our promises.

This discussion would not be complete without reference to foreign affairs and inflation—our two most critical national problems at the moment.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

Many of the ills confronting the United States and the world, root causes for high prices and about $30,000,000,000 in aid given to foreign countries since the end of hostilities, stem from the betrayals of American interest by appeasement of Soviet Russia in those sordid, secret, war-breeding conferences at Quebec, Yalta, Tehran, and Potsdam, not only by Mr. Truman but by his predecessor and by that host of Wall Street millionaires, munitions makers, international bankers, and professional military men who constitute his "brain trust" and Cabinet. The Republican Party had no part in making those blunders. We were not there. Our leaders in Congress were not consulted. We have tried in good faith to be bipartisan in our foreign policy, but the policy lacks many of the elements of true bipartisanship. It is becoming a convenient device to get us to share the blame when things go wrong. When things go right the administration claims all the credit. Read the New Deal platform adopted at Philadelphia. They even claim exclusive credit for winning the war.

It is startling that while the President called a special session of Congress he carefully omitted any reference to foreign affairs, delicate though they are. We cannot be blamed if things continue to go wrong. He is handling it. He wants no help, except unquestioning, bipartisan obedience when he asks for more money, more guns, more relief, to cover up the blunders he has created. It is obvious that an administration which harbors so many who see in the Russian way of doing things a better system than our own could not be expected to follow a consistent and firm position in dealing with communism at home or abroad. In January we will have Tom Dewey's firm hand on the steering wheel and things will be different. The President and not the Congress is in direct charge of our foreign affairs. Congress has a responsibility, but the President must call the signals. The Constitution makes him captain of the team. We need a captain who will not play on both sides; who will not send war materials to Russia as he has been doing, and is doing; who will cooperate with the Congress in its efforts to keep America American and avoid world war III.

One of the most costly blunders of the administration has been its failure and inability to plan properly for peace. The administration is afraid of peace. The New Deal was unable to solve the depression of the thirties without war and today has the Nation on a war footing and in priming the economic pump with war expenditures, preparations and headlines, unaware of any method of using our industrial capacity to promote the welfare of our people—apart from the wars and threats of wars which have characterized this and other Democratic administrations. More than 80 percent of our national expenditures now go towards preparation for war, foreign aid, assistance to veterans of past wars and payment on the war debt. I repeat, we desperately need a Republican President who will cooperate with a Republican Congress, working together for peace, prosperity, economy and a higher standard of living which will come with a lifting from the backs of the common people of America, and the world, the crushing burden of the armaments race which dooms all mankind to poverty and atomic war. This can be done under a strengthened world order for peace, law and justice, with a revitalized United Nations no longer the abandoned stepchild of the administration.

America today, due to the inept, vacillating and indecisive handling of our foreign relations has bewildered the world. We, to whom the world turns for inspired leadership, are honor bound to present a concrete policy of American thinking and action. Our foreign policy as presently administered is on a day-to-day basis. A sound and stated foreign policy, clear in its principles and unswerving in its aims to bring about and maintain world peace would be backed wholeheartedly by all our people.

The Republican Congress has delivered on its pledges to the people. It has done so despite obstruction every step of the way by an Administration whose philosophy of government revolves around radicalism, regimentation, all-powerful bureaucracy, class exploitation, government extravagance, stifling and destructive taxation, centralization of power and authority in Washington, coddling of Communists and corrupt big city politics, exemplified by the cesspool of civic corruption from which the present occupant of the White House crawled while the voters slept.

INFLATION

The President, in a desperate attempt to divert attention from the hopelessly divided condition and confusion within his administration and Party, called Congress into special session to act on a host of proposals to fix wages and prices, to expand government spending, increase Federal taxes, socialize medicine and generally regiment the life of every family, as well as agriculture, labor, and industry. His proposals would create an annual budget $20,000,000,000 more than the present one, thus making inflation inevitable and permanent. His proposal to combat inflation is to ration and fix prices and, at the same time, to pour gasoline on the fires of inflation by more government spending. His appointee on the Federal Reserve Board, Marriner S. Eccles, testified to the House that, "This program is unworkable. It does not make economic sense." One thing it does do. It gives you a clear-cut choice on the issue of high prices, and what you want done about them, if anything.

The New Deal has only one remedy for all types of trouble. More power over the people and more expenditures of public funds. To cure a deflation in 1933, it created WPA to shovel out the money. It created the NRA with its blue eagle, giving business exemption from the monopoly laws if it would just raise prices. It was the day of the blue eagle, the green light and the dark-brown taste. A pants presser in New Jersey was put in jail because he insisted on charging 25 cents to press a pair of pants instead of 35 cents, as directed by the NRA. In New York a poultry dealer sold a sick chicken at less than the NRA code price and was arrested, not for selling a sick bird but for selling for too little money. That was the first New Deal attempt at price-fixing and to bring about inflation. It was the sick chicken versus the blue eagle. The sick chicken knocked out the blue eagle in a battle before the Supreme Court. But other devices were dreamed up by the brain trust to increase prices. Gold was devalued and it was made illegal for you to have any. It is all buried in a hole in the ground at Fort Knox, Ky. Money was cheapened and today we have the inevitable results of these policies. Yet, the same remedy is proposed to cure what they attempted to, and did, create. They want more controls and more cheap money. Bernard Baruch says that what is needed now is a reversed policy, less spending, a balanced budget, more production, fewer strikes—those policies the Republican Congress has inaugurated to combat inflation. Understand me. This condition created by 16 years of tampering with our money supply cannot be corrected over night. It may get worse before it gets better. You cannot go on a spree and not pay for it with a headache.

A simple rule of either medicine or economics is that in order to prevent a thing you must control its cause. In medicine you cannot prevent an illness by misreading the thermometer that is recording the patient's temperature, nor by fixing it so that it cannot rise, nor by throwing it in the river.

Likewise, in economics, you cannot prevent inflation that has already taken place by falsifying the evidence recorded in the market places where people do business, nor by attempting to fix prices, nor by closing markets and tampering with the free exchange of goods and services. Prices are the thermometer of the inflation patient, not the causes of the disease. To fool with the thermometer, and to claim that it protects the health of the patient, is the lowest form of economic quackery and the foulest brand of political snake oil. Even if the quack loudly proclaims his love of the patient and concern about his welfare, it does not make his shenanigans any less futile. Curbing inflation requires the treatment of causes, not condemnation of effects. High prices are not the criminal. They are only his tracks and inflation his name.

The New Deal wrecking crew in Washington has done all it can to hamstring private enterprise in such a way as to build up a clamor for wartime controls in peacetime and to stimulate a boom-and-bust economy. It has fought every effort of Congress to deal with the causes of inflation, which are many. It is pertinent at this point to remember that it was Harry Truman who vetoed, in 1946, the OPA extension bill which called for an orderly end to wartime controls. He, and not Congress, abruptly decontrolled commodities in an attempt too late to pacify irate voters in the 1946 elections. It was Harry Truman who, on October 16, 1947, denounced rationing and price controls in a White House press conference as, "The methods of a police state." These are the same controls he asks your Congress to put back now. I insist that the real, durable answer to inflation will be found not in building another jacket around the boiler in the form of price controls and rationing, and other legislative procedures, but rather in reducing the intensity of the fires under the boiler. Is there any prospect that the present administration will do that, that it wants to, or is capable of doing it? Let us look at the record. Here are some things in addition to those I previously mentioned that the New Deal administration has done which have made inflation inevitable and worse day by day.

First. Following a program of scarcity, killing stock, burning wheat, and throwing little pigs in the river, to increase prices. Republicans opposed this policy from the start.

Second. Permitted prominent New Deal officials to speculate on the commodity market, with inside information, running up the price of commodities. Republicans exposed and stopped this graft.

Third. Engaged in a tremendous Government buying program of things in short supply at home, to give away to the foreigners. Food, for instance, is cheaper in Great Britain than it is here. The reason: United States taxpayers give the British Government $1,000,000,000 annually to subsidize the British food prices. Republicans oppose this misuse of foreign aid.

Fourth. Engaged in deficit spending and creation of printing-press money to meet costs of unproductive Government spending, the chief cause of inflation. Republicans in Congress have stopped this.

Fifth. Opposed peacetime personal-income-tax reduction in 1947, permitting wartime taxes to add to the cost of living, cutting take-home pay and discouraging production. Congress overrode the President's tax veto.

Sixth. The New Deal has encouraged low productivity and has insisted that wage increases can be granted without increasing production costs and prices, keeping hundreds of thousands of people on the dole who should be made to get a job, and by condoning feather-bedding practices, business and labor monopolies. Republicans in Congress have exposed and worked to correct these conditions.

Seventh. The administration has drawn people from farm and factory to work in the political machine in Washington, and branch offices throughout the Nation, when they ought to be in jobs producing goods and wealth. The cost of Government has increased 817 percent under the New Deal, the national debt has grown 1,073 percent, the number of Federal employees 250 percent, and Federal taxes, of all kinds, 4,300 percent. The Republican Congress has taker long steps to correct all these conditions.

Eighth. The administration fostered and supported the OPA which reduced production, hamstrung business and farms, created all kinds of scarcities, black markets, and stimulated inflation. The Republican Congress refuses to revive OPA which the President called a failure and un-American but now wants restored.

Ninth. The New Deal has encouraged labor policies which result in strikes and crippling of production and has opposed all legislation to cure the causes of industrial unrest. The Republican Congress overrode Truman's veto of the Taft-Hartley Act.

Tenth. The New Deal administration has denounced private enterprise, has sought to put Government in competition with it in many fields and has approved every proposal for additional Government spending and extension of bureaucracy. The Congress has reversed this policy.

Eleventh. The President has failed and refused to use the powers granted to the administration by Congress to restrict expansion of credit on which expansion of the money supply is in turn based. The money supply has increased from $54,800,000,000 in 1929 to $164,900,000,000 today. The Republican Congress opposes a cheap money policy and is for a sound currency. Vice President Marshall once said, "What this country needs is a good 5-cent cigar." Republicans believe our greatest need now is a good 5-cent nickel.

All of these administration policies and others which could be mentioned, have had the effect of throwing gasoline on the fires of inflation. The only way to end the "tax, spend, and elect" policies which have reduced the value of the dollar and cut the value of every salary, savings account, Government bond and insurance policy, is to elect a new administration in November. Sixteen years of depression, war, and inflation is enough. Congress must be supported by a Chief Executive who will cooperate in the national interest, and who will not gamble with the people's savings, wages, and lives for partisan political advantage.

There is a passage in Ezekiel which reads: "Then whosoever heareth the sound of the trumpet and taketh not warning, if the sword come and take him away, his blood shall be upon his own head."

My friends, the trumpet is already blowing. Let us hear and heed its clarion call on November 2. Vote Republican and save what is left!

The Republican "Wreckord"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. AUGUSTINE B. KELLEY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks, I am including a recent editorial from the Roscoe Ledger, of Roscoe, Pa., entitled "The Republican Wreckord."

Roscoe is in the midst of an industrial area and the people there must work hard for a living. This editorial no doubt reflects the feelings of these thousands of working people. There is a tone of bitterness about it which is not difficult to understand. These are the people who are feeling the brunt of high prices and inadequate housing. Coupled with it is the feeling that their efforts to obtain increased wages to aid them in fighting high living costs are frustrated by the Taft-Hartley Act.

The masses of the people have a complaint, and a just complaint, because the Congress has done none of the things it should have done to assist them in securing better living conditions, better homes, better schools. In fact, almost everything the Congress has done has reacted to their discomfort. If this special session does not act to relieve the burden on the people, the country will know about it. And Mr. Dewey need not look for a victory, for the people will not place in power those who have so flagrantly ignored their needs.

THE REPUBLICAN "WRECKORD"

The strongest attack on the do-nothing policy of the Republican-controlled Eightieth Congress has come from the Republican Party itself. The GOP, in convention assembled, blasted the Eightieth Congress "wreckord" by admitting that the Congress has done nothing—by adopting a platform promising that this time they would do all the things they promised last time.

It is an alluring set of promises but the voter is not likely to confuse promises with performance. The real platform of the GOP is the "wreckord" of the Eightieth Congress. Here is how it reads:

The Republican Party favors—

Inflation and a rising cost of living because it likes high prices and even higher profits for the privileged few.

Monopoly and would investigate Government agencies for opposing price fixing.

Small tax cuts for low-income families and big tax cuts for the rich who need such aid least in the expectation that such funds will be contributed to the GOP campaign chest.

Illiteracy, overcrowded schools and underpaid teachers.

Bigger and better slums.

Reducing the atomic-energy program to a political football.

The Republican Party opposes—

Extending social-security benefits to those who need such help.

New-fangled projects such as the TVA because it dosn't want to increase public power where the profits from such projects do not go to the privileged few.

Decent homes for veterans at prices they can afford to pay.

Federal action to let working people obtain better medical care through health insurance.

Treating labor as a full partner in our economy and opposes raising the minimum wage to a living wage.

The Republican Party cannot make up its mind about the need for world recovery. Certain powerful factions in the GOP would revert to isolationism and would return to the days of the Smoot-Hawley tariff walls. Other factions manage to follow the international leadership of the Democratic administration along the road to peace, trying to justify such action in their own eyes by the completely unjustified claim that they inaugurated the policy.

The voter will not be fooled again. He will not confuse promises with performance.

Protecting Our Economy Against Inflation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM H. STEVENSON

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, on August 2 I addressed the House stating that Congress should not adjourn this special session until something was done to curb inflation and to stop ever-increasing prices. I suggested that Congress stop the inflation of our national debt and the currency; that bank credits be restrained; and that consumer credit controls be imposed by the President through his emergency powers and by the Federal Reserve System.

The House has today passed Joint Resolution 157 to aid in protecting the Nation's economy against inflationary pressures, by an overwhelming vote. This resolution as passed by the House today authorizes the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System to exercise consumer-credit controls; and further authorizes the Board to change the requirements as to reserves in the member banks of the Federal Reserve System in order to prevent injurious credit expansion.

In its report to Congress on the resolution the Committee on Banking and Currency said:

The causes for the depreciation of the dollar are the easy money policies of the Government and the unusually heavy demand by foreign countries for American goods. For years the President and the Federal Reserve System have had the powers to stabilize our economy. Judicious use of these powers from now on can prevent higher prices and can result in economic and financial stability. Under the Anti-Inflation Act passed by the Eightieth Congress the President was given specific powers to control our exports. These export controls can be exercised by the President to adjust exports to domestic stability. At the time that authority was given to the President the Banking and Currency Committee stated that one reason for present high prices is the unusually large foreign demand for American goods that are in short supply in this country.

When Congress terminated the controls over consumer credit it specifically provided that such termination did not affect the authority of the President to reimpose such controls during any national emergency declared by the President.

Joint Resolution 157 as passed by the House today specifically spells out the power and authority of the President to control consumer installment credits.

In the January 1948 issue of Labor's Monthly Survey, published by the American Federation of Labor, the following significant statements were made regarding the cause of present high prices:

The root cause of today's continuing price rise is the inflation of money. Money supply in the United States of America was enormously expanded to finance the war, but even after the war it has gone on increasing at a rate out of all proportion to production of goods. That is the main reason why prices keep rising now. Today the total supply of money is three times that of 1939, while the supply of goods to be bought with the money is only 71 percent higher. The upward pressure of the huge money supply has been so great that prices were breaking through ceilings and black markets were appearing long before OPA expired. This was to be expected. The world food shortage and the foreign relief program increased the demand for scarce goods. These factors contributed to the upward price spiral. Its root cause was the inflated money supply resulting from wartime fiscal policies. Price control cannot dam an ever-flowing flood of money inflation. This has been proven again and again in country after country. We must attack the root cause of inflation, the excess money supply. The powers of the Federal Reserve System should be used to prevent inflation and to provide no more than a reasonable and normal growth in the Nation's money supply.

I hope that with the passage of Joint Resolution 157 in this special session of Congress, we have attacked the root cause of inflation, and that lower prices in the market place will result.

High Prices and the Cost of Living

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WARREN G. MAGNUSON

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter from Mrs. Elizabeth Vogel, of Seattle, Wash.; a telegram from B. F. Carpenter, president, Automotive Machinists Lodge No. 289, of Seattle; a postal card from Mrs. A. E. Lenhart, of Seattle; a letter from Eric Hvalsoe, of Seattle; a postal card from Emery Johnson, of Bremerton, Wash., and a letter from Harold O. Bucey, financial secretary, Cascade Lodge No. 297, the International Association of Machinists, of Tacoma, Wash. The communications relate to the subject of the high prices and the cost of living.

Following the printing of these communications, I also ask to have printed at the same point in the Appendix a letter which I sent under date of August 3, 1948, to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. TOBEY], chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency.

There being no objection, the matters referred to were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WARREN MAGNUSON.

DEAR SENATOR: I wish to write in behalf of the ratification of the international wheat agreement. This agreement, as you know, is designed to bring order into international wheat marketing. I earnestly urge you to do your utmost to have this agreement ratified at the special session of Congress.

I am hoping and praying that our representatives will be guided by divine wisdom and not by human will. That they will do their utmost to stop these soaring prices. And also act on the other bills that are so necessary.

If the Republicans do nothing at this special session of Congress, as the commentators are telling us, I and many like me will vote for the Democrats—although I have always been a Republican.

Thanking you, I am

Respectfully yours,

Mrs. ELIZABETH VOGEL.

SEATTLE, WASH., August 4, 1948.

Senator MAGNUSON,

Washington, D. C.:

We earnestly request that you do all within your power to have Congress remain in session until they have adopted sound legislation that will defeat the inflationary spiral now in evidence. We are not concerned in who is at fault for past actions but we are vitally concerned about the increased costs of the necessities of life. Also request adequate housing program be launched.

B. F. CARPENTER,
President, Automotive Machinists Lodge, No. 289.

SEATTLE, WASH., July 31, 1948.

Senator WARREN G. MAGNUSON,

Washington, D. C.:

DEAR SENATOR: Maybe we don't agree with a lot of things President Truman wants, but still there is a job to do—housing, prices, the Berlin situation. You Senators and Congressmen are hired (if you want to call it that) by us voters, and there is work to do. If I didn't do my work, I would be fired from my job. Please do what you can to get something out of this special session other than filibustering.

Very truly yours,

LORENE LENHART
(Mrs. A. E. Lenhart).

UNIVERSITY OF WASHINGTON,
Seattle, Wash.

WASHINGTON STATE CONGRESSMEN,
Care of Senator Warren Magnuson,
Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: Suggest that the Washington delegation stay on the job and do some work. It appears that your comrades in the majority are playing "tic-tac-toe" or "cry baby." Why don't they grow up? I'm no Democrat but by God if a joke is going to be made out of the internal situation by the majority party, I'll be Democrat from here on.

An ex-GI,

ERIC HVALSOE.

BREMERTON, WASH.

Senator WARREN G. MAGNUSON,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I believe that price controls should never have been abolished. I realize that price controls have many ills but they are better than inflation. Do something now. I want to praise you for your efforts to have the large carrier-conversion job assigned to Puget Sound Naval Shipyard.

EMERY JOHNSON.

INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF MACHINISTS,
CASCADE LODGE, NO. 297,
Tacoma, Wash., August 2, 1948.

Senator WARREN G. MAGNUSON,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have been instructed to communicate with you immediately in regard to the special session of Congress. Cascade Lodge No. 297, I. A. of M., urges you to stay in session until you have passed measures that will definitely stop inflation and roll back the present prices to where our members can pay them out of their wages.

We are not concerned with who killed the OPA, we have read about the death of the law and know how it come about, but we are concerned with the prices we have to pay now in order to live.

We also urge you to do something about passing an adequate housing bill at this session.

Don't play politics but do something constructive for the people of the country at this session of Congress.

Sincerely yours,

HAROLD O. BUCEY,
Financial Secretary.

Hon. CHARLES W. TOBEY,
Chairman, Banking and Currency Committee, United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: Since I am not a member of the Banking and Currency Committee, but am intensely interested in the anti-inflation proposals now before you, I take this means of presenting some observations on this question so intimately related to the welfare of the American people.

Like every other Senator, I have heard from the people back home by letter and telegram. From the temper of these communications, I hazard this prediction: The summer heat in Washington, D. C., is mild compared to the heat many Members of Congress will encounter back home if, in this special session, we fail to act positively and constructively.

Inflation hurts everyone. It ultimately forces the corner grocer out of business. It penalizes the thrifty by reducing the value of their savings. Inflation denies the veteran his chance to own a home. It filches bread, butter, and beans from the table of the workingman. It is a thief which must be apprehended before irreparable harm befalls the community in which it operates. Inflation is high prices—meat at $1.50 per pound.

I believe nothing will be gained by trying to assess blame. Most Members of Congress, many economists, most businessmen, laborers, bankers, and the public generally guessed wrong at some time during the months since VJ-day—guessed wrong as to the ultimate product of forces at work in our economy. Many people who now clamor for Congress to do something, were in the "follies of 1946" singing for removal of controls. Had we all been given the vision to pierce the future, at any time along the road we have traveled, and in unison acted accordingly, we would not today be confronted with prevailing extortionate food bills.

The rush of prices toward an economic collapse can be halted if Congress will act. In acting, our employers—the people—expect us to drive the best possible bargain. In my judgment this means dealing with the problem on all susceptible fronts. Adoption of a single remedy may necessitate application in doses so heavy as to jeopardize the patient's chances for regaining economic health.

The multiple attack on inflation suggested by the President has been "brushed off" in some quarters with this excuse: "Let us stick exclusively to time-tested correctives—control of bank credit through powers of the Federal Reserve Board." I, too, have a healthy regard for the time-tested but would remind these advocates that as recently as 1918, this approach was itself an innovation. Were such arguments to prevail, no new techniques for putting the brakes on inflationary and deflationary spirals could ever be evolved.

To purge our economy of inflationary causes is a delicate process. Certainly the war-created obligations held by banks and other financial institutions cannot be retired overnight. Neither can we drastically reduce exports without simultaneously repudiating our present bipartisan foreign policy—and without denying to businessmen of the Nation the opportunity of reestablishing themselves in foreign markets. Nor can we refuse to build houses for our people to relax pressures on building materials, without at the same time incurring the risk of forcing housing prices still higher—current demand being pitted against a smaller supply. Further, I know of no responsible person in private or public life who has urged elimination of defense expenditures, although they account for over 30 percent of Government spending.

The wholly voluntary approach to inflation, allocation of materials, etc., has not brought results, largely because it has proven impossible to obtain simultaneous and concerted action by workers, businessmen, and consumers. "It is therefore necessary," says the President's Council of Economic Advisers, "that the Government should have and use powers in the interest of economic stability, to supplement the strength of individual actions, to give them common direction, and to prevent their dissipation through mutual conflict of purpose. Only with the support of wise and vigorous Government action can the effectiveness of voluntary actions be assured."

Only the Congress can give the Government the powers implied in this statement. The price of refusal to give those powers is loss of confidence by the American people in the leaders responsible for inaction; but even more to the point, the very people suffering most in the "boom" will bear the heaviest yoke in the "bust."

I stand ready to support a vigorous anti-inflation program. I believe an adequate program will fall within the framework of the President's proposals.

Best personal regards,

Sincerely,

WARREN G. MAGNUSON.

What Wisconsin Farmers Say About Congressman Stevenson's Farm Record in Congress

---

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. WILLIAM H. STEVENSON

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, for the information of the farmers in my district I want to assure my rural friends that I have always been a supporter of the soil-conservation program, and I have voted consistently in favor of the dairy farmer, and for the various agricultural appropriation bills that have come before Congress ever since I have been a Member of Congress. I have voted for increased appropriations, for conservation and conservation payments, and for conservation of our agricultural land resources.

I have received many letters from farm organizations of Wisconsin commending me for my loyalty and support of the farm and dairy program as carried out by Congress.

The Pure Milk Products Cooperative recently wrote me as follows:

Dear Congressman STEVENSON: We thank you personally for the splendid fight you have made and for your unswerving loyalty to the dairy farmers of Wisconsin and the Nation; and we want to be on record as conveying our most sincere appreciation for your splendid service. We are grateful to you for your service. Our 21,000 dairy farmers want to personally thank you for your loyalty. We want you to know we are deeply appreciative.

The Wisconsin Swiss Cheese Producers' Association has recently written me as follows:

DEAR CONGRESSMAN STEVENSON: We have noted with gratitude your voting record. As a representative of our great dairy State your efforts in behalf of the dairy industry will not go unappreciated by those you represent. We wish to thank you for your integrity and loyalty in behalf of the farmers whose welfare is dependent on their dairy production.

Another cheesemakers' association of Wisconsin recently wrote me as follows:

DEAR CONGRESSMAN STEVENSON: We wish to thank you for your voting record and loyalty in behalf of the dairy industry and the farmers.

The Wisconsin Farm Bureau Federation has written me, saying:

DEAR CONGRESSMAN STEVENSON: Your record on all legislation pertaining to agricultural matters has been excellent. Because of your record we feel that we are justified in expressing our appreciation to you for the excellent job you have done.

The Wisconsin Council of Agriculture Co-Operative has recently written to me, saying:

DEAR CONGRESSMAN STEVENSON: Your work in Congress has been of great value.

Another letter from a Wisconsin dairy cooperative reads as follows:

DEAR CONGRESSMAN STEVENSON: This is one of the most pleasant tasks that we have been assigned. Yesterday we had an advisory board meeting made up of one man from each of our sixty-odd organizations throughout the State of Wisconsin. They represent over 13,000 dairy farmers in Wisconsin. It would have done your heart good to have heard these real dirt farmers express their gratitude and admiration. The enclosed resolution came from the farmers and was not directed by the management. Therefore, it is an exceptional privilege and pleasure for me to transmit the enclosed resolution to you. May I add my own sincere appreciation for the splendid work that you have done.

Barnacles on the Ship of State

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOMER D. ANGELL
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Oregonian of August 3, 1948:

BARNACLES ON THE SHIP OF STATE

Revelations of Elizabeth T. Bentley, insofar as they are authentic and not the imaginings of a frustrated Vassar girl, will sharpen public desire for a new personality in the White House.

Unquestionably, one of the principal factors in American public thinking just now is the suspicion—the knowledge—that abuses have accumulated under the long Roosevelt-Truman regime, and that these abuses cannot be corrected from within. It is the feeling that only a President from the opposite political party can take the action necessary for a house cleaning. And naturally the public desire for such house cleaning greatly strengthens the position of Governor Dewey not only because he heads the opposition party but because, more than any other person in the country, he symbolizes the relentless prosecutor. His record in the New York district attorney's office bears examination, even after the passage of years, so far as getting his man is concerned, and the public wants the truth out of the Federal situation.

It is natural that a lot of questionable persons should have found refuge, and operating headquarters, within the Federal structure, during Mr. Roosevelt's time in office. He was an autocratic President who attempted the impossible—that of keeping watch on everything personally. He attracted to his support all sorts of fringe organizations, and accepted their representatives into the Government. There was tremendous expansion of Federal employment under the New Deal and during the war.

Possibly Mr. Roosevelt was personally strong enough to have done something drastic about this accumulation if he had lived and retained his health. Instead, he was sick for some time, and died. And President Truman has been inadequate from the public's standpoint. Any general self-examination of the employment rolls under his direction would look like criticism of Mr. Roosevelt, and that is forbidden in all present Democratic strategy. But he also has seemed to put obstacles in the way of even the more reasonable congressional inquiries, and in view of his political origin through the Pendergast machine and his recent shift of the party to the northern city machines, the public remains deeply dissatisfied. A ship of state acquires barnacles, and President Truman shows no intention of bringing our ship into fresh water or into drydock.

How deep the dissatisfaction goes—and into what unexpected places—may be judged from the statement of one of the leaders of the Oregon delegation at the Democratic Convention, when the party organization was cracking to pieces.

"Anyhow," he said, "it helps to know that when Dewey is elected he will dump those fellows out of office."

"Do you mean in Washington or back home?" he was asked.

"I mean in Oregon—in the Pacific Northwest. They have been in too long."

Now, patently, the Democratic officeholders of Oregon and the Pacific Northwest are not below the average. Most of them with whom we are acquainted were normal, decent persons, at least when they were young and took the oath of office.

But as the Democratic Party worker forcefully brings to mind, at least by implication, that was a long time ago. And if there can be such a feeling within the party itself, it is a fair conclusion that among independent voters—who are without expectation of personal preferment and consider only the welfare of the country—there must be millions of votes involved, and votes which appear destined for Governor Dewey.

In other words, the charges made by Miss Bentley—and all other charges of the infiltration of traitors and Russian spies within the Government—are particularly disturbing because of our critical international relationships. We cannot afford to have our secrets passed along when we may be involved in a death struggle with Russia at any moment. Nevertheless, the situation in regard to Russian spying is only a phase of the whole situation. The Truman administration is unwilling to admit any misdeeds—any accumulation of borers and parasites. It should have been cleaning out its administration; instead, it has been putting difficulties in the way of what little Congress could hope to do alone.

And the reaction to this is far more widespread than is generally recognized, and far angrier. The public does not understand why the Bentley case should have been revealed through the initiative of Congress rather than through the initiative of the White House. Neither does the Oregonian. We want no witch hunts, but that should not protect the incompetent and the disloyal within our mushroomed Federal structure.

Civil Rights Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. OVERTON BROOKS
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I received in this morning's mail a letter from an organization styling itself as the Civil Rights Congress with headquarters in Washington. This organization laments the fact that the Senate on yesterday set aside the consideration of civil rights and antisouthern legislation and it informs Members of Congress that a crowd of 5,000 persons are coming down here to Washington (I assume from New York) for the purpose of protesting this action and forcing Congress to put through antisouthern legislation at this special session.

I am wondering if this organization thinks it can browbeat Congress into action by force of numbers? This method of petitioning the Government by sending huge crowds here to visit the Repsentatives of the people is alien to our philosophy of government. It is an appeal to government by mob and by pressure. It is wrong; and no self-respecting Representative can appreciate this type of effort to influence this Congress. The fact that some of these people coming down here boast of being Communists and alien in their ideas of government can only disgust Members of Congress and make them even more determined to rid all Government agencies of anyone save 100-percent Americans.

Welfare of Indians in Arizona and New Mexico

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RICHARD F. HARLESS
OF ARIZONA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. HARLESS of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I herewith include three letters relative to the problem of caring for the welfare of the Indians in Arizona and New Mexico:

AUGUST 5, 1948.

Hon. WESLEY A. D'EWART,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Indian Affairs, Public Lands Committee, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR COLLEAGUE: Pursuant to our conversation this morning with regard to holding a hearing on the Navajo and Hopi Reservations sometime in November or December of this year, I wish further to call to your attention the urgent need of a policy with respect to the welfare of the Indians, particularly the Navajos. It is obvious that the Federal Government has the responsibility of caring for the Indians. In the past, this responsibility has not been fully assumed, and it has placed the States of Arizona and New Mexico in an awkward position.

These Indians are in a class of their own, inasmuch as they have suffered unusual neglect over a long period of time.

Following our conversation, I discussed the matter of Navajo and Hopi welfare with Dr. A. J. Altmeyer, Commissioner of the Social Security Administration and with Mr. William E. Warne, Assistant Secretary of the Interior. Both of these gentleman recognize that there is a real emergency in this problem. I informed them that you had expressed the desire to hold hearings in order to make an early report to the Eighty-first Congress.

At the present time, there are insufficient funds at the disposal of the Bureau of Indian Affairs to care for the welfare needs of the Navajo and Hopi Indians through the winter. Therefore, it would be necessary to have additional funds during the early part of 1949.

I sincerely hope that you will go forward with your plans for holding a hearing on the Navajo and Hopi Reservations during the latter part of this year, in order that the report will be completed and ready for consideration by your committee during January, 1949.

Should your committee convene in November or December on the reservations involved, I trust that you will notify me, so that I may be with you on that occasion.

With kindest personal regards, I am,

Very sincerely yours,

RICHARD F. HARLESS.

AUGUST 5, 1948.

Dr. A. J. ALTMEYER,
Commissioner, Social Security Administration, Washington, D. C.

DEAR DR. ALTMEYER: In line with our telephone conversation today, I wish to reemphasize my comments relative to the desirability of continuing the arrangements made by your office and the congressional delegations of Arizona and New Mexico last January 26 with reference to the assumption by the Federal Government of the expenses involved in Indian welfare in the two States, until a policy can be formulated by Congress.

I know you are well aware of the unique nature of the problems of the Indians in Arizona and New Mexico and that there should be a fixed congressional policy with respect to the Indians in the two States.

After talking to you, I spoke to Mr. William E. Warne, Assistant Secretary of the Interior, and he said that he would be glad to cooperate in every way possible to solve these problems. Although the Department of the Interior is short on funds, I believe that sufficient funds are available to care for the welfare of the Indians in Arizona and New Mexico until Mr. D'Ewart's committee can report to Congress in January of 1949.

I trust that you will hold in abeyance any change of policy until the committee can make a study of the problem and report to Congress.

For the benefit of the Indians of Arizona and New Mexico and in justice to the two States, this matter should be determined by a committee of Congress, and sufficient time should be given for study of this problem by the committee of Congress having jurisdiction.

Assuring you of my desire to cooperate fully with every agency involved in the solution of this problem, I am

Very sincerely yours,

RICHARD F. HARLESS.

AUGUST 5, 1948.

Mr. WILLIAM E. WARNE,
Assistant Secretary of the Interior, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. WARNE: Confirming our telephone conversation today with reference to the welfare problems of Indians in Arizona and New Mexico, I am submitting herewith copies of letters I have addressed to my colleague, the Honorable WESLEY A. D'EWART, chairman of the Subcommittee on Indian Affairs of the Public Lands Committee of the House and to Dr. A. J. Altmeyer, Commissioner of the Social Security Administration, which are self-explanatory.

Again I wish to emphasize to you the great need of continuing the policy of the Bureau of Indian Affairs of handling the welfare of the Indians in Arizona and New Mexico, until a congressional committee can make a study and report to Congress. I know that you are aware that the problems of the Indians in Arizona and New Mexico are unique and require special study. In justice to the Indians and to the States involved, I sincerely urge that you do everything possible to cooperate with the Social Security Administration and with the States of Arizona and New Mexico, with a view toward having a policy fixed by the Eighty-first Congress during the early part of their first session.

I trust that these matters will be taken into consideration at the time the conference is held with the various agencies involved during the early part of August.

Assuring you of my sincere desire to cooperate in every way possible in all efforts to advance Indian welfare and with kindest personal regards, I am

Very sincerely yours,

RICHARD F. HARLESS.

States' Rights and Civil Rights

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. JAMES O. EASTLAND

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "States' Rights—Civil Rights. What Is It All About?" written by J. A. Thigpen, a representative in the Mississippi Legislature.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATES' RIGHTS—CIVIL RIGHTS—WHAT IS IT ALL ABOUT?

Possibly the most discussed issue before the American people today is the so-called civil-rights program. Due to the peculiar conditions existing in many Northern States caused by the almost equal vote of the Democrats and Republicans, it has come about that the Negroes, most of whom have migrated from the South in this generation, have the balance of power. Because of this situation the politicians in those States have tried to outdo each other in promising benefits to the Negro to get votes. They have promised things that they knew could not be fulfilled and which they had no intention of fulfilling and when election day was over they promptly forgot until next election day. Of course as the next election came on the politicians in Congress would introduce a bill in Congress to outlaw lynching, the poll tax, and a few other bills to get the Negro vote for the next election. Every northern politician knows that there are more Negroes killed in Harlem, New York, or Chicago, or any other of the ghettoes in which they segregate the Negro up North than are lynched in the South in all the Southern States. The poll tax is a tax to get at least a little money from every person whether he owns property or not, to run the schools of the South. A man without property would pay no tax were it not for the poll tax. Every citizen white, black, or yellow is assessed this tax. Every tax must have a penalty attached or some people will not pay them. Ad valorem taxes have the penalty of sale of your property, privilege tax the penalty of closing your business, but you can't cut a man's head off for failure to pay the tax so our forefathers placed the penalty of not allowing a man to vote unless he paid his school tax. The poll tax is not payment for the privilege of voting—we are penalized for not paying the school tax by not allowing us to vote.

As to segregation, God himself ordained segregation when He painted the Negro black, the Chinaman yellow, the Indian red, and the white man white. At the Tower of Babel He confused their language so that they would not become one people but many tribes. They had to find the people who spoke their language to associate with. God segregated the other creation by color—the birds, the beasts, the snakes, the bugs, and what have you. All the rest of the creatures of God obey God's segregation but man supposedly the greatest of His creatures is today doing all in his power to mix up the races. Everyone knows that social intercourse will lead to sexual intercourse and that to a mongrel race. Yet these same people who preach the way to build a great nation is to have intermingling, have dogs or horses or other animals of which they are proud and will proudly show you a long pedigree of pure blood. They do not want their children to associate with the Negro and they do not want to live in the same community or the same street as the Negro, but for political gain they get out and advocate such a course.

God created in every person's innermost recesses a desire to worship Him. That is what differentiates man from the other animals of God's creation. When men do not satiate this desire for worship of God by taking Him into their hearts, they try to satisfy this craving for worship by pleasure which does not satisfy and they are fall guys for the propagandist who shows them something for which they can crusade. Some underdog who needs rescuing—the rescue of the Holy Grail from the heathen or relieving the southern Negro from the terrible scourge of the poll tax. The Communists, the do-gooders have recognized this trait in humans and at this time are playing this civil-rights program up to cover their designs to take over this Nation as a Communist dictatorship.

Since the world began there have been two theories of government. One that the individual was a living soul, that his personality was supreme in his individual sphere and as such was entitled to work out his own destiny without hindrance so long as it did not trespass on the other fellow's freedom of action. That government exists for the individual, to see that he has this freedom to work out his own destiny without hindrance. Otherwise, the government is but to see that one individual does not impose on the individual rights of another. That is democracy.

The other theory of government is that the state is supreme, that the ruler stands in the place of God and that the individual is to obey the dictates of the government rather than the dictates of his own consciousness. That man exists for the state and not the state for man.

Way back in the beginning of history we find Abraham leaving his native land of Ur and going as far as he could on land to the shores of the Mediterranean Sea in order that he might worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience without interference from the central all-powerful state. The last great trek of this kind was when our forefathers left their homes in Europe and sailed uncharted seas to find a place where they could be free from an all-powerful state. There were those who came along though that still had the desire for an all-powerful state. Our forefathers in order to keep down the centralization of power in the hands of a few and the taking away the individual rights of the people to freedom, set up a government of three branches and give them only limited powers. They reserved the rest of the powers to the States. The proponents of centralized government were not dead but have continued in all nations under one guise or another to plan for and work for a centralized world government which would take away the freedom of all the peoples of the world.

So long as our people worshipped God and realized the sancitity of the individual personality, our Nation was in no danger of becoming a centralized police state. In our generation though, the individual has become lost in the crowd. The time was when each workman did the complete task and was proud of the finished product. It was his creation. Today, under our mass-production methods no one person is responsible for the finished product and therefore cannot feel proud of the finished product as his creation. In the labor unions the leaders set the policy and the ordinary worker realizes that he has no choice. At first he resented this but wages are good and his pay check is larger because of the sinking of his individual rights and freedoms in the great mass of workers, so he acquiesced and gave up the freedom of choice. He must take his union paper, his trade paper, etc. The articles are written by the top and he becomes enmeshed in the propaganda and ceases to do his own thinking. The time was when every man prided himself on doing his own thinking, but today you can read the trade, or union or daily papers and go out and find that the majority of the people are but mouthpieces of the propaganda in these papers.

We cannot catch a fish with a bare hook nor a bird or beast with a bare trap. We must camouflage it so that it looks enticing or we must create a diversion as the pickpocket does to draw the victim's attention elsewhere before we can catch him or take his property. The same is true with liberty. So the proponents are creating a diversion, getting people to crusade for the downtrodden southern Negro so that they can take away our liberties. If under the guise of keeping the Negro from being lynched or from being forced to pay a little of his expenses of sending his children to school, they can get Congress to pass a law sending the Federal authorities into the different States to take over the local government and penalize some whole county for the overt act of some bunch of hoodlums who might kill a Negro, they can take over all local government. Once the Central Government is given the police power the gate is open and they can then take over the local power for any purpose. They can arrest you from Washington about speaking lightly of the President or for any other idea that they choose. If any of these so-called civil-rights bills are passed giving the Central Government police powers in the States, then all freedom is gone in our beloved country.

The southern Negro is better off than the comparable class in any nation of the earth or any nation that has ever existed on the face of the earth. They can own all the property that they will save their money and buy. They can vote under the same conditions as the ruling class by simply paying their school tax. They own more automobiles than the rich class in other nations. They go to schools that are better than the schools that the whites went to when I was a boy. The North must remember that the South was devastated by a war a generation ago and they did not have any Marshall plan to help them. They have had to come back by their own efforts. They get justice in the courts in most instances. There are always cruel-hearted men in every nation and people who mistreat their labor or those less fortunate than they. You have them in the North, too. These are the exception and not the rule, but these propagandists have sold the people of the North on the idea that all southern people mistreat the Negro. It is true that they do not live in as good houses as a general rule as the whites but that same condition exists in the North. The lower class of labor always lives in cheaper houses. The Negro who is only a few centuries removed from cannibalism has advanced further than any comparable race, but no race can be highly civilized overnight. It is a long-drawn-out process of growth. The only result of forced association would be the degrading and mongrelization of the white civilization, as the Negro has not yet grown to that point.

The southern leaders are basing their fight against the so-called civil rights on the grounds of States' rights. They know the real proponents of this program don't give a tinker's damn about the rights of the southern Negro or for that matter any other minority or majority group either. They are just using the southern Negro as a smoke screen to hide their nefarious scheme of taking away the liberties of all our people and making our country a dictatorship with them as the dictators. When and if Congress destroys the rights of the individual States to exercise the police power in those States and permits the bureaucrats at Washington to send police into the different States to enforce antilynching, antipoll tax, fair employment, or any other thing, that very minute all liberty is lost.

It behooves all patriotic Americans to look behind the crusade for civil rights and see that by destroying States' rights they are destroying human rights and placing the lives and fortunes of all our people in the hands of the bureaucrats at Washington. After the powers are granted by Congress it will be too late to howl then. Are Americans going to be the prize dupes of all the ages by swapping away so great a freedom under the guise of civil rights to some of its citizens? Wake up, Americans, and save our liberties before it is too late. Let's preserve States' rights and the American form of government in spite of the fact that the leaders of both the old parties have sold us down the river in their platforms. Make your wishes known before the election in November.

J. A. THIGPEN.

Civil Rights

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM LEWIS OF KENTUCKY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. LEWIS of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, no one ever chose the race to which he belonged. No one is responsible for the color of his skin any more than he is responsible for the color of his hair. It is well known that there are only five races: the Caucasian, Ethiopian, Malayan, Mongolian, and the Red. No Member of this Congress or any other Congress had anything to do with how he, or she came into this world and all peoples were here for a few years before they knew how they came or to what race they belonged, and no man should be censored or discriminated against because of his race, color, or national origin.

DISCRIMINATION

I repeat that I am opposed to discriminating against anyone because of his race or color. However, there may be—and I think there is—some dispute or controversy as to what constitutes discrimination. Every man and woman of normal mind is guilty of discrimination in many ways. A man who chooses to smoke a more expensive cigar instead of a stogie is guilty of discrimination. Every young man who marries some beautiful young girl instead of some one of the many other beautiful girls of his acquaintance is guilty of discrimination. Would anyone challenge his right to choose? A man or woman may have a very discriminating mind but unless the act of discriminating is unjust or unfair, no one has the right to complain.

SEGREGATION

I have absolutely no prejudice against the Negro race or any member of that race, but I am opposed to Negro children and white children attending the same schools, using the same playgrounds and recreational centers. I believe that Negro schools should be taught by members of their own race while the white schools should be taught by members of their own race. I do not believe this to be unjust or unfair. I think it is best for both races.

Suppose that a certain school district has 100 pupils ranging in age from 6 to 16 years and made up of an equal number of white children and Negro children. Should these children be permitted to attend the same school and sit side by side in the school room? A white boy sitting beside a Negro girl, and a white girl, if you please, sitting beside a Negro boy? They study together, many are in the same grade and are in the same classes. They eat together and drink together, just as if they were all white or all colored. On the playground they run, hop, skip, and jump, play tag, hide-and-seek, and other games together; attend the same social functions just as if they were all Negroes or all white. I am not only opposed to mixed schools but to mixed churches, Sunday schools, prayer meetings, and all of the social functions of the church. I believe it is best for the colored race and for the white race for each to have its own churches and schools. I think the Negro race should have its own churches and its own preachers and its own Sunday schools, its own prayer meetings, and its own social functions, all separate and apart from the white race. I think this is best for both races. In traveling by train I believe that the Negroes should ride, sleep, and eat in separate coaches from the white people. Imagine, if you please, a colored man sleeping in a lower berth in the same coach just opposite a white woman in easy arm's reach of each other. Does not such tend to encourage amalgamation of the races? I do not believe that any Member of this Congress or any other Congress believes in or would advocate amalgamation of the Negro race with the white race. I rather think the large majority of the white race and a like majority of the Negro race are opposed to amalgamation of the two races. Would not such be unfair to both races?

In traveling on trains the facilities and accommodations provided for both races should be equal and any discrimination in this respect would be unfair. I have no objection to both races attending public gatherings at the same time such as races, State fairs, county fairs, public speaking, public games such as baseball, football and basketball, prize fights and public conventions and similar public gatherings.

If we tolerate the association of the two races in the schools of America, in the churches of America, in the hotels and restaurants, and on the trains for a few hundred years would it be fantastic to suggest that we would no longer have a Negro race or a white race, but instead, a mongrel race?

I also believe that the Negro children of America in every State of the Union should have the same educational opportunities and the same educational advantages as the white children of America, and that each State in the Union should give to the Negro schools the same financial support as is given to the white schools. The State should be careful to furnish to the Negro schools and Negro children the same beautiful playgrounds and recreational centers as it furnishes to the white schools and white children of the State. Every appropriation made by the Congress of the United States and every appropriation made by every State in the Union for educational purposes should be fairly and equitably distributed among the schools of the State without regard to race or color.

SEGREGATION IN THE ARMED FORCES

I am opposed to H. R. 4952, which is designed to prevent segregation of the races in the armed forces. I understand from newspaper reports that General Bradley, Chief of Staff of the United States Army, a man who has had many years of experience in military affairs, and one who was the Field Commander of American troops in Europe during World War II; and who helped to lead and direct our armed forces on the bloody battlefields of French Morocco, Tunisia, France, and Germany, is in favor of segregation in the American armed forces. Surely, the opinion of a man of his military training and his personal experience in leading and directing our military forces in World War II should carry great weight with the Members of this Congress and with the American people generally. I prefer to trust his judgment upon the subject of segregation in the armed forces of America. I believe segregation in the military forces is best for the Negro soldier. What opportunities would a Negro "buck private" have for advancing his rank or grade in a company made up three-fourths of white soldiers and one-fourth of colored soldiers? Would not his opportunities for advancement be much greater in a company made up entirely of Negro soldiers? If segregation in the armed forces can be called discrimination, would it not be discrimination in favor of rather than against the Negro soldier? I think that segregation is best for the Negro soldier in the American armed forces.

POLL TAXES

While I recognize the legal rights of every State in the Union, through its legislative department, to prescribe the qualifications of voters in all State, district, county, and municipal elections, however, I am opposed to the poll-tax laws of the South. While the poll-tax laws of the South require the same qualifications of all voters without regard to race or color, I cannot escape the conviction that such laws were enacted for the sole purpose of preventing a large percentage of the Negroes of the South from voting in all elections. And since there are only seven States in the Union which have poll-tax laws and they are all in the South, and the Senators and Members of the House of Representatives from each of these States are bitterly opposed to the enactment of H. R. 29, this, to some degree, strengthens my belief that one of the main purposes of such laws is the discouragement of Negro voting in such States.

No American citizen should be deprived of the right of suffrage on the ground of illiteracy, poverty, or inability to pay a poll tax. In view of article I, section 2, of the Federal Constitution, which is as follows:

> The House of Representatives shall be composed of Members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature.

There may be some room for doubt as to the constitutional authority of the Congress of the United States to prescribe the qualifications of voters in national elections such as the election of President, Vice President, electors for President and Vice President, United States Senators, and Members of the House of Representatives. However, I am inclined to resolve this doubt in favor of H. R. 29, an act making unlawful the requirement for the payment of a poll tax as a prerequisite to voting in a primary or other election for national officers.

ANTILYNCHING

Lynching is only one of the many ways of committing murder, and murder is a violation of the laws of God as well as the laws of man, whether it is committed by one person alone or by two or more persons acting together.

I am opposed to H. R. 5763, a Federal Antilynching Act. In the first place, I seriously doubt the Congress having constitutional authority for making such crimes a Federal violation. However, if I am in error about this then why should Congress single out this one way of committing murder or attempting to commit murder and make it a Federal violation. If Congress can legally make murder by lynching or an attempt to murder by lynching a Federal violation might it not make all crimes when committed by two or more persons acting together a Federal violation? Under section 2 of H. R. 5763 if two or more persons acting together actually lynch another, thereby producing his death, their punishment for such crime is fixed at "a fine not exceeding $10,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding 20 years, or by both such fine and imprisonment." If such two persons were indicted, tried, and convicted under the laws of any State of the Union the punishment would be fixed at life imprisonment and in most States, I believe, they might be given the death penalty for such crime. If the Congress has legal authority to enact such legislation, then, by the same reasoning, might not the Congress make rape, robbery, horse stealing, grand larency, and, in fact, all other crimes Federal violations. Naturally, then, in that case the Federal courts and the State courts would have concurrent jurisdiction over all crimes, and then one could be punished twice for the same act, one time by the Federal courts and one time by the State courts.

Moreover, I do not believe that there is any need for the legislation proposed in this antilynching bill. Undoubtedly, the purpose of this act is to prevent mob violence. In other words, to prevent murder by mob violence. The record shows that there were 115 persons lynched in the United States in 1900. The next highest number in 1 year was 76 in 1910. The next highest number was 61 in 1920. The next highest number was 21 in 1930. The next highest number was six in 1946. In 1947 there was only one lynching in the United States. The above figures show that mob violence has been on the decline for many years, while many other crimes, and in fact, most other crimes have increased during the same period of time.

In conclusion, permit me to say that I am a Republican in politics, and, for the most part, believe in the principles enunciated by the Republican Party, but when it comes to the enactment of laws for the good of the American people, then I am an American first, and as a Member of Congress I will not and would not support any proposed legislation that seeks political advantage of one party over another. In such cases I prefer to let my own conscience be my guide.

Vicious Subsidies

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARVE TIBBOTT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. TIBBOTT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an editorial from Simpson's Daily Leader Times, Kittanning, Pa.:

VICIOUS SUBSIDIES

The support of agricultural products prices is worthy of comment. The 1948 potato crop has cost thus far this year the taxpayers $16,000,000 and bids fair to cost them more by the end of the year.

The surpluses are bought at an average price of $1.55 per bushel. Probably the total sales will be twice this sum by the end of the year. In 1946 it cost the Government $93,000,000 to maintain the parity, whatever that is, for potatoes alone.

What has the Government done with the potatoes? Some they permitted to rot, some they sold at the remarkable price of 1 cent a hundredweight for livestock feed. In many instances the prices received by the Government did not pay the shipping bill and this added to the loss.

What would the farmers say if the Government gave producers of clothing, for example, a price beyond reason and made the taxpayers pay for it? The tax is only part of the story, for the consumer must pay higher prices for the product than the production warrants.

This is only one example of the vicious subsidies that can be traced to the New Deal. The money cost is heavy and contributes greatly ot the high cost of living that Mr. Truman is so worried about.

But beyond that is the growing dependence upon the State that will issue into totalitarianism unless stopped. Dependence develops, acquiescence develops despotism. The road is before the Government.

The potatoes are cited as one example that may be increased by dozens in products, wages, and unnecessary governmental jobs. Yes, the high cost of living should be attacked. Here is a place to begin.

Proclaim Liberty Throughout All the Land Unto All the Inhabitants Thereof

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HELEN GAHAGAN DOUGLAS
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 27, 1948

Mrs. DOUGLAS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me at the recent Democratic National Convention on July 13, 1948:

Once again on a hot July day—172 years after the Declaration of Independence—Americans are gathered in Philadelphia to proclaim liberty throughout all the land unto all the inhabitants thereof. The great body of human rights announced in the preamble lives on, more precious and needed today than in 1776.

This is the first convention of the Democratic Party in the atomic age. The impact of atomic energy on an unsettled world gives supreme importance to the decisions which we make. We must seek our decisions with new earnestness and new consecration.

A national convention is the very heart of our political life. It is the crossroads where free people decide which way they will go—how they will write their history.

Millions of Americans are watching this convention. They await not only our choice of candidates for President and Vice President—not only the reading of the Democratic platform—they wait to learn whether the Democratic Party is still the people's party, a vigorous and dynamic force aware of the total needs of men and aware of the terrible responsibility of government in July 1948.

Three weeks ago in this very hall the Republican National Convention met. At a time when the people of the United States—and, indeed, of all the world—had a right to expect statesmanship of the highest caliber, just what did the Republican convention do?

For five sweltering summer days it danced on the grave of a dead President.

The opposition would have us believe that the dominant figure at their recent convention was their Presidential nominee; in fact, they would like to believe that themselves. The dominant figure of that convention was Franklin Delano Roosevelt, and the American people know it.

For five interminable uncomfortable days, with the temperature hovering near the 100 mark, they shivered in the fear that the philosophy of Franklin Delano Roosevelt still lives in the hearts of the American people.

Their fear was well founded. The spirit of Franklin Roosevelt does live. It lives in our hearts tonight. He lives in the hearts of men and women everywhere because he loved people, because he had faith in people and believed in their future, because he worked to fulfill the needs of people.

And because Franklin Roosevelt really believed in the brotherhood of man he stands today as a symbol of the goal men seek.

It will take more than convention double talk to obscure the onslaught of the Republican Party in the Eightieth Congress against the progressive, democratic program of the last decade.

It will take more than convention double talk to make the people forget that the Republican Eightieth Congress did nothing about education, health, housing, the cost of food—the things that make America tick.

The record of the Eightieth Congress shows that the Republicans would destroy the advances we have made. We must go forward—not backward.

The New Deal met the problems and the needs of the thirties. As we approach the fifties, it is in no way adequate. We must go further, much further to new goals of human happiness and well-being. President Roosevelt realized this when he drafted his economic bill of rights in 1944.

We must now secure an economic bill of rights.

This century must concern itself with the welfare of the individual. If we are going to defeat communism, or any other form of totalitarianism, and help lead the way toward a free and democratic society of nations, democracy must offer man not only political freedom but economic security—jobs, homes, and the right to raise families without fear.

The entire effort of this age must be the use of material resources for the enlargement of man's total need and whole personality.

Our resources of coal, steel, and power are all means to an end. They are not ends in themselves. They are tools by which we hope to realize the full potential of human beings.

To think of material things as ends in themselves is to make one of the tragic mistakes that the Communists make—the reduction of life to a grossly materialistic level in which the spirit, the imagination, the full play of personality, the creativeness of man are smothered and betrayed.

To identify democracy solely as a system of economic practices is an insult to America. Democracy is an idea concerning people—their dignity and their worth.

We must set the example of freedom and economic security at home before it can be achieved in the world.

America must retain leadership or accept isolation from the rest of the world—and, as a result of isolation, inevitable economic collapse and war.

Only through the Democratic Party can we hope to realize the kind of forward-looking program that must be sought—and only through the Democratic Party if it be militantly progressive—bringing new ideas, new plans to the new age piled high with perplexities and problems, but limitless in its possibility and opportunity.

The Republican Party, for all its protestations, would go back to pre-New Deal days—back to the jungle warfare of the twenties.

Their concern is not for the enlargement of human dignity, the development of man's personality, the growth of human security. Their concern is with the highest profit level, regardless of what human values may be at stake.

That's why, even on the very eve of a Presidential campaign, the Republican leadership in the Eightieth Congress dared to kill the long-range housing program.

They fail to understand what a home means in terms of democratic living. They are indifferent to the fact that slums corrupt the mind and spirit; breed divorce, delinquency, and disease and—in terms of hard, cold cash—are paid for by bigger jails, reform schools for children, bursting county hospital wards and mental institutions.

The fact that 15,000,000 American families need homes is no threat to democracy—measured by Republican standards.

No wonder that the greatest piece of social legislation ever to be passed—a program that was designed to free people of the fear of sickness, of the fear of unemployment, of the fears that beset old age—was the target for attack in the Eightieth Congress.

No wonder employment-tax rates were frozen in an effort to forestall their need for adequate social-security benefits to meet the increased cost of living.

No wonder that, in complete disregard of their 1944 platform pledge to extend social security, Republicans took almost a million people out from under the protection of the social-security program.

No wonder they cut back the farm-conservation program.

No wonder they attacked and undermined the public-power program—sabotaging the TVA, Grand Coulee, Bonneville Flats, Big Thompson, and the Central Valley in my own State of California—selling out the people's interests to the private utilities.

There was nothing wrong about that—measured in Republican terms.

Of course, the Republicans don't go so far as to boast about their record in reclamation and public power, especially in the far West.

But when it comes to their tax and antilabor bills, that's a different matter.

They are proud of their tax and antilabor legislation.

These measures do indeed stand as a monument to the work of the Eightieth Congress: A Knutson tax law which lifted the burden of our war debt from the shoulders of those enjoying the highest profits in history onto the backs of the veterans, the laborers, the teachers, the pensioners—all those who are scraping the bottom of the barrel now to pay for rent, bread, meat, milk—the necessities of life; a Taft-Hartley antilabor law which seeks to deprive labor of the right to bargain collectively, speak freely, and organize politically.

The Knutson tax law and the Taft-Hartley antilabor law, passed over a Presidential veto, clearly define the basic differences between the Republican and Democratic programs. The Republican Party puts corporations first and the Democratic Party puts people first.

I do not question the sincerity of the Republican Party. I challenge its judgment and its understanding of what it takes to make democratic society work.

While the Republicans were spending the last 2 years figuring out ways to cut taxes for the rich and ways to gag the mouth of labor, inflation was engulfing our entire economy.

I tell you, the housewife is frightened today when she sits down to plan her weekly budget.

We can measure the success or failure of our economic policies by what a dollar bill will buy in the corner grocery store to fill the housewife's market basket. Whether a mother can feed her family without mortgaging their future is a matter of first concern.

One doesn't have to be an economist to know that the more bloated we allow our economy to become, the more drastic the remedies will have to be. To allow prices to continue to rise unchecked until our economy cracks open will be ruinous for everyone.

Even measured by the Republican yardstick, the refusal to meet squarely the issue of inflation in the Eightieth Congress is beyond comprehension.

What if people's savings are being dried up? What if the consumer is in hock to banks, stores, and loan companies to the tune of more than $13,500,000,000—almost double the crushing debt of 1929 that pulled the plug of American purchasing power and toppled us into depression?

Are not profits at the highest point in history and are they not still rising?

What if every insurance policy, bond, and pension is worth one-third less in purchasing power than it was in 1946?

What if ground round steak is a dollar a pound? What if the price of fruits and vegetables doubled in the last year?

What if 60 percent of our families in cities earn less than what is needed for an adequate and balanced diet—a decent and acceptable standard of living?

Here at last we have full peacetime employment and it turns into a mockery because people are being driven deeper and deeper into debt. But the big corporations are not going into the red—so there was no cause for alarm.

Corporate profits were $9,000,000,000 in 1945, $16,000,000,000 in 1946, and $18,000,000,000 in 1947—even after taxes and after wage increases were paid. And are not profits still going higher?

What is wrong with that? What if the threat of malnutrition does hang over the heads of a whole generation of our children?

What if the housewife has to pay 50 percent more to feed her family today than she did 2 years ago when this Republican Congress took over?

To do anything about prices would have been "socialistic." The National Association of Manufacturers and the Republican leadership—in and out of Congress—told us so time and time again. Canada, of course, restored price controls when she saw her food prices getting out of hand, with the result that Canadians today pay half as much for their meat as we do and 10 to 15 to 20 cents less per item for their other foods—including Canadian bacon.

But the Republicans are for rugged individualism even if it costs the consumer billions of dollars—his health and peace of mind; even if it brings collapse to our own economy; even if it threatens our entire international program.

For what happens at home directly affects what happens in the rest of the world. As our prices go up, we not only pay more for food, clothes, machines, services, and raw materials we need, but the countries who buy in our markets pay more, too.

When loans are made to other countries each timetable for reconstruction is thrown off schedule because we have allowed our own economy to run away with us.

Between the time the loan is granted and the time purchases are made in this country, each dollar buys less than had been counted on, while at the same time we are telling these countries to stabilize their own currencies. So we see that the success of our foreign policy is dependent upon the health of our domestic economy.

Because I am a mother I think of the market basket at home and abroad in terms of the health of growing children.

Because I am a woman I measure inflation not only in terms of dollars and cents but in terms of human lives.

During the next 4 months many trumped-up excuses will be given for failure to stop the rising cost of the market basket. Most of these excuses will be coming from isolationists. Isolationism and inflation go hand in hand.

The people who are again ready to parade moldy isolationism are the same people whose economic philosophy is now picking the pockets of every housewife in America.

The vast majority of American people have turned their backs on isolationism.

We not only believe in the United Nations but we know that the idea of the United Nations is the greatest concept that man has ever had.

We know that the Charter of the United Nations, following our own Constitution, sets a new goal—this time for the peoples of the world.

We know that we must give to this infant organization the understanding and support future generations demand.

We know that we must work cooperatively with other nations if we are ever to solve the basic problems of atomic energy and the reduction of armaments and the rebuilding of world trade.

We know that, as the richest and greatest creditor nation, we must bear our burden of the cost of putting devastated nations on their feet.

We want to contribute our knowledge and skill to the end that men can live and work together in freedom.

But the fact remains that there are those in Congress who are still isolationists. They happen to be the leaders of the House of Representatives. They happen to be heads of the most powerful committees. They happen to be Republicans.

We invited the United Nations to make its home in the United States. Over a year ago, the United States signed an agreement to lend the United Nations the money to build a permanent home. At the direction of the Republican leadership, the bill authorizing the United Nations' loan was not permitted to come to the floor of the House for a vote.

At the direction of this same Republican leadership, $2,000,000,000 were cut from the vital European Recovery program.

When the Reciprocal Trade Act, which is the keystone of our foreign economic policy, came up for renewal, the Republican leadership introduced a substitute bill which would have halted the rebuilding of world trade. Only 3 out of 51 Republican Senators and only 15 out of 245 Republican Congressmen voted to continue our reciprocal trade agreements program intact.

After thousands of protests, important changes were made in the Senate and the trade act was renewed, but only for a single year instead of the usual three which are essential. Why? An ominous threat of the Grundy high-tariff policy now hangs over all our international trade negotiations.

And, at the direction of the Republican leadership, a displaced persons bill was finally passed following the worst Nazi tradition of anti-Semitism.

Republicans cut down to a beggardly 6,000 the quota of Jews to be admitted among the 200,000 displaced persons, while at the same time they invited into the United States under the German and Austrian immigration quotas nearly 30,000 ethnic Germans—Volkdeutsche.

Who are the Volkdeutsche? They were Hitler's fifth columns. They were the Germans who lived in the countries surrounding Germany and who were driven back into Germany after we won the war.

Then the Republicans proceeded to take away from the Jews they had condemned to remain in the stinking DP camps of Germany the pathetically small extra calories they had been allotted over the German ration because they had been hungry longer than their German persecutors.

Mr. TABER, the Republican chairman of the Appropriations Committee, said on the floor of the House: "Unless that is done, it is absolutely impossible ever to get these people out of these camps." He did not specify where in heaven's name these miserable remnants of Hitler's sadism were to go.

We are the Nation which chiseled on our Statue of Liberty these words:

"Give me your tired, your poor,
Your huddled masses yearning to breathe free;
Send these, the homeless, tempest-tossed, to me;
I lift my lamp beside the golden door."

In sharp contrast to the thinking that went into the writing of the displaced persons' bill, we have the President's program on civil rights, which will stand as one of the great historic documents in the democratic life of this Nation.

In order to make these rights a reality for every citizen, it is now up to the American people to elect men and women who will vote for them.

There has been much talk of bipartisan foreign policy in which the Democrats and Republicans have cooperated.

This policy has worked—where it has worked—because a minority of the Republicans in Congress have been willing to go along with an almost solid bloc of Democrats in support of the policies we endorse as a people.

This small group of more internationally-minded Republicans is now asking the country to believe that if the administration of all foreign policy is turned over to the Republican Party, they will continue the basic direction of our foreign policy.

How can they?

What will they do with the majority of their own party while they accomplish this miracle? The greater the Republican majority, the greater the power of the Republican leadership in Congress which has again and again shown its isolationist bias.

Only the fact that the Republican Eightieth Congress had as many Democrats as it did saved the bipartisan foreign policy from going on the rocks.

I see the very real danger that we may be wooed back into isolationist patterns of thought and action before we realize what has happened to us.

We cannot have peace by simply writing it into a party platform.

We must stay with it, not just 1 year, but until we have won this battle for survival.

How we as a people are oriented is more important than how we are organized. The test of every economic and social measure should be: Will it make for healthy communities and good people?

The test of every international program must be whether or not it is in the old pattern of expansion or in the new pattern of equilibrium.

It is not enough that men work. Man is not a commodity. Man has a mind and a heart, and we must consider both if we are to preserve free institutions. Representative government is being tested as never before.

It is not enough for us to do all that is possible. We must do that which is impossible.

We cannot turn our backs on man's last hope for peace.

We must work for the unity and effective brotherhood of man without waiting for another war to prove that the current pursuit of power, profit, and all manner of material things is treason to humanity—treason and national suicide.

The fundamental issue today is the same as it was in the days of Thomas Jefferson—the same as it was 16 years ago when the Democratic victory of people over privilege was led by the greatest leader of them all, Franklin D. Roosevelt—the same as it was when the courageous and fearless stand of Andrew Jackson guided a young nation up the road to a great destiny.

As a living memorial to the man who believed that a Nation's wealth is its people, let us rededicate ourselves to the service of the people. In the name of Franklin Delano Roosevelt let us renew our efforts to achieve the peace all men seek and the freedom every man deserves.

Let us truly "proclaim liberty throughout all the land unto all the inhabitants thereof."

Many Among the DP's in the European Camps Are Nazi Collaborationists

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. ARTHUR G. KLEIN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 2, 1948

Mr. KLEIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave, I am introducing into the RECORD a further portion of the article by Mr. Abraham G. Duker on the need of screening immigrants to the United States.

An adequate investigation of the Nazi records and other sources as well as a most stringent screening process are essential for America's protection against these subversive elements.

The study on the need for screening displaced persons applying for entry into the United States by Abraham G. Duker proves on the basis of the Nuremberg trials materials that many of the DP's voluntarily served in the German armies and participated in the wanton killing of helpless men, women, and children.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, you will agree that the Justice and State Departments should investigate, and the surviving victims of the atrocities should be called to testify, and all such suspects should be rigorously examined.

It is pertinent to note, Mr. Speaker, that Abraham G. Duker, at the present time a research consultant at the Training Bureau for Jewish Communal Service, has a background which qualifies him as an expert in this field. Born in Poland, Mr. Duker came to this country in 1923; took his bachelor of arts degree at the College of the City of New York in 1930; did graduate work at Columbia University; and was first editor of the Contemporary Jewish Record, now published as Commentary, and editor of the research institute for peace and postwar problems of the American Jewish Committee.

In the United States Army he was a political analyst with the Office of Strategic Services and subsequently served with the United States Chief of Staff, Prosecution of Axis Criminality. He is author of The Situation of the Jews in Poland, Jewish Survival in the World Today, and other books; coauthor of Jews in the Postwar World; on the editorial board of several publications; instructor in modern Jewish history at the Seminary School for Jewish Studies and at the School of Religious Education of the Hebrew Union College.

THEY HELPED TO KILL 434,329 PERSONS

Document L-18, June 30, 1943, an official report on the extermination of 434,329 Jews (a fact frankly proclaimed in the report), states:

"Owing to the great number of Jews and the vast area to be combed out, these actions were performed with the assistance of detachments from the security police, order police, Gendarmerie, and the Ukrainian police, all acting together in numerous single sweeps."

The Ukrainians were equally helpful in rounding up partisans. States the same report:

"The place of communication in the woods near Brody having been discovered by interrogations, the whole of the forest area was surrounded and combed out by detachments of Gendarmerie and Ukrainian police."

In Document 3257-PS, December 2, 1941, a German officer described an action as follows:

"It was done entirely in public with the use of the Ukrainian Militia, and unfortunately in many instances with members of the armed forces taking part voluntarily. * * * The way these actions which included men and old men, women, and children of all ages were carried out was horrible. The great masses executed make this action more gigantic than any similar measure taken so far in the Soviet Union."

A GERMAN TESTIFIES

One of the most gruesome and graphic descriptions of the massacre of the Jews is contained in an affidavit (Doc. 2992-PS) by the German engineer, Hermann Friedrich Graebe, who witnessed the outdoor mass-executions in the Ukrainian towns Rowno (July 13, 1942) and Dubno (October 5, 1942). Graebe's affidavit was quoted by Justice Jackson, the chief British prosecutor, Sir Hartley Shawcross, by the tribunal, and by the Presiding Justice Lawrence at a meeting in London. As in the hundreds of other towns and villages, in Dubno and Rowno also it is the Ukrainians who guided the SS men, searched the ghettos, beat the people, assembled and drove them to the places of slaughter. Graebe writes in regard to Rowno:

"Shortly after 22:00 the ghetto was encircled by a large SS detachment and about three times as many members of the Ukrainian Militia."

It is not proposed to recount here Graebe's narrative of the orgy of blood and torment that followed; the document is available to all who are interested in the human qualities of these political refugees. With respect to the massacre in Dubno, Graebe relates:

"Armed Ukrainian militia drove the people off the trucks under the supervision of an SS man. The militia acted as guards on the trucks and drove them to the pits."

Interested readers are again referred to Graebe's text on the proceeding at the pits, which so aroused Justice Jackson, Sir Hartley Shawcross, and Justice Lawrence. (192).

A Jewish survivor of that town also cites that date as the day on which the ghetto was liquidated. His words follow (this is my only citation from a Jewish source and is used merely to corroborate a non-Nazi German's affidavit about an identical event):

"Came 5 October, 1942, the day of the sorrowful end of the remaining Jews in the Ghetto. * * * The last action was similar to the earlier actions. It was carried out exclusively by Ukrainians, who, acting as German messengers, proceeded singing and joyous from town to town and liquidated the ghettos."

Document 3047-PS, 24 October, 1941, is an account, by Master Sergeant Soennecken, of the massacre of 8,000 Jews in the Ukrainian town Borysow on 19-20 October. Soennecken, incidentally, refers to Russians, but he clearly means Ukrainians. (Rosenberg had indeed complained that many Germans tend to confound the two national groups and mistreat them alike).

"Upon arrival there on Friday I was informed by the head of the Russian security police there, Ehof, who had been installed in his post some time ago by the SD, that on the night from Sunday to Monday all Jews of Borrisow were to be shot. (Incidentally, Ehof was, according to Soennekken, the former Communist mayor of the town.) To my astounded question that it would be impossible to dispatch 8,000 persons into eternity in the course of a single night in a fairly orderly manner, he replied that it was not the first time that he did this and that he would be able to finish the job with his men; he was no longer a layman at this. * * *

The shootings were begun at 3 a. m. First the men were brought out. They were driven to the place of execution in Russian cars, escorted by men of the Russian security police who were detailed for this purpose. Because there were not enough of these men, however, reinforcements were brought in from the neighboring Russian security police offices, such as Zembin, etc. They were provided with the well-known red and white armbands and armed with rifles and automatic pistols. On the Poletzkaia Ulitsa road leading to the airport I saw these cars, at considerable intervals loaded with women and children. These cars were guarded by men of the Russian security police. * * *

"The first contingent, about 20 men, were made to jump into the pits after taking off all but their underwear. They were then shot from above. Of course these dead and half-dead people were lying pell-mell. The next victims had to line them up so as to gain as much space as possible. Then it continued as above. When the bottom row of the mass grave was full, the Jews had to put a layer of sand over the bodies and had to trample upon both sand and bodies. The most horrible scenes are said to have taken place in these mass graves. Shortly before my departure to the front I met two German soldiers, a pfc. and a corporal, who, from curiosity, had witnessed these executions from very close by. They fully confirmed the information sought by me. They added that the Russian policemen were given a great deal of liquor, otherwise they would hardly have been able to perform their difficult task."

Soennecken refers to a gay party that took place on the eve of the executions at which were present the mayor, Dr. Stankewicz, the assistant chief, Kowalewski, and "a large number of security policemen and their wives, fiancées, or girl friends."

No doubt every one of them now bears a new name, passes off as a martyr of Soviet oppression, and answers to all the specifications of a "political refugee."

The story of Borysow was enacted in every one of the hundreds of towns of the Ukraine. And when the Jews were no more, the same present-day martyrs were used to hound partisans, recruit forced laborers, confiscate property, supervise labor gangs, operate the crematoria.

MATERIAL AWARDS

A different type of quislings received their awards in terms of jobs and property. They, too, were recruited among the Lithuanians, Ukrainians, and White Russians. Document Ec. 336, a memorandum by Rosenberg, November 26, 1942, on the treatment of Poles, instructed the Nazi administrators in Poland to take care that "in particular, mayors, district and region chiefs of Polish nationality or pro-Polish leaders of larger industrial plants and estates will be dismissed and replaced by members of other nationalities (Lithuanians, White Russians, Ukrainians)." * * * The Polish school system will not be developed and extended beyond 4 years of primary school. * * * The Polish language is to be used only in those localities which have an undisputed Polish majority. It must neither be put on the same level nor be preferred to the use of Lithuanian, White Ruthenian, or Ukrainian."

By Erich Koch's decree of September 7, 1942, the Ukrainians—"former officials and officers of the Ukraine" (meaning former Communist officials, as this area had been under the Soviets since 1920)—were placed in charge of assembling and administering all Jewish property "now without proprietor" (i. e., after they had been exterminated).

The Ukrainians were equally helpful in rounding up partisans. Document L-18, cited above, relates:

"The place of communication in the woods near Brody having been discovered by interrogations, the whole of the forest area was surrounded and combed out by detachments of gendarmerie and Ukrainian police."

The partisans operating in the Ukraine suffered not only from the collaborationist militia, who numbered tens of thousands—but also from the Bandera and Melnyk nationalist gangs operating in the woods. These gangs, as has been indicated, had a Fascist ideology and cooperated at first with the Nazis. Only when the Nazis definitely refused to establish an autonomous Ukraine, by 1943, did they cease cooperating, but at the same time they continued to kill Jews and pro-Allied partisans. These gangs were joined also by Ukrainians who were being rounded up for forced labor after the Jews had been exterminated. (In the early period of the Nazi occupation the Ukrainians shared with the Balts, Rumanian, French the privilege of being voluntary laborers.) Members of the former Bandera and Melnyk gangs are also in the western zones, thousands of them, and are now considered bona fide "political refugees."

STATISTICS OF THE WARSAW GHETTO REVOLT

The infamous report on the crushing of the Warsaw Ghetto (1061-PS), which created a stir in Nuremberg when it was made public, gives the number of participating troops as 2,090, and of these 704 are Poles, Ukrainians, and Balts. The following figures of participants in 3 days' operations illustrate to what an extent the crushing of the Ghetto was performed by the newly fangled "political refugees."

April 27, 1943:

"Our strength: From 0700 to 1900 hours—288 German police, 200 Trawniki, 140 Polish police.

"May 4, 1943: Day—German police, 2 officers, 87 men; Waffen SS, 25 men; Trawniki, 200 men; Polish police, 1 officer, 180 men.

"May 13, 1943: Day—German police, 2 officers, 137 men; Trawniki, 270 men; Polish police, 1 officer, 160 men. (Trawniki are mixed collaborationist elements, mostly Balts.)

COLLABORATIONISTS INCORPORATED IN SS

The Baltic and Ukrainian collaborationists proved so loyal to their Nazi masters that the latter incorporated them in the elite corps, in the SS. For a non-German to qualify for membership in the SS, he would need to have proved his total loyalty to Himmler, in short, to be a superkiller. An isolated report (1137-PS, October 19, 1944) lists the following SS attached solely to the air force: 1,383 Russian SS; 5,953 Ukrainian SS; 2,354 White Ruthenian SS; and 1,012 Lithuanian SS auxiliaries. The report adds:

'Ukrainian, Russian, White Ruthenian, and Lithuanian SS were employed from the beginning in the Reich."

Document 309-PS refers to 250 selected Ukrainian SS auxiliaries noncommissioned officers candidates, which had just joined the Galician infantry division after 8 weeks' training.

So pleased were the Nazis with the accomplishments of the collaborationist SS formations that Hans Frank appealed to Hitler to permit him to recruit the politically much calmer Poles of western Galicia in order to establish units similar to the Waffen SS division Galicia created for the Ukrainians (437-PS, p. 15).

In document L-172, in the portion containing materials for the lecture of the chief of the general staff of the armed forces (West) to the Reich, November 7, 1942, the following statement is made in connection with recruiting the collaborationist Red Army Vlassov's, Cossack, and Turkmen divisions. "At the moment, the Reichsfuehrer of the SS is engaged in draining the defensive resources of Estonia and Latvia as well as the Croatian, Moslem, and Macedonian manpower supplies."

The SS were wholly a volunteer corps. Collaborationist SS could attain this rank only after they had proven by deed their total devotion to nazism. In declaring the SS a criminal organization, after reciting the multitude and variety of crimes which this group perpetrated, the International Military Tribunal declared its judgment: "It is impossible to single out any portion of the SS which was not involved in these criminal activities."

COLLABORATIONISTS ACTIVE IN EXTERMINATION CAMPS

Large numbers of collaborationists—SS and others—were assigned to the various extermination camps as guards and tormentors. Rudolf Hoess, the commandant of Auschwitz from May 1940 to December 1943, during which period, on his own admission, 3,000,000 persons were exterminated there, testified at Nuremberg on April 15, 1946:

"We had thousands of guards who could hardly speak German, who came * * * as volunteers and joined these units."

In describing the operations at Treblinka, the largest extermination camp after Auschwitz, SS Dr. Kurt Gerstein relates that as the transports arrived—

"Two hundred Ukrainians tear the doors open and drive the people out of the cars with whips." (Doc. 2170-PS).

The Nazis, as has been indicated, were few, widely distributed, stationed almost entirely in the towns and lost in the maze of villages. To carry out the confiscations, requisitions, recruitment for forced labor, the Nazis used a large force of collaborationists, made of local residents, without whom these tasks could not have been carried out. In Document 2008, August 27, 1943, a German Lieutenant, Adolf Aumann, describes the brutality with which the Ukrainian militia assembled and transported forced laborers to Germany (the Jews had already been exterminated in 1943). He commented that such treatment "is not good propaganda for the Germans in the Ukraine."

Yet these brutalities were carried out by local Ukrainians.

Housing at Grass Roots

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JACOB K. JAVITS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, the pinch of housing at the grass roots is what should count in our consideration of housing legislation. The following revealing letter from a housewife, married to a disabled Navy veteran, struggling under terrible conditions with the housing problem should be of interest to every Member. Housing legislation to count must be comprehensive and must afford adequate housing for families such as this which cannot afford to pay over $50 a month rent. The Taft-Ellender-Wagner comprehensive housing bill remains the only approach to a solution of this problem which is before the Congress.

JULY 19, 1948.

Hon. JACOB K. JAVITS,

House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: We have tried everything in the past 3 years to find housing but we are still residing with my husband's family. Let me explain more in detail. To begin with, let me list the factors which make me feel certain we should qualify for housing.

My husband is a disabled Navy veteran and receives a pension. He is employed on an on-the-job training job under Public Law 16. I am also an ex-SPAR. We have never lived by ourselves since our marriage almost 3 years ago. We have an 18 months old child. The apartment where we live consists of four rooms, kitchen inclusive. My husband, myself, and child share a small bedroom. To say we are crowded is putting it mildly. My father- and mother-in-law share another room and my husband's brother, an ex-marine, has a makeshift bed in the living room. He is rightfully entitled to our room but as conditions are nothing can be done. The crowded conditions and the baby have aggravated things. Due to our prolonged stay my husband's folks would like us to move but because of the baby they have not done anything drastic. In the past, conditions have become so unbearable that I was forced to take the baby and move with my family in Detroit. After a month passed I returned under the condition that we strive to find a place but to no avail. My husband's disability is of the nature which requires peace of mind and a minimum of excitement. He certainly has not followed these rules and consequently he has had several recurrences of attacks. These statements can be verified by his disability award and the doctor where he reports for reexamination. To add to our troubles we live on the fifth floor and it is a walk-up and it is very difficult to carry the child up and down. I must add that the arguments and differences which have occurred between us probably are justified on both sides. Maybe if I were in my husband's folks place I would feel as they do and vice versa, however, I am convinced it is impossible for two families to live together and get along. So the above are the reasons I believe our case should be classified serious enough to warrant placement.

Now, I will state what we have done to try and remedy our situation. We are listed with the New York City Housing Authority and have applications at numerous projects. Everytime we even read about a proposed city project we go to apply. One answer to an inquiry I wrote to a project dates back to 1946. The City Housing Authority must have very rigid rules for qualification, evidently they do not consider our case serious enough for housing. In the past I have written to them explaining our plight even to our living apart but nothing was done. I was told at one project that if we had a roof over our heads to consider ourselves lucky. It is an easy enough statement for someone not sharing these circumstances to make. I have pleaded with New York City Housing Authority to tell us what qualifications we lack if any. In the Amsterdam and Jacob Riis houses a very low income ceiling is in existence, therefore we are out of the income bracket because the combination of my husband's salary, pension and subsistence would bring us over their maximum allowance. The Marcy houses in Brooklyn, however, have a more liberal ceiling and we would be eligible on an income basis there I am sure. The last I heard from them was an acknowledgment of application and told that we would hear from them if we were acceptable, that was in May.

It is my belief that we deserve a place to live after going through a war to help keep this country free. We certainly aren't asking too much to be placed in quarters. So far I would consider our 3 years of marriage merely existing, not living. I know our stay with my husband's family has been detrimental to our marriage. I feel so sure that we are eligible for housing and I have some very ugly thoughts concerning the New York City housing authorities' method of placement.

As far as private housing is concerned we cannot afford to pay over $50 a month rent and even that amount would require a struggle. We certainly cannot afford a bonus so we are out of luck on that score.

We would appreciate anything at all you could do for us. We really are badly in need of housing facilities please help us.

I remain,

Mrs. B. J. B.

NEW YORK, N. Y.

Federal Civilian Employment

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. ALBERT W. HAWKES

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. HAWKES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement prepared by Mr. Alvin A. Burger, well-known economist and research director for the Association of State Chambers of Commerce throughout the United States, on the subject, Federal Civilian Employment Keeps Going Up.

I think every representative of the people who is interested in curtailing Government expenses and the elimination of waste in the Government should read this short synopsis of points which have been brought to the attention of the Congress by the distinguished senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD].

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FEDERAL CIVILIAN EMPLOYMENT KEEPS GOING UP

Despite repeated disclosures of waste of manpower by the Federal Government over a long period of time, and despite occasional avowals and attempts by congressional committees to do something about it, Federal civilian employment is increasing at the rate of nearly 500 persons a day. (We are talking about civilian employees only—not enlistments in the armed services.)

In December there were 1,995,388 civilian employees on the Federal pay rolls. By the end of May there were 2,066,285.[1] By the end of July the 2,100,000 mark will be reached and probably passed.

This is an increase of about 105,000 in 7 months.

The recruitment of new Government employees will not end this month, or the next, or the next. In fact, Congress-approved appropriations for the coming fiscal year will permit the executive branch to expand Uncle Sam's civilian pay roll army to a possible peak of 2,250,000 between now and June 30, 1949.

This upward trend will continue as indicated unless Congress takes drastic action immediately to bring it to an end.

But if the returning Eightieth Congress decides during the coming weeks to enact public housing, Federal-school aid, price control, and other new domestic spending legislation sought by the President and advocated by so-called liberal elements in both political parties, the present 500-a-day increase in Federal employment will not only not be curbed but will be accelerated.

SENATOR BYRD OFFERS SOME FACTS

Senator HARRY F. BYRD (Democrat, Virginia), chairman of the Joint Committee on Reduction of Nonessential Federal Expenditures, and a recognized authority in Congress on the Federal personnel picture, recently published a comprehensive report on which many arresting facts are set forth. Here are some:

The total number of civilians now employed by the Federal Government is more than twice the number employed at the peak of World War I.

It is more than three and a half times the total of 563,805 employed in 1932 (a figure which was criticized as too high at the time by Presidential candidate Franklin D. Roosevelt, who promised to reduce it by 25 percent).

It is more than twice the total of 926,415 civilians employed in 1939, just prior to the World War II emergency.

In the civilian or peacetime agencies exclusive of the Military Establishment, civilian employment is now more than 80,000 greater than it was at the end of the World War II peak, and more than 165 percent of the peak prior to the war emergency in 1939.

The Military Establishment (Army, Navy, and Air Force) is employing three times as many civilians per man in uniform as it was at the World War II peak.

At average pay of $3,340 per employee, Federal pay-roll expenditures will exceed $7,000,000,000 in the coming year. This is nearly four times as much as the $1,850,000,000 which the Federal Government paid out in the fiscal year 1939 when there were 926,000 civilians on the pay rolls.

30-PERCENT REDUCTION IN EMPLOYMENT RECOMMENDED

Senator BYRD states:

"If the estimated employment for the fiscal year 1949 were reduced 30 percent, or 630,000 employees, the total would still be a half-million greater than it was in the year just prior to the World War II emergency.

"It would appear that a half million additional civilian employees should be sufficient to meet new postwar requirements including the new military expansion, the foreign-aid programs, veterans' services, and so forth.

"I am confident a reduction of this percentage or more could be made without impairment of any essential functions.

"The annual savings would be more than $2,000,000,000." [2]

PERSONNEL CEILINGS FLOUTED

It was only 2 years ago—in June 1946—that a Congress which was fed up with inflated Federal pay rolls, imposed an employment "ceiling" upon the executive branch. Under this ceiling, the Federal departments and agencies were gradually to reduce the number of their employees so that by June 30, 1947, the over-all total would not exceed 1,650,000 persons.

For a while this ceiling mandate legislated by Congress had a good effect. Federal employment began to diminish slowly. But it was not long before many of the agencies began to ignore the ceilings. Violations—both technical and deliberate—took place with sickening frequency. As a result, the personnel reduction goal ordered by Congress was never achieved. Instead, an upward trend was resumed. The will of Congress was defeated.

So now we find the Government hiring new employees at the rate of nearly 500 a day, every day in the month.

EXAMPLES OF PERSONNEL INCREASES

When World War II struck, it was only natural that the Military Establishment should demand, and be granted, large numbers of civilian employees to carry on Army- and Navy-sponsored construction and industrial work. Civilian payrolls of the War and Navy Departments rose to a peak early in 1945, and then, with the war's end, quickly shrunk to transition-to-peacetime levels.

It was only natural also that Government civilian agencies created to perform war-emergency work should require thousands upon thousands of new employees. When the war ended, these agencies were gradually liquidated—albeit reluctantly—and their employees were either discharged or transferred to peacetime or old line departments.

But it also happened that nearly every peacetime department and agency of the Government found reasons or excuses to participate in the war effort. So they, too, requested more employees for the duration. But when the war ended nearly all of them wanted to hang on to their wartime employees, and most of them did.

Here are a few examples showing how some of the larger departments have fared as to personnel since December, 1932:[3]

	December 1932	December 1939	December 1945	April 1948
State Department	4,686	6,249	18,864	21,816
Treasury Department	52,043	53,329	95,643	90,117
Post Office Department	273,583	345,551	447,599	488,059
Interior Department	14,483	45,321	43,135	49,776
Agriculture Department	26,371	69,764	86,209	75,351
Commerce Department	17,816	8,495	29,866	40,146
Veterans' Administration	34,111	38,481	92,867	201,910

SOME REASONS FOR FEDERAL EMPLOYMENT RISE

There are, of course, Government agencies whose workloads have increased substantially as the result of post-war conditions, and which are therefore justified in seeking additional personnel. By and large, however, the persistent growth of the Federal civilian pay-roll army may be attributed to these causes, among others:

The Government's system of promotion and compensation stands squarely in the way of bona fide attempts to reduce employment. Supervisory and administrative personnel are graded and compensated not on the basis of the quality of work performed, but according to the number of employees under their supervision. Hundreds of ambitious department executives strive to keep or even increase their personnel in order to build up their own prestige and earning power.

Every time Congress passes a law setting up a new service, a brand-new pay roll is created to carry out the law's provisions. Once an agency is established for any purpose, it grows and grows and grows.

Emergency created agencies always die hard. Most of them tend to carry on long after the emergency which brought them into being has ended. Take, for example, agencies created during the economic depression 15 years ago: Some of the larger ones still continue in today's boom period, their pay rolls scarcely diminished, if at all. To paraphrase a remark once made by Senator GEORGE, there is nothing so permanent as a temporary Government agency.

[1] These figures, taken from reports of the Joint Congressional Committee on Reduction of Nonessential Federal Expenditures, differ but slightly from totals shown in the personnel reports of the Civil Service Commission.

[2] Memorandum by Senator BYRD on Federal personnel, just released.

[3] From Byrd committee reports on Federal personnel.

It is always easy to add employees to the Federal pay roll, but next to impossible to subtract them from it once they get on.

Good intentions by Congress to reduce Federal employment have often been defeated by lack of adequate information as to departmental pay rolls, appropriations, etc., and by lack of time to study and digest such information as its committees do get. Despite the announced determination of congressional leaders this year to reduce Federal pay rolls, the appropriations approved by Congress for fiscal 1949 will permit the executive branch to maintain an employment level of at least 2,100,000 civilian workers during the coming year, with a possible peak load of 2,250,000.

In conclusion, at should be pointed out that an appropriation once made for departmental pay rolls seldom goes unspent. The following quotation from a statement on June 30 by Chairman EDWARD H. REES, Republican, of Kansas, of the House Post Office and Civil Service Committee, gives proof of this:

"At the end of every fiscal year (Congressman REES said), it has been the policy of the executive branch to make certain that there is no return to the Treasury of unexpended funds on hand. This fiscal year ending June 30 is no exception. During the last 2 months Federal employment has increased by over 35,000 employees. The direct relationship between this increased personnel and the unexpended funds of the departments and agencies is quite obvious. I am advised that many departments and agencies have hired additional thousands of temporary employees during the last 30 days, some at rates of between $25 and $50 a day. * * * I estimate that between forty and fifty million dollars will be unnecessarily spent by the Government before June 30 for needless Federal personnel."

Research Director.

Everybody Loses

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HENRY D. LARCADE, JR.
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 2, 1948

Mr. LARCADE. Mr. Speaker, under previous leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include herein a copy of an article by Mr. Jay Carmody, published in last Sunday's Washington Star, entitled "Extinction on E Street—Everybody Loses in National Theater Controversy, as It Had To Be."

Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, this is a fair example of what happens with respect to racial controversies. Those who initiated this controversy can certainly find no satisfaction in the result of this controversy, and as Mr. Carmody well says, as is usual in all such instances, "everybody loses."

The article follows:

EXTINCTION ON E STREET—EVERYBODY LOSES IN NATIONAL THEATER CONTROVERSY, AS IT HAD TO BE

(By Jay Carmody)

They turned out the lights at the National Theater last night and Washington became the one great capital of the western world in which the living drama is no longer represented.

The E Street institution with 113 years of continuity to its credit has been dark before, but never like this. Previous closings were for the usual seasonal lulls. When this one ends, several weeks hence, the National will be a motion-picture house. True, it could be reconverted overnight to its traditional community function but that has not been the history of such transmutations. In this sphere of human activity, unlike sports, they seldom come back. It is more profitable not to come back, but to go ahead and become a movie house, a radio presentation theater, or, in the immediate future, a television stage.

Sometimes, as in the case of the once-palatial Rialto here, or the more famous Hippodrome in New York, theaters end up as parking lots.

In one way or another, the living drama seems bent upon hurling itself headlong into the machine which has become its relentless pursuer.

THE CONTROVERSY MOVES ON

Controversy closed the National, and having done so has moved on to higher frenzy elsewhere, in areas far more logical. Oddly enough, in the death of the theater, the controversialists find themselves in agreement on one point, namely, that the casualty was profitless.

Every one has lost, which is usually the case in gang wars, mob battles, and even duels fought under circumstances where the ground is inadequate for the duelists to maneuver.

Reason and sanity never had a chance to operate in the solution of the National controversy. It was the theater's misfortune to be the right size for attack in the civil-rights conflict swirling across the Nation.

In some respects the inadequacy of the E Street auditorium as an area for such a conflict has been ludicrously apparent. Yet it was asked to stand for 10,000 polling booths, to substitute for two such vastly more important Washington structures as the Capitol Building and the Supreme Court of the United States. This was asking absurdly too much, and being absurd is not to be recommended as an approach to any problem. Certainly not one as sharp and deep and decisive as civil and human rights.

From the perspective of one with a seat on the aisle of the 2-year show, it has looked at times like an insanely protracted human comedy.

EVEN THE PLAY PROPOSED COMPROMISE

It began, for example, with a play called Joan of Lorraine. It was not a good play, but it had a magical actress in the person of Ingrid Bergman, and its message was that human progress is inevitably a matter of compromise. Yes, compromise. That is what the play argued, but from that point on, no one believed in compromise, not even Miss Bergman, or Maxwell Anderson who wrote the drama. Major poets like Dante write major poems out of the degrading antics of such lesser poets as those who do not believe themselves.

The other side, the theater's management was equally unconvinced by the reach of Anderson's eloquence on the great virtue of compromise.

Theater managements and those who labor in the theater notoriously do not see eye to eye, and this became one of the most celebrated occasions of eloquent mutual denunciation. Of all the arts, the theater is the most highly organized into labor and trades unions. It is the practice of these free-souled groups to issue ultimata to one another, to gouge and extort and quarrel over the spoils until theater prices have become intolerable and the long-suffering public has revolted. Even Broadway's hits, a negligible one or two at the moment, are wondering how long it—and they—can continue.

BOYCOTT THE FATAL WEAPON

It remained for the National controversy to forge the latest and most deadly of the theater's suicidal weapons. This is the boycott. First it was the leaders of the Dramatists' Guild who threatened to boycott the Washington theater. Then Actors' Equity, and later the press agents.

The theater's answer was to boycott right back and now, between them, they have boycotted the theater out of existence.

There never was a time when the whole question of abandoning the theater's policy of segregation was subjected to either sane deliberation, arbitration, or negotiation. Both sides stood off and fired ultimata until it became impossible for the theater's management to retreat with dignity from a traditional policy of nonadmission to Negroes could it have been induced to do so. The Negroes' right to attend the theater, and that of whites as well, simply became lost in the hysteria of the conflict; to the lesser right of actors and playwrights to boycott the theater and the theater's right to turn itself into a motion-picture house.

And so the conflict ends with no legitimate theater left in Washington. The argument moves on over its dead body. If there is a martyr involved, it is not either of the principals but the public, the white and Negro public which might have met in understanding and mutual enjoyment at the theater, if the theater had lived.

It did not live, perhaps because it was made a symbol of something larger than itself.

As such a symbol, it is now extinct—which in itself may be a symbol of today and its conflicts.

American Citizens Who Desire To Bring Their Aged Parents or Adopted Children to This Country Should Be Helped

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KENNETH B. KEATING
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, although we must be extremely careful not to lower our immigration bars to the point where those now here will suffer, there are two limited categories who can be admitted in greater numbers without any injury to our own economy and to the great relief of the distress now felt by many of our citizens.

The first of these groups are the parents of American citizens. They are now in a first preference category, so that no problem arises, for instance, in the case of a country like England, which never fills its quota for immigration to this country. In the case, however, of those countries whose quotas are greatly oversubscribed, even though this preference is granted, it means a wait for many years to come.

My attention was recently directed to the case of a substantial citizen in my district, with a good job and money in the bank, who wants to bring his widowed mother from one of the European countries to live with him. Although she is in a preferred category, she has been told that she faces a wait of 4 or 5 years. She is now 82 years old. The chances, therefore, that she will ever be able to experience the love and affection of her devoted son in her declining years are meager indeed.

The second group for whom one's sympathy is necessarily keen is represented by the children, many of them orphans, who are the innocent victims of the ravages of war. They may have uncles or aunts, or other relatives, or even friends, in this country who are very willing to go through proceedings for their adoption, either in American or foreign courts, in order to bring them here as their own children. Under existing law, such procedure is ineffectual, since only natural born children fall in a preference category.

These young people will make the best kind of American citizens. It is important that they be brought here during their formative years in order that they may have the benefit of schooling and training in the American brand of democracy. Of no less importance is the fact that they will bring unmeasured joy to the hearts of many American citizens who yearn for the privilege of mothering and fathering such youngsters, now denied them through the restrictions of our present laws.

The very modest increase in our population entailed in this suggestion would in no way increase the pressures on our own economy, which are now admittedly severe. Housing and employment represent the two principal reasons for immigration restrictions. Since these groups would become a part of a single family entity and since they would not be of the employable age, no problem is presented here.

In addition, the number involved, I am told, would be comparatively negligible.

In order to accomplish this objective, I have today introduced a bill to provide nonquota immigration status for the alien parents of American citizens and to expedite the admission to this country of children who have been duly adopted by American citizens.

The need for this legislation is urgent. I appreciate, however, the necessarily limited nature of this special session. If action does not prove feasible at this session, it is my hope that the introduction of this bill may lead to a study of the problem by the appropriate Government departments, as well as the Members of Congress, in order that early steps may be taken upon reconvening, to bring to the hearts of many of our own people the untold happiness which would result from the passage of such a measure.

Platform on Foreign Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHESTER E. MERROW
OF NEW HAMPSHIRE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. MERROW. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include therein a copy of House Concurrent Resolution 190 introduced by me on April 27, 1948:

House Concurrent Resolution 190

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That it is the sense of the Congress of the United States that there should be a bipartisan platform on foreign policy, including the following principles:

(1) Because this Republic was brought into being for the prime purpose of laying the foundations for a just and permanent peace, and because every true American is devoted to the achievement of this objective, the United States should firmly dedicate itself and all of its resources to the maintenance of its destiny-given position of leadership for world peace.

(2) Because it is desirable to give the Members of Congress a more potent voice in the development and in the implementation of foreign policy, there should be appointed immediately a select committee to conduct a thorough study of international relations and to carry out a searching investigation of the Department of State and the Foreign Service.

(3) Because the United States must continue to exercise leadership in the establishment of a real, workable, and effective world organization it should, if the defects of the United Nations (chief of which is the veto) cannot be removed and if the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics continues in its refusal to cooperate, abandon the United Nations and form at once a new international organization of liberty-loving democratic nations without the presence of the impeding Soviet Union.

(4) Because diplomatic appeasement, which has failed in the past, leads only to conflict, such appeasement of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics should cease.

(5) As long as aid to free nations is effective in checking the advance of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and preventing the spread of communism, economic assistance to rehabilitate the economies of nations resisting Russian aggression and the spread of communism should be continued by the United States.

(6) If a democratic nation, threatened by a Communist minority which is either directly or indirectly aided, abetted, and controlled by the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, asks aid of the United States, assistance should be extended, be it economic or military.

(7) The United States should (a) inform the world, and particularly the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, that it intends to use its force to stop aggression directed at strategic points such as the approaches to the Atlantic, Gibraltar, the nations of western Europe, the Dardanelles, Greece, Turkey, Iran, the Near East, the Persian Gulf area, China, and the islands of the Pacific; (b) state clearly that whenever there is an encroachment on these areas, or any other strategic positions, the integrity of which the United States deems essential to its security and survival, the nation making such encroachment will meet the immediate, sustained, and unrelenting resistance of the United States; and (c) for the self-interest of the United States and the peace of the world, establish a line beyond which an aggressor may not move without encountering the full force and power of the United States.

(8) Because the achievement and the maintenance of adequate preparedness on the sea, on the land, and more especially in the air, and because atomic supremacy and air supremacy by the United States must be realized at all costs, the funds required to keep it the strongest military nation should be appropriated, provision for full and adequate manpower for the armed services should be made, and the armed services should move efficiently and effectively to an early and full realization of this determined objective.

That Dollar You Earned in 1946—All the Livelong Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOMER D. ANGELL
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, with a peacetime budget of over $40,000,000,000 necessitating a tax burden of a little less than a third of the average citizen's income, it is of interest to note how the dollar earned in 1946 is spent, as shown by the following table, and statement entitled "All the Livelong Day":

THAT DOLLAR YOU EARNED IN 1946

New Jersey Taxpayers Association says that the average income dollar earned in 1946 was spent as follows:

	Percent
For government	31.4
For food	18.3
For housing	13.8
For clothes	9.3
For drink, smokes	4.0
For travel	3.6
For recreation	3.3
For medical	2.5
For personal business	2.4
For personal care	1.6
For all other	1.5
For savings	8.3

ALL THE LIVELONG DAY

Henry Suburban reaches out at 7 a. m. of a bright May morning to turn off the alarm clock (price: $6; tax $1.20). Accompanied by the trebling of birds, he climbs wearily out of bed (price: $195; annual personal property tax, 75 cents), walks across the floor of his $8,000 house (annual general property tax, $240), and switches on the electricity (33 cents tax on his $10 monthly bill) which lights the bulb (price: 20 cents; tax, 4 cents).

To music from a bedroom radio (price: $30; tax, $3), Henry shaves with his electric (see above) razor. As a radio newscaster reports that Henry's State is preparing to increase income taxes and impose a general sales tax on everything anyone buys, Henry slaps across his jowls a handful of bay rum (price: $1.30; tax, 26 cents).

He dresses quickly, hurriedly fastening cuff links (price: $3.50; tax, 70 cents), and tie clasp (price: $1.50; tax, 30 cents), puts on his Swiss wrist watch (price: $70; tax, $14[1]), and rushes downstairs. Tucked under one arm is a leather briefcase (price: $18; tax, $3.60) which carries papers from his real estate office, including one deed (property valued at $3,000; stamp tax, $3.30).

In the kitchen he's just in time to snatch two slices of bread from the electric toaster (price: $16; tax, $1.60), lift his coffee from the gas stove (price: $190; tax, $19), and grab a glass of fruit juice from the refrigerator (price: $300; tax, $30).

A glance out of the window shows it's raining, so he calls to his wife (marriage license, $2) to telephone (monthly bill: $12; tax, $2.05) for a taxi. Too many other people want taxis on a wet morning so Henry gets out his own car (price: $1,800; tax, $126[2])

[1] Not counting customs duty.

[2] Plus annual registration of $3; tax of 5 cents on each pound of a new tire; tax of 5 percent on each new part or accessory; State and Federal gasoline tax average: 5½ cents per gallon.

NOTE.—State and local taxes vary. You may pay more or less than Henry Suburban.

and drives (operator's license; $1) to the railroad station.

Henry relaxes at the station with a cigarette (price per pack: 8 cents; Federal tax, 7 cents), lit by a match (tax: 5½ cents per 1,000). Aboard the train, Henry gives the conductor his ticket (price: 85 cents; tax, 13 cents) and settles down to a hand of bridge with three cronies, using of course, a deck of cards (price: 40 cents; tax, 13 cents).

In the city on his way to the office, Henry stops to buy a roll of camera film (price 20 cents; tax, 3 cents) that he promised his son (birth registration: $1), and the lipstick (price: $1; tax, 20 cents) he promised his wife. Because there are friends coming to his house in the evening, he buys a bottle of whisky (price: $2.30; tax, $2.60).

Arriving eventually at the office, Henry sighs (no tax!) and settles to a day's work (annual income: $5,000; Federal and State income tax, $510). If he works hard for the rest of his life, he will be able to provide the Government with a handsome slice of inheritance tax. And if he dies in a State that is fiscally tolerant, he can take comfort in the thought that his casket (provided it costs less than $100—will be exempt from any sales tax.

Mr. Speaker, I have taken these excerpts from the Oregon Business and Tax Research, Inc., bulletin for July 1948.

A Blot on Justice

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM LEMKE
OF NORTH DAKOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. LEMKE. Mr. Speaker, we always enslave ourselves by enslaving others first. We always lose our liberty by taking it from others first. That is history and history repeats itself.

During the recent war we are told there were many dishonest framed prosecutions of innocent men and women. It is claimed that some of these victims were thrown into jail, and made to linger without trial for months and in some cases years.

This because they did not like someone or because they did not like the Pinks and Reds in our Government. Of course, hatred is always vicious, as well as obnoxious. Intolerance is dispicable. But since when has it become a crime for you not to like certain individuals? However foolish your dislikes may be, yet that is your individual privilege. When has it become proper for the Department of Justice to be turned over to a few Pinks and Reds for persecution?

I close my remarks with an editorial from the Chicago Tribune. The editorial speaks for itself. Here it is:

A BLOT ON JUSTICE

Surviving defendants of the abortive wartime mass sedition trial in Washington are urging that the Republican Party condemn this proceeding. The suggestion has been made that the defendants deserve redress. More particularly, the Republicans are exhorted to take action so that justice may not be sullied by similar persecutions in future.

No less than three indictments were returned before the New Deal Department of Justice was satisfied that it had a charge that made any sense. The accusation was conspiracy to violate the Sedition Act of 1940, specifically by circulating literature with intent to impair the morale of the Army and Navy. A reporter for the Washington Post enticed some 28 defendants to send him samples of their writings. This gave the Roosevelt administration a fictitious cause for establishing the legal presence of all of the defendants in the District of Columbia, although many were previously unknown to one another.

The defendants were a conglomeration of anti-New Dealers, united only in their opposition to communism and to Roosevelt's methods of putting the country into war. A sprinkling of convicted bundists, anti-Semites, and crackpots rounded out the list. All in common suffered from being hauled by a dragnet conspiracy charge to what, for many of them, was a remote part of the country, where the court and jury panel were peculiarly susceptible to administration influence as well as to the war hysteria of the capital.

There they were forced to stand the expense of bail or, if indigent, as some were, to languish in jail for an unconscionable time. The indictment failed to specify a single overt act, violating the requirement of the sixth amendment requiring that an accused "be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation" against him. Prof. Edward S. Corwin, constitutional authority, has remarked, "That any Federal court should have consented to try anybody under an indictment so utterly lacking in specifications touching the when, the where, and the how of the essential charge against him—in this instance the charge of conspiracy—is utterly amazing."

After disorderly hearings of 8 months, a mistrial was declared upon the death of the judge. At length the chief justice of Federal district court, asserting that the defendants had been denied their constitutional rights, dismissed the case and asserted that to permit another trial "would be a travesty on justice."

This disgraceful political show trial, more appropriate to Moscow than to an American court, is unsurpassed among all of the evils charged to the Roosevelt administration. The Republicans owe the country the duty of exposing the motives and methods which gave rise to these proceedings to the end that there may never be a repetition.

Executive Papers—The President and the Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RAY J. MADDEN
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, Peter Campbell Brown, executive assistant to the Attorney General of the United States, delivered an address to the New York State Bar Association at Lake Placid, N. Y., on July 1, 1948. His analysis of the constitutional rights of the executive and legislative branches of our Government is outstanding.

I am hereby submitting the text of his speech for the Members of Congress to read:

Gentlemen, this invitation to attend your midsummer meeting is indeed most flattering. White Face Inn on beautiful Lake Placid is indeed most attractive and a welcome relief from the hot city of Washington. I am happy to be here not only for the cool breezes but for the great opportunity to talk to a group of fellow New York State lawyers.

For the past few years I have been uniquely fortunate in being associated in an official capacity with the Federal Government. It has given me an opportunity to see at first hand the many problems which are encountered by public administrators in their daily chores. I have gained a respect for them and the public service which I never would have had, were I to limit myself to reading daily newspapers and listening to the tirades of economy-minded individuals who are constantly attacking anything done by the Government.

The functioning of this country depends upon the daily service performed by millions of sincere and devoted public servants. I agree with the Honorable David E. Lilienthal, who recently stated in a commencement address at the University of Virginia, that each responsible citizen of the United States should devote part of his life to the public service. If this were done, I think there would be an infinitely greater understanding of the problems that are met not only in our Nation's Capital but throughout the various governments of this country and the world.

Most people are led to believe that all events of major consequence in our Nation's Capital are permeated with politics. For example, take the recent Condon incident. The House Committee on Un-American Activities had released a report charging disloyalty on the part of Dr. Edward U. Condon, Director of the Natural Bureau of Standards, and that the subcommittee had thereafter sought to obtain all relevant papers, including the report which had been made by the Federal Bureau of Investigation and furnished to the Department of Commerce. Hon. Averill Harriman, then the Secretary of Commerce, declined to make the information available. The refusal was in keeping with the well-established principle that it is in the public interest to maintain on a confidential basis reports rendered by the Federal Bureau of Investigation and other investigative agencies of the executive branch of the Government.

One reading of the foregoing incident in the newspapers, might be led to conclude that this was a straight political issue which was symbolic of a rift between a Republican-controlled Congress and a Democratic President.

Close observation and study of the Condon episode will show that it was not a partisan political issue. It was an issue which struck deep into the roots of our Government and raised a vital question in constitutional law, namely, the powers of the executive and the legislative branches, respectively, under our Constitution.

The right of the Executive to maintain investigative reports on a confidential basis has long been recognized as his constitutional prerogative. The sound considerations of policy which support the assertion of this prerogative have been well stated on many occasions. In an opinion rendered by the then Attorney General, now Mr. Justice Jackson, on April 30, 1941, addressed to the chairman of the House Committee on Naval Affairs, the Attorney General took the position, with the approval and at the direction of the President, that records of the Federal Bureau of Investigation are confidential documents of the executive branch and that congressional or public access to such records would not be in the public interest.

The opinion pointed out that this view accorded with the conclusion reached by a long line of predecessors in the Office of the Attorney General and was the position taken by the President from time to time since the administration of George Washington.

I should like to relate a few historical incidents, high lighted by a few Supreme Court cases. You will, I believe, come to the conclusion that the President in office who stoutly defends the executive branch from unwarranted encroachments by the Houses of Congress, renders a service to the Nation and contributes to the preservation of the fundamental principles of the Constitution.

PRESIDENT WASHINGTON'S ADMINISTRATION

The earliest recorded case in our history took place in March 1792, when the House of Representatives passed a resolution appointing a committee to inquire into the causes of the failure of the ill-fated expedition under Major General St. Clair. The committee was granted the power to call for such persons, papers, and records as might be necessary to assist the inquiry.

The expedition of General St. Clair was under the direction of the Secretary of War. The expenditures connected therewith came under the Secretary of the Treasury. The House based its right to investigate by virtue of its control of the expenditure of public moneys. The Secretaries of War and the Treasury appeared before the committee. However, when the committee was bold enough to ask the President for the papers pertaining to the General St. Clair campaign, President Washington called a meeting of his Cabinet. Secretary of State Thomas Jefferson, Alexander Hamilton, Secretary of the Treasury, Henry Knox, Secretary of War, and Edmond Randolph, the Attorney General, were present.

President Washington stated that he had called his Cabinet members together because it was the first example of a demand on the Executive for papers. Washington and his Cabinet members came to the following unanimous conclusions:

"First, that the House might institute inquiries. Second, that it might call for papers generally. Third, that the Executive ought to communicate such papers as the public good would permit, and ought to refuse those, the disclosure of which would injure the public; consequently were to exercise a discretion. Fourth, that neither the committee nor House had a right to call on the head of a department, who and whose papers were under the President alone; but that the committee should instruct their chairman to move the House to address the President." (Writings of Thomas Jefferson, 1905, vol. 1, pp. 303-304.)

The precedent thus set by our first President and his Cabinet was followed in 1796, when President Washington was presented with a resolution of the House of Representatives which requested him to lay before the House a copy of the instructions to the Minister of the United States who negotiated the Jay Treaty with the King of Great Britain, together with the correspondence and documents relative to that treaty. Apparently it was necessary to implement the treaty with an appropriation which the House was called upon to vote. The House insisted on its right to the papers requested, as a condition to appropriating the required funds.

It is well to say at this point that it is frequently a difference in political faith between the Chief Executive and one or both of the Houses of Congress which gives rise to insistent demands for information and papers by one of the Houses and to equally insistent refusals by a President. Thus, Washington started his second term as President with a hostile Republican majority in the lower house, and it was that Republican majority which sought the papers relating to the Jay Treaty. You will recall that Jefferson was the leader of the Republicans and Alexander Hamilton was the leader of the Federalists.

President Washington consulted Alexander Hamilton for suggestions in drafting a reply to the House resolution. Hamilton suggested that the information sought by the House was for the purpose of impeachment. In his message to the House of Representatives refusing the papers, Washington, apparently influenced by Hamilton's suggestion, stated that inspection of the papers asked for could only properly be sought for impeachment purposes, which the House resolution had not expressed.

It may well be that Washington's experience with attempted legislative encroachment upon the executive branch caused him to say in his Farewell Address:

"It is important, likewise, that the habits of thinking in a free country should inspire caution in those intrusted with its administration to confine themselves within their respective constitutional spheres, avoiding in the exercise of the powers of one department to encroach upon another. The spirit of encroachment tends to consolidate the powers of all the departments in one, and thus to create, whatever the form of government, a real despotism."

THOMAS JEFFERSON'S ADMINISTRATION SERVICE OF A SUBPENA ON A CABINET MEMBER

I want to touch briefly on the effect of a subpena which is served by a congressional committee on a Cabinet member or other official of the executive branch.

It may be stated as a general proposition that court decisions establish that information and papers which heads of departments consider confidential, in the public interest, may not be exposed to public view, either in court or to congressional committees.

The case of Marbury v. Madison (1 Cranch 137, 143, 144 (1803)), with which we are all familiar, defines the limits at which a court must stop when the head of a department invokes the privilege that the information sought from him is confidential and cannot be disclosed. You will recall that William Marbury was one of the "midnight judges" appointed by President Adams, just prior to the assumption of the Presidency by Thomas Jefferson. However, the commission evidencing the appointment had not been issued to Marbury by John Marshall, who was Secretary of State under Adams. James Madison, who succeeded Marshall as Secretary of State, refused to issue the commission to Marbury. Marbury brought suit by mandamus to compel the issuance of the commission. Marshall, having in the meantime been appointed Chief Justice by President Adams, was now called upon to decide the issue. The Court wished to ascertain facts relating to the commission, and to that end summoned Levi Lincoln, the Attorney General, for questioning.

Mr. Lincoln objected to answering. While he respected the Court's jurisdiction, he felt himself delicately situated between his duty to this Court, and the duty he conceived he owed to an executive department. He was acting as Secretary of State at the time when the transaction in question took place. He was, therefore, of the opinion that he was not bound to answer as to any facts which came officially to his knowledge while acting as Secretary of State (p. 143).

The Court said, that if Mr. Lincoln wished time to consider what answers he should make, they would give him time; but they had no doubt he ought to answer. There was nothing confidential required to be disclosed. If there had been, he was not obliged to answer it; and if he thought that anything was communicated to him in confidence, he was not bound to disclose it (p. 144).

After taking time to consider, Mr. Lincoln said that he had no objection to answering the questions proposed except one, to wit: What had been done with the commissions? He did not know that they ever came to the possession of Mr. Madison, nor did he know that they were in the office when Mr. Madison took possession of it. The Court was of the opinion that he was not bound to say what had become of the commissions.

The Court decided that where the head of a department acts in a case requiring the exercise of executive discretion, where he is the mere organ of the executive will, any application to a court to control the conduct of such head of a department would be rejected without hesitation.

One of the most famous cases in our history, which dealt with the efficacy of a subpena issued to the President or to a Cabinet officer, is the Aaron Burr trial for treason, in the Circuit Court of the United States held at Richmond, Va., in 1807.

In the course of that trial, Burr applied to the court for the issuance of a subpena duces tecum upon President Jefferson. Judge Marshall allowed the subpena to issue. It directed President Jefferson to produce a letter which one General Wilkinson had sent the President. The letter was alleged, in an affidavit filed by Mr. Burr, to contain information helpful to his defense. While Judge Marshall's opinion stated that under the Constitution and laws of the United States the President was not exempt from the process of the court in a criminal trial, nevertheless, he also ruled that the President was free to keep from view those portions of the letter which the President deemed confidential in the public interest; the President alone was the judge of what was confidential.

The Court also considered for the first time in our history, the problem of official and private papers, and stated that it would not lightly force official records and papers into public view by subpena. What led the Court to its decision, among other things, was that the letter in question was not in the files of the War Department, or in any other department of the Government. The Court appears to have been largely influenced by Colonel Burr's argument that the President, who had publicly accused Burr of treacherous conduct, in a special message to the Congress, and had been primarily responsible for bringing him to trial and for bringing the weight of the Government behind the prosecution, ought not, in fairness to an accused person on trial for his life, keep from him a private communication which the accused thought would help prove his innocence (ibid. 186).

Jefferson, according to both historians and writers on constitutional law, proved himself, in this one instance, to be a better lawyer than Marshall when he paid no attention to the subpena, did not even reply to the Court's order, but wrote United States Attorney Hay, in charge of the prosecution, that under our framework of government, the judicial branch had no authority to order him, as Chief Executive, to do anything. Jefferson made the letter in question available by delivering it to the Attorney General, with instructions to keep out of Court such portions thereof as the United States Attorney deemed confidential; nevertheless, he made it perfectly clear that he stood ready to resist, by force, if necessary, the unauthorized trespass by the judicial branch upon the independence of the executive.

The immunity from giving testimony and producing papers in court which Jefferson claimed for himself he also claimed for the heads of departments. While Jefferson had no objection to the use at the trial of certain portions of the Wilkinson letter, he vigorously objected to Burr's blanket request for copies of orders which had been issued by the Secretaries of the War and Navy Departments. Those orders covered a correspondence of many months "with such a variety of officers, civil and military, over all the United States as would amount to the laying open the whole executive books." The subpena which had been issued from the District Court apparently required both the President and the Secretaries of War and the Navy to personally attend with certain documents. The two Secretaries did not attend, Jefferson contenting himself with a statement that if Burr supposed that there were any facts within the knowledge of the heads of departments or of himself which would be useful in his defense, Jefferson would, in furtherance of justice, give the defendant the benefit of the facts by way of deposition to be taken at Washington, the seat of the Government.

Congressional committees, intent at times on seeing papers and documents in the executive branch, have urged the Burr case as a precedent for the amenability of a Cabinet officer to process, by subpena issued by a committee of the House or the Senate. That case, however, has certain definite limitations, as laid down by Judge Marshall. In the first place, Judge Marshall made it clear that if a letter in the possession of the President, material to the trial, contains matter "which it would be imprudent to disclose, which it is not the wish of the Executive to disclose, such matter, if it be not immediately and essentially applicable to the point, will, of course, be suppressed. * * *" In the second place, Marshall held that if the President declared that a letter in his possession ought not to be exhibited in public, he had a privilege to withhold it.

That part of Judge Marshall's decision which claims for the court the right to issue a subpena against the President has been attacked by writers on constitutional law and scholars as unsound, for the reason that the courts cannot ask the President to do anything.

The President, as the chief executive officer of the United States, is in a position to completely disregard the court's subpena or order. Since such disregard brings contempt upon the court, it would appear wise for the court not to issue a futile order or command.

Jefferson, of course, was merely following the precedent which had been established by President Washington when he asserted, in a letter to United States Attorney Hay, that the leading principle of our Constitution is the independence of the legislative, executive, and judiciary of each other. Would the Executive be independent of the judiciary if he were subject to the commands of the latter, and to imprisonment for disobedience?

RUTHERFORD B. HAYES' ADMINISTRATION

A practical application of the principle, that Congress has not the power, under the Constitution, to force the President or heads of departments to divulge information against what the President believes to be the public interest, is found in the case of George F. Seward, who was counsel general of the United States in China during the administration of Rutherford B. Hayes. He appeared before the House Committee on Expenditures in the State Department, which was in charge of investigating his official conduct. A subpena duces tecum had been served upon him to produce certain books and papers. Seward refused. He was brought before the House to show cause at its bar why he should not obey the House through its subpena. The House referred the incident to its Judiciary Committee.

Benjamin F. Butler, chairman of the Judiciary Committee, submitted a report stating that Seward was not in contempt; that in contemplation of law, under our theory of government, all the records of the executive departments were under the control of the President of the United States. Although the House sometimes sent resolutions to a head of a department to produce such books and records, nevertheless, in any doubtful case, no head of a department would bring before a committee of the House any of the records of his office without permission of, or consultation with, the President of the United States. The report pointed out that all resolutions directed to the President of the United States, if properly phrased, would contain the clause: "If in his judgment not inconsistent with the public interest."

Finally, the report stated that the highest exercise of the power calling for documents would be, in the course of justice, by the courts of the United States, but the House wuold not for a moment permit its journals to be taken from its possession by one of its assistant clerks and carried into a court in obedience to a subpena duly issued by the court. The report indicated the perils incident to divulging to any committee of the House "state secrets," to the detriment of the country:

"Somebody must judge upon this point. It clearly cannot be the House or its committee, because they cannot know the importance of having the doings of the executive department kept secret. The head of the executive department, therefore, must be the judge in such case and decide it upon his own responsibility to the people, and to the House, upon a case of impeachment brought against him for so doing, if his acts are causeless, malicious, willfully wrong, or to the detriment of the public interests."

The record of the subsequent proceedings taken in the House shows that the recommendations of the Committee on the Judiciary, that Seward was not in contempt for failure to obey the subpena, were followed.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT'S ADMINISTRATION

President Theodore Roosevelt established the principle that heads of executive departments are subject to the Constitution, to the laws passed by Congress pursuant to the Constitution, and to the directions of the President, but to no other directions whatever.

In 1909, the Senate Judiciary Committee had caused a subpena to be served on Herbert Knox Smith, head of the Bureau of Corporations. When Mr. Smith appeared, the committee informed him that if he did not at once transmit certain papers and documents in his possession, the Senate would order his imprisonment. Mr. Smith reported this to the President and was ordered in writing to turn over to the President all the papers in the case, "so that he (the President) could assist the Senate in the prosecution of its investigation." What happened afterward can best be stated in President Roosevelt's own words:

"I have those papers in my possession, and last night I informed Senator Clark of the Judiciary Committee what I had done. I told him also that the Senate should not have those papers and that Herbert Knox Smith had turned them over to me. The only way the Senate or the committee can get those papers now is through my impeachment, and I so informed Senator Clark last night.

"The Senator informed me that the Senate was only anxious to exercise its prerogatives and that if the papers were of such a nature that they should not be made public the committee was ready to indorse my views. * * * Some of these facts which they want, for what purpose I hardly know, were given to the Government under the seal of secrecy and cannot be divulged, and I will see to it that the word of this Government to the individual is kept sacred."

Roosevelt's challenge to the Senate to impeach him, if it wished to get the papers which he felt should not be made public, was fortified by powerful legal argument. Roosevelt had ordered the Head of the Bureau of Corporations to get a decision from the Attorney General that the papers should not be made public. The Attorney General followed the provision of the act of 1903, when he reasoned that the President was to judge what information should be made public. Faced with the Senate committee's insistence that the Commissioner of Corporations violate both the law and the practices of his predecessors or face imprisonment, the Attorney General suggested that the papers be turned over to the President in order that the latter might thereafter instruct the Commissioner concerning their disposition (27 Op. A. G. 150).

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT'S ADMINISTRATION

The precedents furnished by the late President Franklin D. Roosevelt's administration are several and you will recall that Federal Bureau of Investigation records and reports were refused to congressional committees, in the public interest.

You may recall also that the Director of the Bureau of the Budget refused to testify and to produce the Bureau's files, pursuant to subpena which had been served upon him, because the President had instructed him not to make public the records of the Bureau due to their confidential nature. Public interest was again invoked to prevent disclosure.

In addition the Secretaries of War and Navy were directed not to deliver documents which the committee had requested, on grounds of public interest. The Secretaries, in their own judgment, refused permission to Army and Navy officers to appear and testify because they felt that it would be contrary to the public interests.

We see that the framers of the Constitution had taken pains to insure the independence of the executive branch. Historical precedents covering more than 150 years of Presidential action demonstrate that our Presidents have vigorously asserted that independence.

Under the Constitution the executive power is lodged in the President. The determination of all executive questions belongs in theory and by constitutional right to him. The President is the responsible executive minister of the United States. The authority of each head of a department is a parcel of the executive power of the President. To coerce the head of a department is to coerce the President. This can be accomplished in no other way than by a law, constitutional in its nature, enacted in accordance with the forms of the Constitution. It follows that Congress cannot, under the Constitution, compel heads of departments to make public what the President desires to keep secret, in the public interest. The President alone is the judge of that interest, and is accountable only to his country in his political character, and to his own conscience.

Supreme Court Decision in Cement Cases

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ELLSWORTH B. FOOTE

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. FOOTE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I wish to include an article appearing in the Washington Times-Herald of Thursday, August 5, 1948, by George E. Sokolsky, which makes some pertinent observations on the effect of the Supreme Court decision in the so-called cement cases, concerning which I addressed the House yesterday:

THESE DAYS

(By George E. Sokolsky)

Often the Federal Trade Commission and our courts follow theory without the slightest regard either for experience or the welfare of the country. Administrative lawyers, who have come into control of our affairs, seek to remake our way of life without concern over the processes that have made this the greatest unit of production and that have given the American people their unusually high standard of living which represents the widest distribution of goods and services.

The basing point, which has been long in existence in the United States, permits a buyer to obtain materials from any manufacturer of that commodity at a competitive price with the manufacturer closest to the buyer.

Thus, for instance, a steel manufacturer in Pittsburgh can sell to a buyer in Indiana at the same price as a steel manufacturer in Chicago. The difference in the cost of transportation is absorbed by the seller.

The FTC and now the courts say that that is wrong. In the Cement case, the Supreme Court abolished the basing point. There are no loopholes in that decision which the FTC interprets as follows:

"The Court agreed with the Commission that this pricing system not only constitutes an 'unfair method of competition' but also involves unlawful price discrimination.

"It further held, in effect, that identical delivered prices which the system was designed to establish, regardless of wide differences in the cost of transportation from widely scattered plants, automatically created and reflected systematic discriminations in net factory prices * * *."

Curiously, this decision does not increase competition but kills it off. Justice Burton, who dissented, made that clear:

"This is the field where a producer, for his own purposes, and without collusion, often ships his product to a customer who, in terms of freight charges, is located nearer to one or more of the producer's competitors than to the producer himself.

"In selling to such a customer, this producer is at an obvious freight disadvantage. To meet the lower delivered price of his competitor, the producer, therefore, reduces his delivered price in that area by a sum sufficient to absorb his freight disadvantage.

"He might do this for many reasons. For example, this customer might be such a large customer that the volume of his orders would yield such a return to the producer that the producer, by distributing his fixed charges over the resulting increased volume of business, could absorb the freight differential without loss of profit to his business as a whole and without raising any charges to his other customers.

"The securing of this particular business might even enable the producer to reduce his own basic factory price to all his customers. It might make the difference between a profitable and a losing business, resulting in the producer's solvency or bankruptcy."

Of course, that would not worry the theoreticians, not until the steel companies decided to follow the letter of their ruling which upset them no end. In the Morton Salt case, the FTC won another victory in the Supreme Court which will cost the housewife considerable money.

Here the Court decided, following the FTC, that carload discounts may not be given; that is, that the manufacturer may not pass on to the customer reduced costs of operations.

Justices Jackson and Frankfurter dissented from this opinion, Jackson saying:

"The Court uses overtones of hostility to all quantity discounts, which I do not find in the act, but they are translated into a rule which is fatal to any discount the Commission sees fit to attack.

"The law of this case, in a nutshell, is that no quantity discount is valid if the Commission chooses to say it is not. That is not the law which Congress enacted and which this Court has uniformly stated until today."

Another matter, the Rigid Conduit case, comes into this discussion, but I have no room for it here. I need only make the point that these decisions involve increased costs at a time of high prices, that they confuse business processes, that they disorganize the normal relations between buyer and seller, and that they accomplish nothing of benefit to anyone. But they do make the administrative lawyers happy because their theories are upheld by the Supreme Court.

The Great Blunder—The Great Milk Plot

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RALPH E. CHURCH
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorials from the Chicago Daily Tribune of August 5, 1948:

THE GREAT BLUNDER

The Moscow talks promise, if not peace, at least a prolongation of the nervous truce as American troops confront Russian troops along the dividing line in Germany. But the crisis need never have come, nor Germany converted into an incipient battleground, if such western leaders as President Roosevelt and the late Prime Minister Neville Chamberlain of Britain had been statesmen.

We could have avoided the war, or, failing that, have shortened it, and we could have avoided the necessity of an occupation, with all of its consequent errors, by seizing a great opportunity that was presented, first, to Britain, and, later, to us. That was to have encouraged and supported the strong anti-Hitler underground opposition in Germany itself, which existed before and almost up to the end of the war. If that had been done, Germans themselves would in all likelihood have disposed of Hitler and the Nazis, ended the war, assumed responsibility for their own country, obviated any occupation, and removed Germany as an arena of contention between Russia and the west.

How this great chance, with all its promise, was thrown away is told by Prof. Hans Rothfels, formerly of the University of Koenigsberg, now of the University of Chicago, in a recent book, The German Opposition to Hitler. Dr. Rothfels makes clear that the powerful German underground made at least one attempt before the war and three during it to obtain western support to unseat the Hitler regime, only to be rebuffed each time.

The first occurred in 1938, at the time of the Munich crisis, and was supported by such powerful figures as Beck, the army chief of staff; Von Brauchitsch, the commander in chief; Von Witzleben, commander of the Berlin garrison; Von Brockdorff, commander of the Potsdam garrison; Von Weizsacker, secretary of state in the foreign office, and Goerdeler, former mayor of Koenigsberg and Leipzig and chancellor-designate of the "shadow cabinet" that was to take over from Hitler.

The conspirators, assuming that Britain and France would oppose Hitler's designs on Czechoslovakia, revealed to Chamberlain, through the chargé d'affaires of the German Embassy in London, plans to seize Hitler and Berlin. The Germans staked their hope of averting a general war on this plan, but they were undone when Chamberlain flew to Munich and sold Czechoslovakia into Hitler's hands. Lord Halifax, then Foreign Secretary, later told the German chargé who had confided the plot to him, "We were not able to be as frank with you as you were with us. At the time you gave us your message we were already considering sending Chamberlain to Germany."

In October 1939, after the war had started, the underground was able to send an emissary, Von Trott, to the United States via Gibraltar with the obvious connivance of the British Foreign Office, which repented too late its double-cross at Munich. He outlined to the State Department the underground's plans to overthrow Hitler, proposed America's good offices in then obtaining a negotiated peace, and was supported by the pre-Nazi Catholic chancellor, Heinrich Bruning, then living here, who obtained an interview with Roosevelt. After first showing interest, Roosevelt discouraged later contacts.

In June 1942, after America was put into war at Pearl Harbor, Louis Lochner, Associated Press correspondent in Berlin, returned to Washington after German internment. He knew many of the underground leaders and had been asked by them to make every effort to see Roosevelt and to obtain favorable consideration for the coming post-Hitler regime. "After several attempts to see the President had failed," Dr. Rothfels states, "he put his request in writing, stating exactly why he desired a personal interview. The reply that he received was negative, and suggested that he desist because of the 'most embarrassing nature' of his request."

Other attempts were made to obtain western support, but the German opposition, turned down at every hand and the victim of mischance in several attempts to dispose of Hitler, finally, in desperation, sought to end his life in the bomb plot of July 20, 1944. By then the unconditional-surrender formula had been announced by Roosevelt, cutting off, as Dr. Rothfels states, any hope for a bearable peace which the German resistance might still have had, and making the usefulness of further contacts with the west highly questionable. Then the bomb plot miscarried, and most of the men who could have given Germany postwar leadership were caught in the investigation and executed.

The Roosevelt administration and its apologists suppressed as much of the story of the German opposition as they could, for as long as they could, and, when forced eventually to admit its existence, gave out a caricature belittling it and the caliber of the men who composed it. Nor is the reason for this any mystery, for the whole record of Roosevelt's persistent refusal to have anything to do with the underground forces, taken together with the Casablanca program for unconditional surrender, affords good ground for believing that Roosevelt was only incidentally interested in overthrowing Hitler, but was more concerned with provoking, entering, and prolonging a war that would add to his personal luster and extend his tenure of political power.

THE GREAT MILK PLOT

Just a week ago Attorney General Tom Clark announced a great propaganda campaign by his Antitrust Division to discover the malefactors who have put the cost of living so high. Obviously his program to exorcise the devils was tied in with Mr. Truman's anti-inflation crusade. The object was to provide campaign ammunition in the hope of deluding a few voters.

On August 12, 1947, nearly a year ago, Mr. Clark announced for the first time that the Antitrust Division was swinging into action to ferret out conspiracies to maintain or to increase present prices. The Division Chief, John F. Sonnett, an old fixer in the Pearl Harbor investigation, came out to Chicago and went into a mysterious huddle with the Federal grand jury.

Nothing happened for 10 months. Then, presto! Last Saturday, 2 days after Clark proclaimed his search for villains and 3 days after Truman demanded controls over inflation, the grand jury returned indictments charging eight Chicago milk companies with conspiracy to divide up markets and two of them with fortifying their position as suppliers to chain stores through a system of rebates to their clients. This is nice timing.

The overwhelming volume of milk involved in the marketing arrangements which Clark's Department challenges goes to chain stores. The retail price of milk in the chains is substantially lower than that for home deliveries and frequently lower than that in other retail stores. The administration, which professes to have dedicated itself to lowering prices, says this is a crime.

The great milk case is on a par with Clark's other famous victory, in which he scored a court success on similar grounds against the A. & P. stores, the country's largest sellers of low-priced groceries.

Top Life Insurance Executive Favors Monetary Commission

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOWARD H. BUFFETT
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 27, 1948

Mr. BUFFETT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am including a statement by Mr. Thomas I. Parkinson, president, the Equitable Life Assurance Society of the United States, which appeared in the Commercial and Financial Chronicle Thursday, July 15, 1948:

Some time ago we suggested that not since 1896 when free silver was the issue has the soundness of money been so important in a presidential campaign as it is this year. In the platform of 1896 it was declared, "The Republican Party is unreservedly for sound money." We are unalterably opposed to every measure calculated to debase our currency." This was a forthright declaration in the face of a popular cry for the abandonment of gold.

We have long since departed from a gold-supported currency; our money supply now consists of $2,000,000,000 of coins, mostly silver, $26,000,000,000 of paper money which is simply a promise to pay, and $140,000,000,000 of bank deposits on which somebody has a right to draw.

It will be seen that by far the greatest part of our present money supply is in bank credit, and it is the expansion of bank credit which has adulterated our money supply and reduced the purchasing value of the dollar. From this flow high prices, demands for higher wages to meet the increasing cost of living, and the doubts and difficulties of making plans which involve dollar costs and dollar values in the future.

The Republican platform adopted last week declares, "We pledge an attack upon the basic causes of inflation, including the following measures," and outstanding among those measures is a sound currency.

In our present monetary situation it is wholly inaccurate to refer to our whole money supply as currency. The declaration in favor of sound monetary policies and a dollar protected from further depreciation requires something more today than a general declaration in favor of a sound currency. The current platform's declaration will have to be implemented in important ways if it is to assure the adoption of those monetary measures which will stop the depreciation of the dollar.

Perhaps a party platform is not the place to detail those measures but the content of this platform's declaration would indicate either that its draftsmen did not feel too sure of the subject matter with which they were dealing, or were again haunted by the old fear that monetary corrective measures would involve possible deflation which for the moment they fear more than further inflation.

It is the expansion of bank credit during the war and since the war which has given us our huge increase in money supply. We were told that when the Government reduced its debt this expansion of bank credit would be reversed and the money supply reduced. The truth is that since the war ended the Government's marketable debt has been reduced by over $35,000,000,000 and meanwhile the money supply has been increased by over $20,000,000,000. Practically all of this increase in money supply which determines the values of the single dollar has been due to the deliberate policies pursued by the monetary and fiscal authorities of the Federal Government.

There is no promise of betterment of the situation in the mere declaration in favor of a sound currency. The Republican platform recognizes money and monetary policies as causes of inflation; the trouble is it does not recognize them as the principal causes of current inflation in this country.

We simply cannot hope for the control of inflation and high prices until the increase in the money supply is stopped and a stable dollar established. We have for some time taken the position that the measures necessary to accomplish this result should be worked out by a monetary commission representing Congress and the nonofficial public. It seems to us that it would have been good politics for the Republican platform to have declared in favor of the creation of such a monetary commission.

Grover Cleveland once said that it is the average citizen who suffers most from inflation; the businessman or the speculator can adjust himself to the changes which it brings. This is true, and unquestionably it will be the great mass of our people who will suffer if the inflationary trend continues.

If our political leaders understood the inflation problem and realized the extent to which it is really an unsound money problem they would realize also that the mass of the people have an interest in and will support sound monetary measures. The failure in Philadelphia to declare for such measures, or for an immediate study of the whole problem by a monetary commission to develop such measures indicates that the politicians have not informed themselves on the complexities of the monetary question enough to enable them to realize its practical importance and to develop a sound, intelligent monetary plank.

Investigation of the problem is hampered by its innate abstruse character and by the fact that our monetary and fiscal authorities—the Treasury Department and the Federal Reserve Board—are not anxious to spread intelligible information which would expose the dangerous character of our financial operations. When our monetary authorities do not supply us with the necessary leadership and when the bankers who are the practical experts in the monetary field do not get excited about the dangerous trend or its correction we cannot expect our political representatives to be very emphatic.

A drastic attack on inflation means a thorough renovation of our "managed money." It means an end to support of Government bond market prices by means which constantly increase bank credit and our swollen money supply. It means that our monetary authorities must promptly cease the unrestricted purchase by the Federal Reserve of Government bonds held by banks. It is true this will reduce the earning assets of the banks, but it is better for the banks to reduce their earning assets than to go on increasing the number of dollars.

It was not easy for the Republican leaders in 1896 to declare emphatically in favor of a gold-secured currency. It would not now be more difficult and might be similarly politically advantageous to declare emphatically for those measures essential to keeping our money supply and its unit, our dollar, sound and stable.

Government Adds to Scrap Steel Shortage

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALVIN F. WEICHEL
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. WEICHEL. Mr. Speaker, the shortage of scrap in the United States necessary for the production of steel has long been a matter of public concern. With plans being discussed to bring scrap from Germany and with the suggestion that the Maritime Commission chop up the war-built fleet to make scrap, yet this Government is taking scrap out of continental United States. During the war the Navy purchased a large Great Lakes passenger ship, the Greater Buffalo, of some 500 feet in length, converted it to an aircraft carrier for the purpose of training, and the ship has been surplus property since the war at a pier in Chicago. Very hurriedly this spring the Maritime Commission offered it for sale for scrapping in continental United States. Not only before the proverbial ink was dry on the award but before the award was actually made the Commission was considering sending the ship to Canada for scrapping. Now I am advised that the Maritime Commission has authorized scrapping in Canada instead of the United States.

It is beyond understanding that the Maritime Commission send ships to foreign countries for scrapping when there is not sufficient scrap in this country to make steel and everyone is trying to bring scrap into the United States from foreign countries.

The former passenger ship is known as the U. S. S. Sable and was the former Greater Buffalo and was operated in the passenger trade on Lake Erie. It is so large that it cannot get through the Welland Canal. It is more than 100 feet wide at the paddle boxes and the canal cannot accommodate ships of more than 80 feet beam. In order to get the ship out of the Great Lakes to Canada for scrapping it would be necessary to cut it down at Buffalo or some other port.

In view of the shortage of scrap in this country and the fact the sale was made for scrapping in the United States I am requesting the Maritime Commission keep the ship for scrapping in the United States where it now is and where it was supposed to be scrapped according to the offer for sale. The ship is still in the United States and I hereby call upon the Maritime Commission to make this ship available for scrapping in the United States. Investigation and search will be made into the matter concerning deals made, pending, or to be made by the Maritime Commission with reference to taking scrap to foreign countries which is needed in the United States.

Jacking Up Prices

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, recently the Chicago Daily News carried an editorial entitled "Jacking Up Prices." It charged that the Truman administration was engaged in blaming speculators and Republicans for high prices and taking no responsibility for the situation which exists under our present foreign policy where we are delivering huge quantities of commodities overseas.

Mr. Speaker, it appears to me that the causes for high prices in a measure are the loose money policies of the administration and to the unusual foreign demands for American goods. This in addition to the false monetary system devised by the New Deal since it came into power in 1933. Our whole monetary system requires a study and investigation in order to ascertain the real cause for the present-day high-price situation.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I am including the editorial in question and at the same time submitting a statement of scarce items which have gone to Europe under the ERP up to June 1948. These items all affect the cost of living:

Wheat	$127,000,000
Wheat flour	39,900,000
Meat	34,800,000
Coal	60,000,000
Petroleum products	75,700,000
Cotton	42,700,000
Tobacco	18,000,000

[From the Chicago Daily News]

JACKING UP PRICES

During the formulation of the Marshall plan, the Daily News warned repeatedly that insufficient note was being taken of the inflationary aspects of the project. The Truman administration, engaged in blaming speculators, Congress, and Republicans generally for high prices, denied that the gigantic foreign-relief program would have any major impact on domestic prices.

On the Chicago Mercantile Exchange last week, on the day that cheese prices are set by Wisconsin trading, prices went up 2 cents a pound, reflecting, dealers assert, heavy British buying at 4½ cents over the market price.

High prices for cheese divert to cheese factories milk that is ordinarily sold fresh, or made into butter. Thus the entire range of dairy products shares in the price rise.

This is merely one of the visible situations in which the taxpayers pay twice for "economic cooperation" with Europe—once in providing the dollars for foreign purchases in the United States, again when those purchases inflate domestic prices.

Surveys show a considerable number of Europeans believe the ECA was deliberately designed to dump our surplus abroad to prevent a price drop and depression. But dairy experts assert that milk production will reach only 116,000,000,000 pounds this year, as compared with 126,000,000,000 in 1945.

We are now accumulating the experience against which to weigh the case for the extent of future Marshall-plan aid. When our sacrifices to improve living standards abroad are realized, perhaps we shall feel entitled to ask whether the recipients of that aid have done everything possible to assist themselves.

Special Session of the Eightieth Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Hon. JOHN W. MCCORMACK, from the Newark Sunday News of August 1, 1948:

(By JOHN W. MCCORMACK)

What will the special session of the Eightieth Congress accomplish? The answer to that lies squarely with the Republicans. This special session can, if the Republicans elect to do so, adjourn in 2 weeks with a splendid record of achievement. Or it can, if the Republicans choose, go home tomorrow and face the people with lame excuses.

The Republicans have charged President Truman with politics in calling this special session, yet from their actions thus far in the session I would say that the Republicans are grossly guilty of political deceit of the highest order.

Is it, I ask, politics for the President to summon the Congress to act against runaway prices? Is it politics for the President to recognize the growing urgency for a solution to the aggravated housing situation? Is it politics for the President to demand that old-age pensions, now pitifully inadequate, be increased to at least bare subsistence level?

CHARGES INDIFFERENCE

I am amazed to observe the bland indifference of the Republican leadership in this special session. I am amazed to discover that men of a once great political party can be so blind to reality, so inexcuseably indifferent to the needs of the people.

I am informed that a powerful segment of the Republican majority in this Congress was actually in favor of going home immediately after the President's message. Fear of the political consequences was all that kept certain GOP leaders from giving the adjournment signal. Was not this decision motivated solely by political considerations?

What will this session accomplish?

The answer to that lies with the Republican Party and its leadership.

From Governor Dewey down, it can, if it chooses, do a great deal. It can check inflation. It can control prices so that the average wage earner at least breaks even for his labors after paying the butcher, the baker, and the landlord. It can give our millions of veterans homes instead of the opposition propaganda passed out by the real-estate lobby. It can afford our aged, who must live on pitifully small pensions, enough income to meet a minimum standard for food, clothing, and shelter.

Failing to do these things, promptly and in good faith, the Republican Congress will have repudiated its party's 1948 platform. The Republican Party, indeed, will have repudiated itself before the American people and stand, for once and all, exposed as the agent for vested interests.

In particular, the people are suffering from the high cost of living and of lack of housing. The cry of "politics" will not bring necessary relief to the people on these important matters.

This is the time for action, not promises. This is the time for performance.

The President's Message

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT N. McGARVEY
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. McGARVEY. Mr. Speaker, President Truman sounded the death rattle of the Democratic Party at the party's convention in Philadelphia when he announced his intention to call a special session of Congress. As we convene in extraordinary session in honor of the State of Missouri's Turnip Day, the sound still echoes in our ears.

No one in the Democratic Party has yet offered an answer to the vital inquiry as to why the current majority party should accept without question a package of legislative proposals from the leader of the minority and proceed without questioning or hesitation to enact them into law. Nor as President Truman, who was a Member of Congress during the New Deal heyday and is therefore in a very good position to supply the information, offered to tell us why his recommendations were never put into effect during the 15 years when his own party controlled not only the White House but the Congress as well. For let us not forget that what the President states we can accomplish in 15 days, his own party, the tired old New Deal, has consistently promised the people for 15½ years. This indirect compliment to the Republican Party is, of course, unintentional but quite significant.

We do not, however, intend to return it by enacting the President's legislative program. It would be a dismal confession of the failure of the Republican Party and their inability to uphold the confidence of the people. Furthermore, we have the word of no one except President Truman himself that the people of the Republic are anxious to have his proposals enacted into law. And contrary to what has been stated it is not our 1948 campaign platform which he wants enacted. Our platform contained no semisocialistic proposals, long advocated by the managed-economy experts, paternalistic and definitely totalitarian in their essence. Should we adopt such a program, it would announce to the world that America had finished with the philosophy of government which had made us a nation greater than any other on the face of the earth. It would betray the American people as a race morally bankrupt and so weak that they must look to their politicians for what free peoples normally do for themselves.

And where is the money to come from? Has President Truman answered that question yet? Or do the predictions of a deficit for fiscal 1949 not worry him? Is it not odd that all of his proposals require the establishment of huge bureaucracies and the expenditure of vast sums of public funds which, incidentally, we just do not have? We are, I presume, supposed to accept with a straight face the fact that the President's urgent appeal for immediate enactment of 15-year-old money-spending and employment-giving promises is only coincidental to the coming election. Even his price control and rationing program would require the setting up of a vast Federal agency and the wasting of enormous amounts of the taxpayers' money.

And yet, all economic experts agree that one of the primary reasons for inflation is the present size of the Federal budget. Yet not once has this fact been mentioned by the President, nor an appeal for economy directed by him to the many departments and agencies under his control. Instead, he openly boasts of the fact that he prevented Congress from cutting his oversized budget to the amount they wished.

This is the same President, who with a similar turn of thought, boasts to the farmers that he has increased the prices consumers must pay for their products, yet tells the consumers, in the same speech, that the Republicans are to blame for the present high prices. And what is his remedy? Price control and rationing! Controls to divert goods from their normal channels into the black market. Controls to return the wartime days when the housewife, existing under the Government's assurance that she need pay no more than a certain price for food, finds no food at all when she arrives at the store.

For the truth of the matter is that controls are only a stop-gap measure. If the Republicans did not have the welfare of the people at heart, they could enact President Truman's inflation program and prove to the country for all time and without a shadow of a doubt the fallacy that price control and rationing will solve the problem of the high cost of living. It does not even skim the cream off the top of the problem, much less get to the very heart and source of the difficulty. We may have price control at the retail level, but it will never reduce the cost required to manufacture, grow, produce, and market the product sold. And until the administration has the moral courage to attack the high cost of living at its various sources the high prices of goods below the marketing level will continue, price control or no. And the imposition of price controls on products at the retail level would never reduce those costs. On the contrary, we would be forced to maintain price controls, a temporary, wartime measure, indefinitely in order to keep prices in line. There could be no better way to sovietize the American economy, and banish our sacred heritage of freedom and individual liberty. And there could be no better way to bring about a debacle of depression more devastating and lasting than that which we witnessed during the thirties when the tired old New Deal reigned supreme on the strength of promises never kept.

So, let us ask the President and his party when the wisecracks and politics are going to be junked, and commonsense substituted for demagoguery and a complete disregard for the welfare of the people. For the people are not stupid as the Democratic Party seems to think. They can recognize political motives, no matter how disguised and they can realize that the office of the Chief Executive of the Nation as well as their representatives in Congress should not be cheapened by using them to further the political motives of one man. We are in session now and we will be glad to forget the manner in which the session was called, we will forget Turnip Day and the other county politician's witticisms and unwarranted attacks. We only ask that a forgotten pledge of cooperation in the interest of the Nation, which was made to us in January of 1947 before an election loomed, be remembered and that Mr. Truman remember also that America is not a socialistic state and should be governed accordingly. This session is not a challenge to Congress; it is a challenge to the Executive to prove that past mistakes will be rectified and his worthiness to carry on as President of the United States for four more years upheld. This is a chance few Presidents have been given—let him take it if he dares!

The Fake Emergency

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RALPH E. CHURCH
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Chicago Daily Tribune of August 5, 1948:

THE FAKE EMERGENCY

Mr. Truman in issuing his proclamation for the extra session of Congress merely stated that the public interest requires that the Congress be convened. Senator TAFT, who knows something about the Constitution, promptly pointed out that Mr. Truman, in his call, had not cited any extraordinary occasion for the session, as required by section 3 of article II.

Neither in his call nor in his message to Congress did Mr. Truman say that there was an extraordinary occasion or a national emergency. He merely implied that there was one. How sincere or how political he was in giving this impression has been highlighted by a remarkable demand by Mr. Truman at a press conference that Congress should pass legislation to reestablish regulation W, dealing with installment credit controls.

This regulation had been repealed during the regular sessions of the Eightieth Congress. When Chairman WOLCOTT, of the House Banking and Currency Committee, heard of Truman's demand that it be revived by legislation, he read from the law repealing the regulation a proviso that these controls could be invoked in any national emergency declared by the President. The President, he said, "can declare an economic emergency or any other kind of emergency. We made it very clear that the emergency did not have to be incident to war. So I think we can agree that if conditions warranted a special session the President could have used those powers."

Here we have Mr. Truman professing that there is an emergency, but refusing to proclaim an emergency or even to admit it to himself for the purpose of possessing himself of powers he says he needs. The emergency that Mr. Truman has in mind isn't national so much as personal. It is dated November 2.

An Erudite Letter

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EUGENE J. KEOGH
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter addressed to the editor of the New York Times by former State senator, Leon Fischel. Senator Fischel is recognized as a foremost student of the French people and language but, in addition, has the analytical mind and pen of an experienced legislator and public official whose viewpoint is sought and relied upon by many people of widely varying social and political philosophies. That he "takes on" as eminent an expert as Arthur Krock is a tribute to his courage. The senator's letter follows:

VALUE OF SPECIAL SESSION—ELECTORATE IS ENABLED TO APPRAISE PARTIES IN ACTION, WRITER SAYS

To the EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES:

Your Mr. Krock some days ago quoted "toujours l'audace" as the Napoleonic military maxim.

"De l'audace, encore de l'audace, et toujours de l'audace," was what Danton proclaimed in 1792, the day after the battle of Valmy, when the "mob of cobblers and tailors" saved the sacred soil of France from foreign invasion.

These mercenaries were in the pay of the coalition of reactionary kings attempting to crush Frenchmen to whom justice and liberty were not merely language in the political platform of a convention but expressions which they believed had to be implemented and exercised so that they might become part of the process of day-by-day living.

Is Mr. Krock irked that President Truman has called a special session of Congress? Could he suggest another method whereby the electorate might be enlightened more expeditiously and effectively as to the basic differences between the Democratic and Republican attitudes toward the vital problems of the day? For once, a real opportunity is afforded to render more than lip service to principle.

CAMPAIGN PROMISES

The public is now able to measure both the willingness and honesty of the personalities within the political parties and of the parties themselves to carry out their political platform. It is somewhat novel to be in a position to do before an election what one promises to do after an election. But since all agree that the times require a new approach, who would cavil at giving it a trial?

The President's speech was not in the Napoleonic vein, Heaven forfend. Mr. Krock must have written this with tongue in cheek. But it was a clarion call by an honest American to his fellow men to protect our system of government from enemies both within and without its borders.

The issues are becoming clear. Congress can now show itself to be more than a forum for the ventilation of ideas. It can crystallize the thinking of the American people into action. Action that will show the world that our democracy when put to the test can be responsive to the wishes of the majority of its citizens.

In the long run, the American public cannot but gain from this special session. My experience while in the legislature has proved to me that the legislative processes have remained incomprehensible in a great many respects to the average citizen. Though not shrouded in mystery, their ramifications only serve to confuse the voter as to why certain laws were passed or failed of enactment.

CLARIFYING PROCESSES

Let there be light on this all-too-frequently obscure aspect of legislative process. Let the parties assume the responsibilities, arduous as they may become, that are the necessary concomitants of the privileges that the party leaders love so well to exercise. Let each legislator, regardless of party, be given an opportunity to take his stand before the American people in a way they can understand.

Let the miasma that has veiled certain activity or lack thereof of the Eightieth Congress be dispelled so that the finger may be squarely pointed at those who have failed to accept the responsibility of their high office.

Not only we, as Americans, but the world at large owes a debt of gratitude to President Truman for convening Congress in special session. Here for everyone to see is the democratic process at work in our land.

May we never cease to have "cobblers and tailors" with the courage and capacity ably to respond to their country's call when its very foundations are being menaced.

LEON FISCHEL.

Cheering News for DP's

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an editorial from the New York Herald Tribune of August 3, 1948:

CHEERING NEWS FOR DP'S

The State Department's report on job prospects for displaced persons makes fine reading. There will be jobs for all who can possibly come next year—more jobs than the 100,000 now allowed to come can fill. The State Department has received that many offers from farmers, industrialists, and business firms even before a commission is appointed and the screening of newcomers begun. New York alone estimates that 50,000 can find employment in the State, although that many cannot come here because the law makes specifications about geographical distribution. Many bids are for farm workers and domestic servants to whom the law's specifications about housing should present least difficulty.

The report is good news for the displaced persons who can qualify under a too-restrictive law. Even more important, it betters the prospect for changing that law to cover many more. It furnishes the concrete answer to the fears and begrudgings of those legislators who insisted upon the unjust and unnecessary restrictions. And whether or not the special session acts to liberalize the law, there will still be time before any big-scale immigration can be arranged. With a new Congress, a fresh mandate from the people, a sounder law can surely be written and America's responsibility to help resolve the tragic situation of war's refugees in a clear and final and hopeful fashion be fulfilled.

Who Did They Think Eisenhower Was?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GORDON L. McDONOUGH

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Saturday Evening Post:

WHO DID THEY THINK EISENHOWER WAS?

Back in the early stages of the defunct draft-Eisenhower movement, a writer in PM, since metamorphosed as the New York Star, explained that "the social and economic views of General Eisenhower * * * do not overly concern the labor leaders who want him at the head of the Democratic ticket. Their attitude can be summed up in the words of one labor spokesman: 'Working with a thoroughgoing liberal Congress, Eisenhower would have to go along.'"

The same cynical attitude toward Eisenhower as a political figure was shared by the other groups in the movement. His repeated refusals to accept political office were brushed aside as some coy, hard-to-get routine which didn't matter. The Confederates cared little whether or not the general felt as they did about civil rights for Negroes. Mayor Hague and the other city bosses were indifferent to Eisenhower's views on good government or anything else. The Jimmy Roosevelt liberals were equally unconcerned. All these characters were united on only one thing: Ike Eisenhower would make a wonderful label to paste on a package that was rapidly becoming a slow mover. Once in, he would be expected to "go along." In any event, the patronage would be safe.

There is nothing startling about this desire on the part of a hybrid coalition of politicians to ride back into their jobs on the coattails of a great military leader whose popularity is enormous. That part of the affair is no more mysterious than the practice of giving away refrigerators at quiz programs or persuading Miss America to endorse a muffin mix. What does baffle us, however, is the extraordinary estimate of the dignity and character of Dwight Eisenhower by those who actually imagined he could be persuaded to be the candidate of a party which had no interest in his attitudes, his probable ability as a President, or anything about him except that he would look mighty good up there surrounded by a lot of flags and the bands playing Hail to the Chief.

All this added up as a tawdry tribute to a great military commander to whom his country owes genuine honor, and it is likely that Eisenhower saw it that way, too. After all, as one commentator wrote at the time, the general reads the newspapers and could hardly have missed the point of the "draft"—namely, "Come over to Macedonia and help us." A man accustomed to laying out plans of attack and carrying them into effect could hardly have helped wondering what he was supposed to do in January, when Boss Hague came to call, followed by Leon Henderson, Senator Pepper, Max Lerner, seven irate Confederates, four Roosevelt sons, Herman Talmadge, and Winchell, in that order. Even if it were not revolting enough to serve as barker for such a motley group of performers, Ike Eisenhower must often have asked himself, "What price glory?"

If the sponsors of the movement ever asked themselves anything about Eisenhower beyond his campaign possibilities, it isn't in the record. No intimacy with General Eisenhower is needed to cause one to guess that this attitude by those who urged him to run was among the reasons why he didn't care to.

Education in Poland Under Russian-Dominated Regime

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS S. GORDON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, I am inserting an article in the Appendix of the RECORD which appeared in the August 4 issue of the Washington Times-Herald. I am calling this material to the attention of Congress because it readily illustrates the methods and type of education now being imposed on the freedom-loving Polish people. It is disheartening to me to see such inroads being made into the Polish educational system by the present Russian-dominated regime. The article itself is an unbiased and factual contribution of what is happening to Poland's schools and it indicates quite clearly to what extent the youth of Poland is being forced to suffer.

As one who has consistently fought to bring the true story of sorrowful present-day Poland to the attention of the Congress, I feel that this article will and should merit our deepest and most earnest consideration.

POLISH REDS CONTROL SCHOOLS, RETURNING D. C. TEACHER SAYS

(By Estelle Gaines)

The Communist Party in Poland has virtually taken over the schools, teaching the susceptible younger generation that in the United States everyone wears the white mask of the Ku Klux Klan, waves a burning cross and plots against the people.

So says Anne Waterman, 22, of 4711 Rodman Street NW., who has just returned from teaching English at the University of Warsaw for nearly 2 years. She got the job through the Polish Embassy here after her graduation from Vassar.

AMERICAN WARMONGERS

Anne, slim, fragil, and brown-haired, came home because it was getting impossible to give a true picture of America to her students. The Red propaganda that all Americans are warmongers and enemies of Poland has taken effect, and Communist sympathizers made things as unpleasant for her as possible.

Recently, whenever she spoke English in public, some fanatical youngster, comparable to the youthful followers of Henry Wallace here, would make loud remarks about capitalists and American imperialistic warmongers, Miss Waterman said.

OLDER POLES AREN'T RED

The older Poles, who love America and our form of democracy, have not been converted to communism but they live in fear of Red retribution unless they submit quietly to the party.

"During the German occupation, every Pole knew that every other Pole was a friend, but under the Communists a Pole doesn't know whom to trust."

As far as she knows, she said, there is no organized underground against the Communists. Most of the professors at the university were not actual members of the party and felt themselves above "politics." However, if things get worse, Miss Waterman expects them to join up as a matter of expediency.

LISTEN TO VOICE OF AMERICA

Poles listen freely to the Voice of America, and some who understand English, to the American Forces Network. Miss Waterman believes the "Voice" does a great deal of good in bringing the real truth to the people, but says more broadcasts are needed.

She said that just before she left, the police were stopping visitors to the American information center, where Poles can read many American periodicals and newspapers. The police asked the visitors their names and addresses and warned them not to "be seen around here again."

LIVED ON BREAD AND SPUDS

Anne learned Polish from her two roommates and in the winter lived off a diet of mostly bread and potatoes. In the summer she said, there was plenty of fresh fruit.

She urged American teachers to try to get jobs in European schools, in order to combat the Communist propaganda. Anne hopes to return to Europe herself with the State Department. Anne is the daughter of Dr. Alan T. Waterman, Navy Department physicist.

"Dixiecrat" Is Wrong Name

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. L. MENDEL RIVERS
OF SOUTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. RIVERS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the News and Courier, Charleston, S. C., for August 4, 1948:

"DIXIECRAT" IS WRONG NAME

Governor Thurmond is right in pointing out that the States Rights Party, of which he is the choice for Presidential nominee, should not be called the "Dixiecrat" party. The term was coined by a headline writer in search of a handy word that would not require too many letters.

"Dixiecrat" is a misnomer. States' rights, though heard mostly in the South, is not exclusively a southern doctrine. The principles of the States Rights Party, stripped of purely southern elements prompted by the large Negro population, are closer to the beliefs of millions of solid Americans in the North, West and East than the present outpourings of vote-catchers under the labels of Democrat and Republican.

Both the big parties are competing for the "common man" under the masquerade of formerly honorable names. The States righters are rallying around the foundations of the Republic. They are not Dixiecrats. Friends of the movement, which will not die with the November election regardless of the outcome, do it a disservice in clinging to the term.

The Licensed Beverage Industries Corrects Treasury Department

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EUGENE J. KEOGH
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement of F. E. M. Whiting, vice admiral, United States Navy, retired, in his capacity as president, Licensed Beverage Industries, Inc. The statement refers to and points up unfortunate deficiencies in the recently released study of the Division of Tax Research of the Treasury Department entitled "Federal Excise Taxes on Alcoholic Beverages." It is fitting that the position of the industry be set forth, and I am, accordingly, pleased to set forth Admiral Whiting's statement in full, as follows:

Failure of the Treasury Department to give proper consideration to all of the factors relating to liquor taxation in its recently released study, Federal Excise Taxes on Alcoholic Beverages, was labeled unfortunate today by Vice Adm. F. E. M. Whiting, United States Navy (retired), president of Licensed Beverage Industries, Inc. Admiral Whiting was referring to the 101-page analysis issued July 19 by the Division of Tax Research of the United States Treasury Department for the purpose, according to the Department, of providing information for use in determining whether the taxes in question should be modified.

Although the study was intended to assist legislators in their deliberations on tax reductions, according to Admiral Whiting, the analysis overlooked and gave inadequate weight to a number of important circumstances which have considerable bearing on distilled spirits taxes.

The LBI president pointed to the following deficiencies in the Treasury Department study:

1. According to the United States Department of Commerce, per capita consumption of distilled spirits fell from 1.39 gallons in 1946 to 1.28 gallons in 1947. Despite this fact, the Treasury Department study stated flatly that the consumption of alcoholic beverages had risen almost continuously since repeal. Further, according to Admiral Whiting, while the Department of Commerce does not issue interim figures, trade reports during the past few months indicate that consumption of distilled spirits has fallen sharply as compared with the same period a year ago.

Last year, according to the Department of Commerce, consumer outlays for distilled spirits fell by approximately $500,000,000, or almost 10 percent.

2. In the Treasury Department analysis no mention is made of the adverse effect the above circumstances are having on the approximately 200,000 retail and wholesale outlets selling distilled spirits.

3. Significantly, Federal excise-tax collections from distilled spirits, as reported by another division of the Treasury Department, show a drop of 15 percent during the first 5 months of this year, as compared with a year ago.

4. The Treasury Department release declares that "roughly half of the retail price of popular-brand liquor" comprises Federal tax. Yet, it goes on "there is no way to determine how illicit liquor operations would be affected by different (presumably lower) tax rates."

Admiral Whiting declared that here was a concrete example of "the right hand not knowing what the left hand was doing."

He based this observation on the report of the Alcohol Tax Unit of the Bureau of Internal Revenue which showed that illicit still seizures by Federal authorities during the month of May 1948 were 13 percent higher than in the same month in 1947. For the 11-month period ending May 1948 seizures increased by 9 percent.

"Obviously, the higher the Federal tax rate on distilled spirits the greater is the incentive to the bootlegger," Admiral Whiting said. "This is merely a matter of sound common business sense. The bootlegger pays no Federal taxes, or State, or local taxes, and enjoys a sharp competitive advantage over the legitimate distillers.

As reported by the Alcohol Tax Unit, the indicated daily producing capacity of the stills seized during the 11-month period ending May 1948, was sufficient to provide an average annual output of 59,000,000 gallons. This would represent an annual tax loss to the Federal Government of almost $530,000,000.

"This figure does not give any recognition to the number of stills not detected by the Federal Government or to the stills seized by State and local enforcement officials," Admiral Whiting said. "Obviously, if all these factors were taken into account the amount the Government is losing on illicit still operations is astronomical. This loss can only be traced to high taxes since bootleggers do not thrive when prices are low."

"The United States Department of Commerce annual per capita consumption figures for distilled spirits show conclusively that today's American is drinking more moderately.

"For example, the highest per capita consumption level reached in this country since repeal, according to the United States Department of Commerce, was 1.39 gallons in the calendar year 1946. In 1850, per capita consumption of distilled spirits was 2.24 gallons, in 1860 the per capita level was 2.86 gallons. During the years 1906 and 1914 the level ranged from 1.43 to 1.51 gallons of distilled spirits per person.

"People today certainly are drinking more moderately than was the case in the last half of the nineteenth century and first two decades of the twentieth century."

A Chapter in Politics That Repeats Itself

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN DAVIS LODGE
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. LODGE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Arthur Krock from today's New York Times:

IN THE NATION—A CHAPTER IN POLITICS THAT REPEATS ITSELF

(By Arthur Krock)

For the second time in 4 years a Republican candidate for President is obliged by patriotic and other responsible considerations to hold to mere skirmishing his offensive operations on a major sector of the campaign battlefront—that dealing with the foreign policy and acts of the executive in power. The candidate is the same citizen, Governor Dewey, who had this experience previously, and once again the Washington dispatches proclaim the event.

In 1944 Mr. Dewey, as the opposition candidate for President, had two promising lines of attack—one, with respect to President Roosevelt's policies toward Soviet Russia in their bearing toward an effective United Nations set-up; the other that Pearl Harbor had happened despite the fact that we had previously broken the Japanese naval code. Usually a Presidential aspirant, with arguments and exhibits like these, could have legitimately assailed the party in power on these grounds. But Mr. Dewey was deprived of the first line of offense when Mr. Roosevelt chose the middle of the campaign of 1944 to announce the primary steps to establish the United Nations, and he lost the second when General Marshall, then Chief of Staff, asked him in the interest of a Nation at war to say nothing about the Japanese code-break, a request necessarily compelling on any man worthy to be President.

Now Mr. Dewey is running again, and the foreign situation is in a state of peril and disorder which many informed critics attribute in part to mistaken administration policies and performances since the anti-Axis Powers met at Tehran. These critics have offered documentation to support their contention with reference to German policy and particularly to the situation in which the western powers find themselves in Berlin.

AS IN 1944

But, as recent Washington dispatches make plain, Mr. Dewey, and Mr. Dulles, his principal adviser, have decided to limit themselves to very general observations about the London conferences that preceded the Potsdam pact and the meeting at Potsdam itself. And once again the reasons are patriotic—this time an agreement on their part that there must be no show of disunity over the German situation which Moscow could use to advantage against the European recovery program and other Allied policies abroad; and that a threat to national security is implicit in any such show of disunity.

Yet those who have discussed this matter with the candidate and his chief adviser are confident that, if the world were not sitting on a powder keg, Mr. Dewey would have very severe things to say about the administration policies and acts that led up to Berlin and the situations in Germany and the Far East. They do not blame the military commanders—Generals Eisenhower and Clay—for signing the compact that failed to reserve for the United States a corridor into and out of Berlin in all circumstances. But they greatly criticize the political authorities who prevailed with the opinion that no specific provision was necessary. And they trace this to the preceding conferences in London.

If the Republicans were free to say what they think, they could argue from this that the current political power, the administration, represented by two Presidents, their Secretaries of State and their Ambassadors at the conferences, failed in its responsibility to give sound counsel and on the contrary gave unsound counsel. They could go on to say that the acutely perilous situation which has resulted makes it even more necessary to turn over the Government to those who were aware of the mistakes when they were made and promise to repair and not to repeat them.

WETTING DOWN THE POWDER

But to do this Mr. Dewey and Mr. Dulles would be moving to split the United States front abroad at a most dangerous point. However strongly they could make their case, it would become the case of Moscow and be turned into propaganda that conceivably could damage the cause of ultimate peace according to the western concept. Mr. Wallace, scorning such considerations, already had demonstrated that.

Hence they have decided for the second successive time in a national campaign to store away what in other circumstances would be heavy ammunition against the party in power, the kind that in periods of peace has decided the result of an election battle. And, though this decision is doubtless distasteful to some Republicans in Congress and to important organs of the party support, it agrees with the view of Senator VANDENBERG, who has steadfastly preserved and even strengthened the bipartisan front on foreign policy.

Mr. Dewey's mention of the London conferences after his conference with Mr. VANDENBERG and Mr. Dulles at Pawling, the first that has come from him, suggests that he will not maintain complete silence on the point. But it is also now obvious that he will limit his discussions of foreign policy to very broad and cautious statements, as in 1944, in acknowledgment of practical necessities and patriotic requirements.

When President Truman attacked the Republicans on domestic policy in his acceptance speech at the Philadelphia convention, and gave them only the faintest of praise for their essential contribution to the bipartisan front, he offered provocation for a less responsible campaign attitude on their part. Fortunately, as it now appears, this provocation is to be ignored.

Partition of Ireland Only Obstacle to Complete Amity Between Great Britain and Ireland

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER A. LYNCH
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. LYNCH. Mr. Speaker, recently speaking before the Irish Dail, the Minister for External Affairs, the equivalent of our Secretary of State, Mr. Sean MacBride, emphasized the necessity for the elimination of the Irish border in Northern Ireland, if there is ever to be complete harmony and good will between Ireland and Great Britain. Because of the earnestness and complete frankness of the remarks made by Mr. MacBride I feel that they should be brought to the attention of Members of Congress in order that they might gain a better picture of the border question in Ireland and its importance in world affairs.

Speaking in the Irish Dail on the vote for his department, Mr. Sean MacBride, Minister for External Affairs, said:

I do not propose to deal with partition at any length in this debate, but I think that I should take this occasion to emphasize the importance of this issue. The continuance of partition precludes us from taking our rightful place in the affairs of Europe. I believe that the British Government and people are approaching the realization that a statesmanlike policy lies in the direction of securing the complete friendship and cooperation of this island and in the realization that a united and free Ireland is as essential to Britain's welfare as it is to Ireland's.

We, on our part, want to hold out the hand of friendship to Britain, but so long as partition remains, it will inevitably mar the relationship between our two islands. We want and are quite prepared to bury the past provided that the present holds out a realization of our right to national self-determination. The wise and statesmanlike approach on Britain's part is to assist in the removal of this sore and of all other reminders of the unhappy history of our past relationships. One of the difficulties that we have to contend with in relation to partition is that to Britain it is only one of many problems; it is always easier to shelve a problem, especially an uncomfortable one. I should like to urge upon the statesmen of Great Britain the very real urgency and importance of this problem from our point of view. It has often been said, and I think it is commonplace even in British political circles, that the tragedy of Anglo-Irish realtionship lies in the fact that British realization of the realities of our problems always came too late. Nothing can be gained by delaying the adoption of a statesmanlike approach to this very serious problem.

Two points emerge now possibly more clearly than ever before; first, the artificial division of our national territory is something that no generation of Irishmen and that no Irish Government will ever acquiesce in or accept. Secondly, that so long as it continues, partition will constitute a definite obstacle to the kind of relationship between Ireland and Britain which it is in the interest not merely of the two countries but of the world as a whole to bring about.

In earlier debates in this House I have already referred to the economic disadvantages that result from the continued division of our country—economic disadvantages that affect the welfare of our people on both sides of the border. If we in the 26 counties have in the present situation to be a drain on the resources of the United States or on the dollar resources of the sterling area reserve, it is due practically entirely to the fact that the industrial arm of our country has been amputated. On the other hand our people in the 6 northeastern counties have to undergo very heavy taxation and shortages because they are cut off from the agricultural arm of their country. A very large proportion of their exports remain unrequited while they are deprived of substantial markets for their own produce in the rest of Ireland.

It has been urged that the reunification of Ireland would in some way adversely affect the industrial potential of the six counties; that shipyards or other heavy industries would be hit. I do not think that this would be so and I feel certain that we would all be prepared to satisfy our six-county friends on this issue. The industrial potential of the six counties is of as much importance to a united Ireland as it is to Britain. On the contrary, our markets would provide them with an additional outlet; I think, too, that we might be of some assistance in helping the sale of Irish linen abroad. I think that complaints would be far more likely to come from some of our industrialists here who would fear the competition from Belfast. I have great respect and admiration for the business and industrial genius of our fellow countrymen in the northeast. Their enterprise and competition would, I think, benefit the country as a whole.

It has also been suggested that if partition were ended, the religious and civil liberties of the people in the six counties would in some way be endangered. I do not know whether this is a real or an argumentative fear, but in any event, I feel I am expressing the unanimous view of this house in saying that we would be prepared to give them any additional constitutional guaranties that might be reasonably required to lay these fears to rest. There are ample safeguards in our constitution as regards religious and civil liberties. I am certain that we would not hesitate to strengthen these, if necessary, to meet their viewpoint.

I do not think I need dwell more on the question of partition beyond saying that every section of the community in the 26 counties would welcome the representatives of our lost counties, be they Catholic or Protestant, Republican or Unionist. We have three things in common which are fundamental, especially in this troubled era: One, we all believe in a mode of life founded on Christian principles; two, we are all firm believers in democracy and in the principles of civil liberty; three, lastly, but not leastly, we are all Irish and take pride in that fact.

In dealing with partition I have already dealt with the major problem of Anglo-Irish relationship. Apart from this major problem, I am glad to be able to tell the House that since the estimates of my Department last came up for consideration, there has been an improvement in mutual feelings between our two countries. Not least in helping to promote better understanding have been the steps which are being taken by the British Government to remove some of the startling conflicts of nationality law that existed between our two countries. Under British law as it has existed hitherto, our citizens were regarded as British subjects, whereas, of course, position under Irish law was guided by our constitution and our own nationality act.

A very serious effort to meet our viewpoint was made by Mr. Atlee's government and embodied in the bill which has just passed the British House of Commons. Some of the provisions of the bill as passed by the Commons still fall considerably short of our viewpoint, such, for instance, as the imposition of non-Irish status on our fellow countrymen in the six counties, and clauses dealing with the retention of British nationality. However, the provisions of the bill as adopted by the House of Commons constitute a vast improvement on the position that has existed hitherto.

I welcome the advent of this bill as a constructive step that has already helped to form a link in the chain of better relationship between our two islands. Its importance lies, perhaps, not so much in its actual practical effects as in the indication it gives of a real desire to understand our viewpoint. Therefore, despite the infirmities which it may still possess vis-à-vis our point of view, I heartily welcome it as a piece of constructive and statesmanlike legislation that can only improve relationships between our two islands.

I hasten to say that my welcome to this bill is limited, of course, to it in the form in which it left the House of Commons. I do not think it would be proper for me to discuss the details of this bill or the amendments which were introduced in the House of Lords and subsequently removed by the House of Commons, but I think I can say without impropriety that the amendments introduced in the House of Lords, if adopted, would entirely nullify the good effect this measure would otherwise have on Anglo-Irish relationship. I sincerely hope that the majority in the House of Lords will appreciate the importance of not destroying the value and constructiveness of this step toward better relationship.

I hesitated to deal with this matter in this debate but decided to do so as I was made aware that the opposition and the Deputies in this House were anxious to have the Government's viewpoint. I am glad to be able to add that there is complete identity of views held by the last Government and the present Government. The views of the last Government and of the present Government were, of course, communicated to the British Government.

It might, perhaps, be well that I should refer to a misconception which seems to exist in some quarters in Britain. This misconception is not prevalent, but it does exist, and I would like to dispel it as far as I can. It is that the dominant factor in our political relations with Great Britain is a feeling of traditional ill will toward that country and its people. That is the reverse of the truth. No people has shown itself more ready to lay aside resentments once their causes were removed than our people. It would be more true to say that there is a great fund of potential good will toward Britain in this country; that there is a keen perception among our people of the community of interest that exists between our two countries; that there is a general feeling of sympathy and even admiration aroused by the manner in which the people of Britain faced adversity during the war and are courageously now undertaking the rebuilding of their economy. Difficulties in our relations arise not from any outworn prejudice or barren hatreds but rather from concrete obstacles such as partition, and such as any short-sighted efforts to retain outworn forms of a past era that can only serve as an unfortunate reminder of an unhappy and tragic history. If we are to create a sound framework of our relations with Britain, it must be appreciated that what matters is substance and not form. Political forms have sense and usefulness only insofar as they express political realities. Outworn forms which are only reminders of the historically unhappy past can only act as irritants. As irritants they endanger and frustrate the relationship which they are intended to express and preserve.

The British Crown may well be the traditional rallying point for Britain, Australia, New Zealand, or Canada. If I were an Englishman or an Australian, I probably would feel considerable attachment to the British Crown and would attach value to the traditional forms that go with it. The descendents of British pioneers that built the present commonwealth under a common crown may take an understandable pride in their common British origin. They may well choose to express their association by adopting forms that are part and parcel of British constitutional history. We, in no way criticize their view. They are quite understandable. But there is no parallel between the history of the commonwealth countries and ours.

We are a small country with a very different history, a history which has been one of continual struggle for survival as a nation. We take pride in our history, in our culture, in our race, and in our Nation. We resent anything that takes away from that pride of nationhood or race.

We want to be friendly with our big neighbor not merely because she is a big neighbor, but because we have many things in common. The Crown and the outward forms that belong to British constitutional history are merely reminders of an unhappy past that we want to bury, that have no realities for us and only serve as irritants. I have said all these things frankly as I feel that a clear understanding of this position can only help to bring about more real cooperation. An examination of the history of the last quarter of a century will, I think, show that many of these forms in the past only served to prevent closer understanding.

We have very close relationships indeed with many great countries that are far more distant from us such as the United States, Canada, and Australia. Millions of our people have lived and settled in these countries. No question of forms enters into our relationship and it is always most friendly and useful.

I have spent some considerable time in dealing with our relationship with Britain because of my desire to bring about the realization of our viewpoint in Britain as I think that this is of primary importance. Our relationship with the United States is so obviously close and friendly that I hardly need refer to it.

You Can't Force Unconstitutional Federal Police Powers Down the Throats of the Citizens of Our Great Southland

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK W. BOYKIN
OF ALABAMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. BOYKIN. Mr. Speaker, I was glad to learn that the Senate late last evening decided to abandon the futile effort to force one segment of the so-called civil-rights program through at this special session of Congress.

Certainly there is no element of an emergency about passing the anti-poll-tax feature of that program.

Mr. Speaker, I am in receipt of a communication from one of America's war heroes. He is a member of one of Alabama's finest families. He is a soldier, lawyer, scholar, and a profound thinker. He wrote the letter to some of America's well-known columnists. It is replete with factual knowledge of the great problem facing our people today.

Mr. Speaker, the argument is so masterfully stated that I am submitting it for the RECORD and hope that my every colleague on both sides of the Capitol will take time out to read this marvelous writing of Mr. Garet Van Antwerp 3d, my dear friend from my own home city of Mobile, Ala.:

MOBILE, ALA., July 21, 1948.

MESSRS. JOSEPH and STEWART ALSOP,
Care of New York Herald Tribune, Inc.,
New York, N. Y.

SIRS: Your column recently published concerning the split at the Philadelphia convention between the southern Democrats and their former affiliates from north, east, and west forcefully strikes the writer hereof as an outstanding example of the ignorance, bigotry, and active, yet blind, antipathy felt toward the South as a section, by large numbers of our nonsouthern citizens.

The subject of civil rights and social segregation has, for decades, been a regular, misused political pawn, to the undying shame of our national political chess players. You speak shallowly of the "great process of social change" which is taking place. It is to be noted that you, like many others of your self-appointed columnist-prophets, as usual only faintly scratch the surface of the basic problem.

You are correct in your surmise that there is a great movement afoot, but you fail to recognize that your so-called social change—and, of course, you apply your thinking in that sphere essentially to the white-Negro situation in the Southern States—is merely an indicium of the basic movement.

As history reveals the great reaction against the principles—or we might say, the ideology—of the Roman Empire, so now the world is undergoing a movement of reaction against the principles of a system which has grown upon and controlled the world for the past several hundred years. We are passing through a period of reaction to the ideology of capitalism. (For the record, I wish to assert at this point that I am not anticapitalistic. I firmly believe in the principles of free enterprise and individual freedom and self-government based upon true and honest interpretation of our Constitution.) We do not dislike the Russians because they are Russians, nor do we fear them because we fear war with them. What we dislike and fear about the Russians is the system of which they happen to be the foremost exponents. It is the unseen, unpredictable forces afoot in the world, the abstract ideology opposing that of our system of human relations—it is that which we basically fear.

The outward indicia of this current movement of reaction are many, among them being your "great social change." That such change has, since actually prior to the Civil War been gradually taking place is not to be disputed. That it eventually shall, and I daresay should, become an accomplished fact likewise is not to be disputed. The present violent controversy is not actually over whether or not it should brought about, but rather is over the means and methods, if any, to be used to encourage its being brought about. And that brings us to current events.

The bald fact behind the current controversy is that the present show of pseudo-enthusiasm on the part of our Republican Party and, more emphatically, by the nonsouthern segments of the late National Democratic Party for enforcement of social revolution by Federal fiat is simply a bid for the vote of fringe and radical minority groups of the East and North. That this is the fact is so patent it is scarcely conceivable that any intelligent person would even jokingly deny it. The tragic aspect of the situation is that to use this highly controversial issue as it is now being used—in blind eagerness to gain or retain political power and personal aggrandizement at the expense of the public treasury—is that our own political leaders—and I can no longer apply the term "leaders" to the lecherous bosses of our major political circuses without the feeling of green persimon in my mouth—are wittingly or unwittingly stepping in perfect rhythm to the tune sung by the bosses of the unseen forces at work throughout our land to disrupt and destroy our system. For the sake of convenience, we had as well term these unseen forces totalitarianism as that is the common catch-all appellation generally so applied.

It is difficult to conceive any circumstances of such political chaos—with party pitted against party, group against group, section against section, race against race—which could more notably meet the desires and needs, or more perfectly serve the ends, of the master minds of totalitarianism. With the fate of mankind, even the existence of humanity, hanging in the balance throughout the world, and the unity and undisturbed power of this Nation the one real bulwark left between peace and freedom on the one hand and disintegration and destruction on the other, our leaders create a situation of disruption among our own ranks that might well have been the tailor-made brainchild of the capital of totalitarianism. In fact one cannot help at times to think that possibly this situation was actually planned by totalitarianism, timed for now and brought to pass by a possible combination of direct orders and correct timing of a propaganda tune calculated to cause our leaders to dance to totalitarianism music whether they realize it or not. How infinitely stupid our leaders and agitating news-people must appear in the eyes of the Kremlin's boys. They light the fire and our newsmen, columnists, and orators pour on the gasoline.

Congratulations, Messrs. Alsop.

Now, as for the States rights and civil rights flare-up, what do we have in this controversy? What really lay beneath the party explosion at the Democratic Convention? You spoke of the "odor of the Southern bloc," yet it would really appear your noses are offended by a combination of the offal constituting certain non-Southern segments of the party and of the character of your own thinking and writing. It has long since become annoying to hear and read the vapid and hypocritical observations of self-styled expert critics of the South who probably know and understand as much about the racial conditions and problems of the South as they do the origin and make-up of the cosmic ray.

The most remarkable aspect of the Southern, nonsouthern split at Philadelphia were the two outward issues upon which, without going into the longer range causes, the split was based. The southern delegates advocated a plank which was to be nothing more than a reiteration of one of the most fundamental clauses of the Constitution of the United States, the reservation of States powers. In the event you are not aware of it—or to emphasize it in case you mentally seek to circumvent it, as the nonsouthern Democrats seem to be doing—the ninth and tenth amendments, adopted with the Constitution as a part of the Bill of Rights, read as follows:

"ARTICLE IX

"The enumeration in the Constitution, of certain rights, shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people.

"ARTICLE X

"The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people."

The southern delegates requested a plank in the party platform simply reiterating article X and pleading the Democratic Party to its strict observance. The nonsouthern element overwhelmingly voted a refusal of such plank, a refusal to commit the party to go on record as supporting one of the most basic of the amendments—a refusal, when expanded, is logically tantamount to a refusal to uphold the Constitution. Upon admission to the armed services of the Nation I, like all other members thereof, took oath to uphold and defend our Constitution. The majority of the delegates at Philadelphia refused to do so. It simply is not conceivable that a citizen is at liberty to select parts of the Constitution to uphold and defend and discard others as he chooses. We are obliged to uphold the Constitution in its entirety or not at all. If the national party refuses to pledge itself to uphold one article of the Constitution, then perforce it will refuse, if demand it made upon it by its southern members to do so, to pledge itself to uphold the Constitution at all. No other conclusion can, consistent with good logic, be reached, and I hope the great South will never aline itself with any organization whose attitude toward the very foundation of our Government is little short of treasonable. In fact, it could be quite easily argued that the action taken by the national party violates section 3, of article III, of the Constitution in that it gives aid and comfort to the enemy. By God, you can wager your last dime it is giving the enemy a whale of a lot of glee and satisfaction, to say the least.

Now, on the other hand, the southern delegates fought, and the nonsouthern elements voted into the platform, a plank calling for complete usurpation by Federal fiat of some of the most important of the powers reserved to the States—the police power, the power to regulate the exercise of the voting privilege (oddly most uninformed persons speak of the right to vote) and the power to regulate domestic business and enterprise (which could be classed as part of the police power). In voting that plank, at least the nonsouthern element was consistent. They refused to pledge themselves to uphold the tenth ammendment and then voted to advocate laws which, if passed, would be in direct violation thereof.

Anyone who is sincerely interested in perpetuation of our form of government based upon the principles underlying the Constitution as it was framed, should be truly alarmed at the open attacks now being made upon that great document, attacks launched by none other than groups who allege themselves to be Americans and supporters of constitutional government. The framers of the Constitution had suffered and fought through many years of struggle against the tyranny of concentration of power in one head. Those men were representatives of truly sovereign states sitting together to find a basis for union and collective action while at the same time retaining in fullest possible measure the sovereign powers of their several States. Those men well knew the suffering and virtual slavery worked upon a people under the yoke of total concentration of governmental power, and this knowledge was probably the greatest influence exerted upon their deliberations and upon the nature of that monumental document which resulted of their days of conference and labor. There were those who favored centralization of power in a federal government, and others who would leave all power to the States and form only a loose federation, fundamentally impotent. Despite the passions of the time—with a terrible war of revolution against tyranny only shortly concluded—those men found common ground of understanding, of give and take and compromise. The fruit of their efforts was the Constitution of the United States, a document forceful in its directness and simplicity of wording, clear in its meaning, yet sufficiently flexible to allow for change. That document expressly delegates certain powers to the Federal Government and expressly denies certain other powers to the States, and then by its express terms reserves to the States respectively, or to the people, all powers not delegated by it to the Federal Government nor denied by it to the States. There is nothing abstruse about the language of the Constitution in that regard, and the reasons for such provision are infinitely cogent. We have prospered and grown under our system of divided powers, and, during the life of our Government, have seen centralized government and dictatorship, one after another rise and fall in ruins. Now there are those among us who say abandon our Constitution, that our form of government, under the flag of which men have known freedom as never before known in history, is outmoded, let us turn to centralization of power, to the system of government we have seen fail over and over again. That, my peculiar friends, is the cry of the New Dealers and is the cry of those "civilized men" of the South you seek to hold up as the enlightened element of our section.

You write as though you believe we now face the real issue. That is the easy way to believe. We face a surface outcropping of the real issue. The issue is a death battle between that system built on totalitarianism and our system based upon constitutional government of, by, and for the people. You say the issue is white versus black, social inertia versus social change. If you are capable of lifting the curtain of apparent shallowness from your thinking you will be forced to accede that totalitarianism is using the surface racial-social issue as a means of attacking the very heart of our system and thus bringing us, in turn, the nearer to eventual totalitarianism. The battle against that basic movement is what our thinking southerners are fighting. We do not fight the Negro. We fight the movement to destroy constitutional government, and those who, in utmost hypocrisy, use the Negro to foster and promote the dangerous progress of that movement. Our southern delegates could not, in honor and loyalty to the principles of our Government, do other than use every means at their disposal in that fight. One is compelled to the conclusion that those who oppose these southerners are doing so either as the direct tools of the enemies of our system or as their unwitting dupes, shallow, frivolous suckers for the terribly insidious propaganda of totalitarianism.

As for the actual race problem in the South, it is a problem of vast moment, but it is a southern problem. You write of the alteration of northern big-city organizations wrought by the social changes in those cities. If conditions of the Negro in New York and Detroit, for instance, are shining examples of improvement in the status of the Negro, then heaven forbid that we have any repetition of those examples south of the line. However, we assume that your major concern is the effect upon the boss-ruled political factions of the big cities rather than any real improvement in the lot of the Negroes as a race. Your writing constrains one so to assume. Of course, that is precisely the attitude of those alleged Democrats who seek to use the southern race situation to further their individual ends and to override and destroy the Constitution. The hypocrisy of our erstwhile Democratic colleagues is emphasized by the vehemence with which the western and southwestern elements have fought the South on this constitutional issue—incorrectly called race issue. Those western elements shout loud and long about segregation of races in the South. Why, we might rightly wonder, is no mention made of the racial persecution leveled in those Western and Southwestern States at the Japanese and Mexican minorities. Oh, it must simply be that those minorities are such small minorities that the political bosses do not have to worry about their voting potential.

As we stated above we consider the southern white-Negro situation a problem of our section to be solved by our thinking white and colored leaders. The fact that remarkable strides have been made toward such solution in the short eighty-odd years since slavery was finally abolished, is, as usual, lost in the hysterical scramble for minority group votes. There is too much lush political patronage, too many fat Federal jobs at stake to expect sane, level thinking or any semblance of concern for the welfare of the Nation or the people thereof. Despite all of the false concern and clamoring about the lot of the southern Negro, these facts remain: The condition of the southern Negro as a whole has been greatly advanced through the cooperation and sincere effort of all right thinking southerners, white and black; that preemptory Federal laws concerning the race situation in the South can be logically construed only as being violative of the Constitution; that such laws, if passed in defiance of the Constitution, can be enforced only with serious consequences and probable cancellation of 50 years' honest effort to solve the race problem; that full enforcement can be accomplished, if at all, only by final and open adandonment of every principle upon which our Government is founded and the establishment of an out-and-out central Government police force with unlimited powers of arrest, arbitrary trial and punishment. If this is done there is left no protecting bulwark between what was once a free people and the accomplished fact of a police state.

If the majority of people of two-thirds of the States desire that full power and control be given to the Federal Government in such matters as segregation, regulation of voting, etc., the way is open constitutionally to so delegate such powers. In order to provide for such contingencies, the founders of this Government made wise provisions in the Constitution whereby that basic document can be lawfully amended. If the self-styled champions of the minorities are really sincere, let them lay before our people amendments to provide for their aims. They have never undertaken this measure. They evidently do not care except in Presidential election years when they start the race drums to rolling for vote-getting purposes. During the years between elections those great exponents of civil rights, so-called, have little, if anything, to say about the subject. For decades such has been the case. Each election year the old hue and cry has been raised. This year it has reached a crescendo. One faction glutted with power for 16 years frantically searches for votes. The champions of totalitarianism, which is now more potent than ever before, seize upon a situation made to order for their purposes. They pour fuel on through the propaganda pump and spout it through the mouth of our "leaders," and the old hue and cry becomes an overwhelming roar.

As far as the South and the national Democratic Party are concerned, it is now obvious that the South has clung for decades to little more than a party name. The South has injured itself under the "solid South" plan. It is imperative, now, that the South throw off those shackles of tradition and let it be known, as we are doing, that we are not in the bag of any national political organization. It is even more imperative that the South, since all other elements appear to have abandoned calm and rational consideration of the principles of our Constitutional Government, fight to the end that all of our people shall know the implications of the proposed civil-rights laws and expose those proposed laws for what they basically are—and that is a direct attack upon the foundations of our governmental system. The race problem in the South can and will be solved in due time through the mutual efforts of our thinking white and Negro southern people. The progress already made to that end will be tragically set back, and the problem may never reach final solution if any attempt is made to force unconstitutional Federal police laws down the throats of the only people actually capable of eventual attainment of that solution.

Yours truly.

GARET VAN ANTWERP III.

[From the Mobile (Ala.) Register of August 26, 1948]

THESE DAYS

(By George E. Sokolsky)

By what is euphemistically called "civil rights" in this campaign is meant the Negro question. Since the Civil War, the Negro question has been a major American problem inadequately discussed and considered except by Southerners who have had to live with it and in recent years by the Communists and their fellow-travelers and competing liberals who hope to garner votes out of it.

Under our Constitution and within the sanctions of moral law, the legal equality of Negroes and whites cannot be questioned. Historically and traditionally, the question is not so simple either in the North or in the South. Those northern Democrats who make such a terrific to-do about racial discrimination in the South are generally liars—they will not live in Negro areas in their cities; they do not entertain Negroes in their homes; they do not hire Negro secretaries or clerks, except political ones, which is part of the vote-getting technique; they do not encourage association between their children and Negro children.

In a word, none of them practice in their private lives what they preach for others. It is a simple matter for a resident of Minnesota or Wisconsin to grow powerfully indignant about a problem that does not face him but that does face a citizen of Alabama or Mississippi. Minnesota's Negro population, according to the 1940, census, was 9,928; Wisconsin's, 12,158; Alabama's, 983,290; Mississippi's, 1,074,578 (m).

If the Civil War had not ended in the Reconstruction Era, during which Thaddeus Stevens created an unassimilable minority for political advantage, we should perhaps today not be facing this problem as the principal campaign issue of 1948. Perhaps had Abraham Lincoln not been assassinated, the emancipated Negro slave would have been brought into American life without malice, with charity for all.

But that did not happen. Instead the Northern carpetbagger and his Negro associates left in the South a heritage of bitterness which has continued to the present time. Franklin D. Roosevelt tried to solve this problem by exporting Negroes from the South to the North, placing them on relief rolls and forcing them into industrial enterprises on a quota basis. Thus, in many northern and western areas, the Negro population increased startingly.

The northerners met the problem by segregating Negroes into ghettoes. Make no mistake about that: In the North, the Negro is as segregated as in the South, in spite of the lies northern politicians tell. Harlem is a Negro ghetto; the Bedford district of Brooklyn is a Negro ghetto; the South Side of Chicago is a Negro ghetto. The technique employed in New York is for the whites to clear out as soon as the Negro moves in. If you want to see that process at work, you can study it, if you are so inclined, in the east Bronx of New York.

I am not justifying these conditions either on moral or legal grounds; I am only describing conditions as they exist and I am protesting against lies and liars. The politicians who are shrieking civil rights are seeking Negro votes in the northern cities. They are appealing to prejudice and indignation and they are fanning the flames of race antagonism not because they want the votes of the Negro in Mississippi but because they want the votes of the Negro in Harlem and South Chicago.

The anxiety of the northern Democrats to be recorded as voting for the civil rights plank of the Democratic platform after a voice vote had passed it, their insistence upon Senator BARKLEY'S announcement of how they voted, was for the consumption of the northern Negro voter.

This Negro question is pitched on a high emotional level and can result in riots and death. It requires thoughtful and considerate handling. It requires sympathy and understanding. It comes upon us acutely when we dare not have internal disturbances. Those who have gambled upon it may also have gambled upon the domestic peace of the United States.

Incentive

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LINDLEY BECKWORTH

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to include in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an article entitled "Incentive":

INCENTIVE

In the midst of the clamor and tumult of those who would destroy our American system as outmoded, and perhaps give our institutions a shot of real Communist ideology, it is stimulating to read the little book, Mainspring, by Henry Grady Weaver and published by Talbot Books, Detroit. It is a condensation of a book by Ruth Wilder Lane called the Discovery of Freedom. It is called a "grass roots story of human progress, what it means to you and me and how not to prevent it." It is the story of freedom to achieve with the deep incentive of hope of reward for skill, thrift, energy, and the determination to triumph over difficulties. The reason Americans have achieved far beyond any other nation, Mr. Weaver thinks, is not because we have had more ability, intellect, or natural resources, but because we "have made more effective use of our human energies than any other people on the face of globe, anywhere or at any time." Human efforts are largely motivated by hope of reward and when idealists, theorists, demagogues, and political tricksters try to change this rule, there is decline and chaos and dictatorship.

Stalin in Russia had to abandon idealistic communism as outlined by Lenin because tough realistic old Joe soon saw that men would not work without incentive. Lenin said that each should work "according to his ability" and each should receive from the state "according to his need." Stalin soon realized that you can't make progress by paying a factory manager the same wage as a ditch digger. And today in Russia we do not have pure communism but a peculiar system of Stalinism, with incentive pay, bonuses, rewards for extraordinary effort, pay on piecework basis, and preferred social position for the captains of industry. This amusing return to many principles of capitalism is told in a pamphlet entitled "Communism in Action," prepared by the Legislative Reference Service of the Library of Congress under the direction of Representative EVERETT M. DIRKSEN, of Illinois, and distributed free by American Wage Earners Foundation, room 605A, 30 North LaSalle Street, Chicago. Under Stalinism a worker is rewarded for success and he is shot or banished for failure.

In America, Mr. Weaver says, "to a greater degree than any other country there has been the opportunity for self-expression, self-development, and advancement on the basis of merit." Perhaps that is why the United States with "less than 7 percent of the earth's population has created more new wealth than all the 2,000,000,000 people in the rest of the world." Mr. Weaver concludes:

"Maybe we would be doing the peoples of the world a greater and more enduring service, if along with each item of food, clothing, money, and equipment, we sent a simple statement of the reasons underlying our ability to make contributions so far out of proportion to our population and natural resources."

Let's preserve and defend the mainspring of free effort with hope of reward.

Truman Is Not Fooling the People

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RALPH HARVEY
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. HARVEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Apendix of the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Richmond (Ind.) Palladium-Item of August 3, 1948:

TRUMAN IS NOT FOOLING THE PEOPLE

The American people are not being fooled by President Truman's great "concern" for them and his attacks on the Congress.

True to form he is demanding anti-inflation measures in the same breath that he urges greater spending and larger appropriations.

The two do not go together, and fortunately, both the people back home and their representatives in the Congress know this.

Only a few days ago those Congressmen were in their home communities mingling with the men and women who are the American people.

They hurried back to Washington at the call of Mr. Truman.

They knew there was no emergency, and so did the President.

So now, despite the effort of Mr. Truman to stir up resentment against the Congress for failing to bow to his demands, that Congress stands between the people and dictatorial pricing and rationing powers asked by Truman.

The Congress is able to do this because the Congress controls legislation. Our representatives are our lawmakers.

When a Chief Executive gets exalted ideas about the powers he should wield, the Congress holds him down to his true size.

If the President is an extravagant spender of the people's money, the Congress cuts his requested appropriations to a level consistent with national needs and ability to pay.

When the executive department of the Government refuses to act against subversive or incompetent employees on its pay rolls, the Congress names committees to make its own findings and give them to the public.

This business of belittling the Congress, as President Truman continues to do, serves to pave the way for dictatorship.

The stumbling block to a dictatorship in the United States is the Congress.

Franklin D. Roosevelt learned this when he tried to pack the Supreme Court in order to get the decisions he wanted.

Men of integrity in both major parties lined up against that unmoral and treacherous proposal and defeated it.

Even when one House of the Congress acts unwisely on legislation, the other of the two Houses serves as a counterbalance.

That is why would-be dictators and enemies of our democratic processes have suggested one house, or unicameral, legislative bodies.

The same is true of those who would replace our two-party system with a coalition of groups to form a united front. That would mean one-party government, and loss by the people of the protection a vigilant, critical Congress now provides.

The backbone of our Government is the Congress. Members come from every district of every State in the Union.

They are close to the people and know the needs of the people. They are our protectors against little men in high office as well as against forces seeking to destroy our Republic.

Price Increases and the Housing Shortage

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following telegram:

CLEVELAND, OHIO, August 4, 1948.
Hon. JOHN W. MCCORMACK,
House Office Building:

Due to pyramiding in prices which are forcing a reduction in standards of millions of the common people and a serious housing shortage. It is imperative that adequate laws be enacted to immediately relieve these serious situations and I urge that immediate public hearings be held to permit testimony from well-informed and interested people. I desire to personally testify before the appropriate committees and will greatly appreciate an early reply advising day and hours I may be heard.

Wallace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following press release by Hon. Samuel B. Pettengill, former Representative from Indiana:

WALLACE

Wallace wants public ownership of "the main levers of the economic system," and then demands that all public employees shall have the right to strike. This is a far cry from Coolidge's famous statement: "The right to strike against the public does not exist for any purpose at any time." The Wallace platform turns its back on Mr. Roosevelt, who also agreed that public employees do not have the right to strike. MacArthur has just ordered public workers in Japan not to strike.

Here are the Wallace-Taylor planks:

"The Progressive Party will initiate such measures of public ownership as may be necessary to put into the hands of the people's representatives the levers of control essential to the operation of an economy of abundance. As a first step, the largest banks, the railroads, the merchant marine, the electric power and gas industry, and industries primarily dependent on Government funds, or Government purchases, must be placed under public ownership."

Then, "We will demand the right for employees in publicly owned industries to organize, to bargain collectively and to strike." Also, "We demand the immediate repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act. * * * The old parties restore the labor injunction as a weapon for breaking strikes and smashing unions."

That's the program.

Railroad workers, under Government ownership, can all go out on strike and tie the Nation into knots. No injunction in the public interest shall issue. Factories can close, farm produce can rot, millions can be thrown out of work.

When Henry is in the White House (how close he got) he will tell the people: This railroad strike is one of the growing pains of an economy of abundance. The people's representatives are collectively bargaining with the representatives of that part of the people on strike to get these people to go back to work for the people. This is a Government by part of the people for part of the people. This is the century of the common man.

Collective bargaining by public employees takes wages and salaries out of the control of Congress. Also the Federal budget and taxes.

Then look at the merchant marine. All ships can be tied to the docks. No food can be shipped to our soldiers overseas. No relief to Europe. "We call for the repudiation of the Marshall plan." This would do it.

Same with the electric power and gas industries. Strikers can hold cities in ransom. No lights, no power, no heat, no law.

Such is the anarchy the Progressive Party would promote.

Responsible leaders of labor oppose Government ownership. The know that the right to strike would not be tolerated under Government ownership. But Wallace says when he is President public employees can strike nevertheless.

In Russia, industry is publicly owned, but there is no right to strike against the public owners. The owners have the guns. Troops have been used by Attlee in England to break strikes in industries publicly owned.

How many votes will this program get this year? How many in 1952?

Appropriation for Prosthetic Research a Good Investment

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, the disabled veterans of our country are still serving the Nation and showing that they can be useful and helpful citizens in civilian life. The amputee veterans have certainly proved their worth and their stamina in the face of their handicaps.

Recently, I heard of the case of Mr. Paul W. Kephart, of 1432 Argall Street, Beloit, Wis. Mr. Kephart lost both of his feet in the early days of action in France. Since then he has made a successful readjustment to civilian life and holds a responsible position with a food concern.

At the end of my remarks, I want to insert a transcript of a broadcast which was made over Station WLS, Chicago, telling how this amputee veteran saved the lives of two persons during an accident on Lake Delavan, Wis. This is just another example of the fine way that these veterans are taking their place in the life of our Nation.

Mr. Kephart has been commander of his local DAV post and has served with the Wisconsin State Department of Veterans. The prosthetic firms have asked him to work for them and he has given of his time to help other veterans who have had the misfortune to lose a leg or an arm. He plays, he states, a better game of golf today than he did before the injury occurred. He bowls and plays basketball and people still stare when he goes to dances.

Mr. Speaker, this is just another example of the wisdom of Congress in passing Public Law 729, which provides $1,000,000 annually to be set aside for prosthetic reesarch. It was cne of the best investments this Government has ever made. I now include the transcript of the radio broadcast at this point:

Survivors of a crash in Wisconsin between two motor launches on Lake Delavan last night have told how a legless Army veteran helped several of them remain afloat until help could arrive.

The crash—in which two Chicagoans drowned—involved an excursion boat, called the Rocket and a motor boat operated by William Paschong of Delavan. The Rocket carried 12 passengers and the motor boat 11. Survivors say the Rocket split the motor launch in half, sinking it almost immediately. One of the motorboat's passengers was Paul Kephart, an amputee. Thrown into the water with the others, he managed to grab a horn on the Rocket and pull himself to the deck. There he kept several others who were in the water from danger by holding them up until rescurers came.

Both drowning victims—Mrs. Ruth Kellenbach and Jack Nolan—had been on the Rocket. They were hurtled into the water by the impact of the collision.

Injured in the crash were Ilma Roubik of Chicago, Dorothy Paschong of Delavan, and Kephart's wife.

Other passengers included Jim Easterbrook, Beloit College football coach, his wife, Mary, and their son, John. Authorities are checking to find a complete list of the riders. Rescue crews are still searching the lake for the drowning victims.

Civil Rights—In a Democrat Administration?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. T. MILLET HAND

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. HAND. Mr. Speaker, my interest in civil rights is no new thing. I worked and fought for them before coming to Congress. Almost my first declaration in the House, early in 1945, was in the interest of FEPC.

On June 9, 1948, I spoke as follows:

CIVIL RIGHTS

Mr. HAND. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate that it is difficult, in these closing and busy days, to completely cover the field of legislation which many of us feel is absolutely necessary. These difficulties are multiplied in the case of civil-rights legislation by the very real threat of a filibuster invariably invoked by southern Democrats at every attempt to affirm the civil rights and social welfare of 13,000,000 American citizens who are not getting a square deal.

Nonetheless, if men of good will keep trying, ultimate success is inevitable. The march of time and the march of social progress will admit no other result.

Anti-poll-tax legislation has long since passed the House. It is now pending before the Senate, and, as I say, under the threat of a filibuster. The antilynching bill, for which I have been working and for which I testified some weeks ago, is on the House Calendar. FEPC legislation has not advanced even that far.

Mr. Speaker, we are going to have to take the bull by the horns, notwithstanding delaying tactics and threats of a filibuster, and put this long-deferred and long-needed legislation through. Further delay is un-American and unfair.

The great majority of enlightened people are against jimcrowism and second-class citizenship. It is nonsense to talk about democracy and to insist upon democratic principles throughout the world, and at the same time continue most undemocratic practices at home.

Mr. Speaker, you are well aware that legislation of this character would pass the House by substantial majorities. Filibustering can be stopped by proper application of the rules. It is time to meet these issues head-on and to solve them.

It is clear that no adequate solution will be accomplished at this session. In my view, it is a matter of urgency that we dispose of it at the next meeting of Congress, and at the very beginning of the session. Since we know that delaying tactics will be used, a very early start is essential.

DEMOCRATS FILIBUSTER AGAIN

Now, of course, we have seen civil rights again blocked by a militant group of southern Democrats. I knew this would happen. The President knew it would happen. His reference to civil rights in the program for the special session was made very briefly at the end of his speech, and clearly with his tongue in his cheek. After all the President is from Missouri, and it is hard for him to get away from his Confederate ancestry.

It is interesting to note that the President recently changed his mind about this being the worst Congress. He finally concluded that the Congress led by Thaddeus Stevens, immediately after the Civil War, was really the worst. But it was that Congress which gave us the foundation for such civil-rights legislation as we have. I wonder if consciously, or unconsciously, that is why he selected it for special criticism.

It must be clear by now that a civil-rights program will never be enacted except under a strong Republican President with a united Republican Congress. When a Republican Administration comes into office in 1949, the Senate rules will be changed to prevent the filibuster, and the necessary legislation can be passed at once.

Mr. Speaker, I am confident that that will be our goal, and that it will be successfully reached.

Housing Shortage

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a radio address by Mrs. Dorothy Fuldheim, one of the outstanding radio commentators in the United States.

Mrs. Fuldheim calls attention to serious housing shortage which exists and cites instances proving the contention of President Truman and the Democratic Party that action on the vital housing bill is imperative for the best interests of our country.

The address follows:

In the United States of America, in the rich State of Ohio, in the prosperous city of Cleveland, mind you, not in Russia, not in China, not in Yugoslavia, but in these United States of America, in my own city of Cleveland, fair and lovely and with millions of people living in it; with wonderful homes and beautiful gardens; with an orchestra famed throughout the Nation; with a superb collection at the art museum; with parks and streets and theaters and great wealth, there is such a dearth of homes, such a lack of houses for rent or for sale within the buying and renting power of the average citizens, that a family with three children sleeps and lives in an old jalopy.

Their washing and ironing and bathing and cooking is done at a sister's home which is too crowded to provide them with sleeping quarters. At night the children sleep in the back seat of the automobile. The father sleeps at the wheel, sitting upright, and the mother stretches out with her head on her husband's lap. Sometimes he leaves the auto and stretches out on the grass. Pretty picture, isn't it? Wonderful way to develop love of country and democracy. Now, mind you, it isn't as though the father of this family were not employed and couldn't afford to pay for a roof over his family's head. Not at all. The bitter truth is that, though he earns a modest salary, he can pay rent (he's a cab driver). But for 7 weeks now he and his family have been looking for a place to rent without success.

This man and his family are the kind of people who will become the victims of political chicanery if Congress adjourns without writing into law some remedies for high prices and for the production of more homes. The Congress has been reconvened by the President for a specific purpose. In doing so the President is entirely within his rights. I should like to draw attention to a fact which a great many people seem to be overlooking. He is still President of the United States and it was scandalous, I thought, for some Members of the Congress to remain seated when he left the congressional Chambers. He is still President of the United States and the office itself is worthy of the highest dignity and esteem.

But to go on with the story of the Cleveland family whose home is an old automobile. Obviously this American citizen can afford to pay rent. But he can't afford to buy a house because of the prohibitive cost. And there are no houses for rent, only for sale. It's one thing to be able to pay $45 or $50 a month for rent, it's another to have enough money saved for a down payment.

Everyone knows that we face a serious, a very grave situation in our price structure. It takes $1.71 to make a purchase today which in 1939 we bought for $1. In other words, a man who earned $100 a month in 1939 must now earn $171 to live on the same standard. An individual who in 1939 earned $200 a month must now, to live in the same fashion, earn $342. A man who earned $500 a month must earn $850 a month. The fundamental difference between the man who earns $100 a month and the man who earns $500 a month is that the $100-a-month individual cannot feed and clothe his family on that amount. The $500-a-month individual can, but his standard of living will decrease considerably. The impact of increased prices hits one every day. Now milk is to go up 2 cents. Taxi fares are up 20 percent. In my city, the express bus demands its pint of blood in the form of 18 cents a trip. Now three tobacco companies manufacturing Philip Morris, Camels, and Luckies simultaneously announce an increase of 1 cent on a package. Why? Is tobacco scarce? And how does it happen that the increase is announced at the same time by the three companies?

What hope is there for lowered prices in an uncontrolled market? We are riding on a balloon which is going to burst open and down we will come. And like Humpty Dumpty, all the King's horses and all the King's men won't be able to put us together again.

Steel has gone up again in spite of the fact that Bethlehem just reported on Thursday that the net profit for the first 6 months of this year was equal to $3.05 a common share compared to $2.81 a share in the first half of 1947. With steel as the pivot industry, everything else will go up. Automobiles already are listed with higher prices. But it is not only the increase in the price of steel that is gnawing away at our economy. It's the scarcity. It is a dismal fact that steel is scarce now, but it will be more scarce. Stock piles for the armed forces will take a good chunk out of our supply, the ERP will take some more, and now there is talk of a $10,000,000,000 armament supply for the western European nations. Obviously this, if it becomes a reality, will not be in the form of money—$10,000,000,000 in money would be simple for us, we have too much gold hoarded anyway. But it would be in the form of guns, planes, bulldozers, jeeps, etc., all of which need steel. Well, even an economy such as that of our own country can't supply such a vast amount of armament, plus the armament we will need for our own increased armies, plus our own civilian needs.

Maybe the bitter hour is arriving when we will discover that we can't have guns and butter too. But all of this will produce further scarcities, which, of course, produces higher prices, which necessitates an increase in wages, which in turn raises prices, though whether that is necessary is questionable. With the increase in the price of steel, how are we going to keep prices down for homes without some legislation?

Let's look at a few typical cities. A house in Boston, which in 1939 sold for $5,558, in June of this year sold for $13,612. In the same length of time in Chicago, homes selling for $5,233 skyrocketed to $13,114. Cleveland is one of the cities where the increase has not been so flagrant. Here prices jumped a little more than a hundred percent. The rise in Los Angeles in the same period of time for a house selling at a little more than $5,000 was 300 percent. Whose wages have gone up 300 percent to keep up with such costs? These increases in the cost of homes are typical throughout our country. If $5,000 homes have gone up to $15,000, how can the lower-income group buy a house? And there are hardly any for rent. So what do they do, take to sleeping in automobiles?

What this country needs is not a 5-cent cigar, but homes cheap enough so that every man can live with some dignity. Over 6,000,000 American families are living in congested quarters, doubled up with another family. A half million families live in trailer camps and in single rooms in boarding houses. Six million more live in terrible slum conditions. Do the gentlemen of the Congress think that these people will view with enthusiasm or with cheers, their avoidance of the most pressing problem of our days?

A lot these people will care about the accusation that the administration is playing politics by reconvening Congress. What they are interested in is the solving of their burning problem. They want, they need, they demand, that a bill be passed which will guarantee them a low rate of interest and large mortgages with small payments. The Taft-Ellender-Wagner bill which was defeated by the real-estate board, with the support of those Members of Congress who are unconscious of the fact that the people come before any sectional interests, would have provided for, in addition to the things just mentioned, slum clearance and research by United States Government agencies to find some method whereby cheaper homes could be built. It is utterly incredible to me that this land, with its ingenuity, its skill, and its know-how, can't invent some technique to produce homes like automobiles are produced by factory production. The Nation which was able to produce the atom bomb can certainly find a way to build cheap homes and plenty of them. The Congress has worried and debated about UNRRA, about ERP, about feeding the Germans, and helping the Chinese. What about worrying a little about Americans who are beside themselves with anxiety, not only because of high prices, but about a place to live in.

The first line of defense for a nation is a well-fed and well-housed population. Even by the farthest stretch of the imagination an automobile, even a 1949 model, much less an ancient model, serving as a home is not a fitting front line.

Come, gentlemen of the Congress, the issue is not whether this is a political maneuver on the part of the administration. This issue transcends partisan lines. Nor is it fitting for a great and powerful party such as the Republican Party to say through the lips of Mr. Brownell, the campaign manager for Governor Dewey, that the Republican Party's platform is to be executed only when a Republican sits in the White House. The Congress is elected by the people, not to elect a particular individual to the Presidency, but to pass needed legislation. If the Republicans want to be elected, the best way they can be assured of election is to pass the kind of legislation that is needed. So far they have not done so. The tentative plans are for Congress to adjourn at the end of next week. Governor Dewey termed the reconvening of Congress a frightful imposition. Undoubtedly it's warm in Washington and the Members of Congress had other plans, but it is also undeniable that for the family without a place to live, for the housewife who pays a dollar a pound for hamburger, to call the reconvening of Congress for the purpose of passing imperative legislation a frightful imposition, as Governor Dewey did, will sound very strange indeed. We pursued a bipartisan policy in our foreign affairs. Why can't we do so in our domestic problems? Are the great American people to be the lamb, led to the slaughter, and laid as a sacrifice on the altar of men's political ambitions?

What Sort of Stakes and What Kind of Emergency Does It Take To Stir the Republican Eightieth Congress To Action?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HERMAN P. EBERHARTER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of July 20, 1948:

THE STAKES IN INFLATION

In preparing his bill to present to the special session on the control of living costs, President Truman should make the issue as compact as possible. Last fall Congress rejected the President's 10-point program for inflation control. All the points were sound, but two of them have been adequately dealt with already. Some of the others are less pressing than they were months ago.

If Congress can be moved to provide only five main controls, inflation can be curbed. The five essential steps are:

1. Allocation and inventory control of scarce commodities which basically affect the cost of living.

2. Consumer rationing of scarce commodities.

3. Price ceilings on essential commodities in short supply, and wage ceilings to the extent necessary to maintain price controls.

4. The regulation of speculative trading on the grain and produce exchanges.

5. Restraints on installment buying and on the creation of inflationary bank credit.

In the 25 months since Congress let the OPA expire, living costs have risen approximately 1 percent a month. And the increase in living costs has given rise to an effective demand for increased wages.

This is an economic evil which can be repeated over and over, with ever-increasing danger to the national economy. It almost certainly will be repeated until the rearmament and European aid programs are concluded—unless Congress rises to the occasion and gives the Nation the controls which President Truman has been pleading for since early in 1946.

Even if it were possible to avoid a violent crash or recession without invoking controls, the failure to invoke them still would cost, and is costing, the taxpayers billions of dollars.

The Government will spend in the current fiscal year close to $20,000,000,000 for rearmament and foreign aid. By comparing the price level prevailing now with that prevailing when the OPA was allowed to expire, it is readily evident that the Government is spending, in one year alone, between five and six billion dollars more for rearmament and foreign aid than it would spend had the price level of mid-1946 been preserved.

We are bilking ourselves of billions. Worse yet, the constant rise in prices in the United States makes infinitely more difficult the achievement of economic equilibrium in western Europe. Great Britain has practiced heroic self-denial in regulating prices within her own borders, but the problem is constantly complicated by the upward spiral of prices in the United States, which is called upon to supply so much of Britain's imports.

If what is at stake here—economic equilibrium at home and the leadership of nations abroad—cannot move a majority of Congressmen to act, what sort of stakes and what kind of emergency does it take to stir them to action?

Motion Pictures

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 27, 1948

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, is the movie industry trying to educate the people, to furnish worthwhile recreation, or is it endeavoring to give us a combination of both?

Some people go to see the pictures because they have nothing else to do; some go for information; some for recreation, or relaxation, but in any event, the American people who view the pictures, young or old, are on the whole decent, respectable individuals. Very, very few, if any, would be guilty of indecency, obscenity, the use of profane language.

Most of the adults are acquainted, more or less directly, with the so-called triangle. Many have had problems of their own, or are familiar with the problems of others. While amusement or relaxation may be the purpose of a majority of the children or of the early afternoon attendants and the younger people at the evening shows, the real paying audience is made up of older people. They go to relax, to forget for a moment some of their pressing problems, to get away from the sordidness of life. At present, the housewife wants a little distraction from the high cost of living. The businessman desires to think of little or nothing—of anything but inflation or foreign policy. He usually would like to sit back and take it easy. He isn't greatly interested in whether someone's wife or someone's husband was successful in the pursuit of some other individual's husband or wife. He would like just a little clean fun on the screen.

But what does he see—too many problem plays, too many plays with too much dialogue, which leaves a bad taste.

The thought which I have neither the time nor the words to express, but which the public may be interested in considering, is quite accurately expressed in an article by Roy Norr in the August issue of Salute. It is entitled "The Man in Hollywood's Hottest Seat." The article is as follows:

THE MAN IN HOLLYWOOD'S HOTTEST SEAT
(By Roy Norr)

The time was September 1945. The place was a New York office. Amid typical movie hoopla—batteries of cameras, flashbulbs bursting in air, studio bigwigs beaming right and left—a ceremony was being held. After two decades of "carrying the ball" for the motion-picture industry, 66-year-old Will Hays had retired as head of the screen's top regulatory body, the Motion Picture Producers and Distributors of America. And dapper, ambitious 49-year-old Eric A. Johnston was taking his place.

With that event the "Hays Office," long known as the guardian of public morals on the screen, became the "Johnston Office." As filmdom's new czar, Johnston inherited his predecessor's powers and perquisites, not to mention his right-hand man, chief censor Joseph Breen. Ushered in with pomp and promise, Johnston seemed the perfect choice for the job. But today, less than 3 years later, there are signs he is shaky on his celluloid throne.

Mike Romanoff, raconteur, restaurateur and columnist of some note, recently expressed the sentiments of more than one Hollywood observer when he told Johnston: "I was once a vacuum-cleaner salesman myself and I can tell you it's nice outdoor work. Go back, Mr. Johnston, before * * * it's too late."

Romanoff's specific reference was to Johnston's typically American beginning. Though born in Washington, the city, Eric has been associated most of his life with Washington, the State—Spokane, to be exact. There, after college and a World War I hitch with the marines, he went about demonstrating and selling vacuum cleaners door-to-door. That started his climb up the business ladder which was climaxed—supposedly—by his coronation as movie czar.

What has Johnston accomplished in Hollywood? His regime has seen a long line of "turkeys"—the poorest entertainment produced in a decade at the highest admission prices on record. It has seen industry leadership turn spineless; crime, horror, and sex pervade the screen; great stars wasted in bad pictures. Eric is not without blame on some of these counts.

Yet his services have far outweighed his failures. He has helped the industry substantially in its foreign negotiations. He met with courage and vigor the issue of clean pictures when he finally woke up to it. He has spoken out without fear or favor against the monstrous extravagances in the industry. When he does leave the movies, insiders believe he's more apt to take a walk than get taken for a ride.

ERIC GOES EAST—THEN WEST

For Johnston always was a young man with high aims and the courage of his beliefs. Back in Spokane he emerged from the vacuum-cleaner period to establish, with his mother, a number of profitable enterprises—electrical supplies, radio, a brick-and-lime business. His companies came to employ from 1,500 to 2,000 men. Eric became a leading local businessman, progressive and successful. In 1942, when the presidency of the United States Chamber of Commerce was offered him, his mother took over and told her son to "Go east, young man" and build a public career if he could.

Eric Johnston proved that he could. Earnest and eloquent, the young Lochinvar from the West swept upon the national scene as a new knight-errant of "a people's capitalism." He saw America still as a land where "little tykes could grow into great tycoons." He was an ingratiating speaker who knew how to win friends and influence people. Though Republican, he leaned toward the New Deal; soon Franklin Delano Roosevelt had the welcome mat laid out for him at the White House. Veteran politicians began to clock him for the Republican Presidential sweepstakes in 1948. Friends predicted a dazzling political future.

Then the movies got him.

Few even in the industry know to this day how Eric Johnston was wooed and won by Hollywood. Most of the big bosses first set eyes on him at one of those "little" dinners at the exclusive University Club in New York, arranged by the United States Chamber of Commerce staff to buck up the drooping spirits of "big business" after Roosevelt's fourth-term election.

Spyros Skouras, president of Twentieth Century-Fox, was host to his fellow movie-magnates (who were plainly awed by their unaccustomed surroundings). Johnston was the guest speaker—and Skouras' candidate for the Will Hays post. Skouras had invited the tycoons to have a look at the new star he was sponsoring for a place in the movie firmament. The filmites were seated humbly at a table in the rear—except for Skouras, who beamed from the speakers' table as his fellow-magnates applauded Eric's remarks. Johnston spoke with not a single note before him. He has a remarkable memory and can repeat a 20-minute speech letter-perfect after reading it twice.

It was love at first sight for the magnates. Here was a man assured and forceful, with a profile that many an actor would envy. What a wide-eyed speechmaker to secure public enthusiasm for the movie moguls! What a Daniel to send into the den of the industry's messy labor relations! Not a Wendell, perhaps, but what a "little Willkie" to have and to hold—one who could drop his card at the State Department, the White House or the Capitol whenever necessary.

In the courtship that followed, the film barons were eager and Eric was coy. They tried to tempt him with gold, but gold could not tempt him—he told them he wasn't worth the salary they first offered. They tried to tempt him with ease; he could be their roving ambassador. But ease didn't tempt him. They tried to tempt him with power; they would extend his responsibility to trade practices as well as to pictures. But power didn't tempt him.

Then they held out a career of public service. Klieg lights focused on his leadership. A photogenic appearance in the newsreels with a public message whenever he wished. A building—commanding a pleasant view of the White House—to be bought or erected for him in Washington. And Eric succumbed, at a salary of $100,000 a year and a sufficient expense account.

THE HOLLYWOOD HONEYMOON BEGINS

Promptly he began extolling Hollywood in terms which awed even the hardened movie-makers, accustomed to "titanic" for good, "colossal" for so-so, and "epic" for everything.

Johnston made it plain that he had come to the movies to do something big for mankind. "I have been attracted to the motion picture," he told the world, "because it offers unlimited opportunities to work for peace and prosperity at home and abroad." He had joined with such fellow-statesmen as the Balabans, the Cohns, the Schencks, the Skouras, for no less a purpose than to promote international peace and "bring the peoples of the world together" through pictures that would reflect "the American design for living" and prove "America's most natural and convincing ambassadors of good will."

A new day was to dawn for suffering moviegoers. A motion-picture institute was to be established in Washington, D. C., and a vast research program was to be undertaken "involving countless facets to improve the film, the theater, methods, and techniques."

Nothing like it, he exulted, "has ever been attempted in American industry."

If Johnston had consulted censor Breen's files in Hollywood he would have learned for himself that "the American design for living," as reflected in the pictures that soon would reach the screen, was largely homicidal—stalking murder, shrieking horror, bloody crime, relieved now and then by stories of he-men who love to kick the little woman in the teeth. But no advice to this effect, however well documented, could check his eloquence. He hit the headlines, hard, and joy reigned unconfined in the movie camp.

Like a diva blowing kisses, Eric tossed dithyrambs in honor of the film bosses' achievements until they purred with delight. "Eric is great," a trade paper headlined. A big producer declared him the greatest man in the United States and Terry Ramsaye, movie historian and wit, denounced this as a typical movie understatement.

So the honeymoon began.

Unfortunately, however, the honeymoon was brief, as movie honeymoons are wont to be. His Motion Picture Institute died after his first speech; his research into countless facets to improve the film was quickly forgotten. Encouraged by his lavish praises the producers of entirely too many pictures reverted to the tried and true formula—"When in doubt, smut it up."

Critics began comparing the state of the American screen with Johnston's glowing promises. They found production standards "shamefully low," "embarrassingly bad" or worse. They asked why a modest miller from Britain, J. Arthur Rank, had been able to produce better pictures artistically, despite all the slickness and glamour and gold of Hollywood. Never before, they said, had so little been given to so many for so much.

Grumpy editors began to tell Eric, editorially, "to stop talking in technicolor" and get down to "talking turkey" to the moviemakers. Responsible industry figures, who had warned that Johnston was more interested in politics than pictures, muttered of open revolt. His abortive settlement of the studio jurisdictional strike left the big brass with a $60,000,000 headache. Wiseacres hinted that "Dear Eric" would be "Poor Yorick" in the industry long before his contract had expired. Other wits, discovering his partiality for his left profile, sneered, "He'd walk a mile for a camera."

Johnston didn't wait for the storm to break. In June 1946, he struck back through a special interview in Variety, the bible of show business.

"Frankly," he said, "there have been plenty of times I have disagreed with industry executives. But if they want a "yes-man" they don't need me. They can get someone for a couple of hundred dollars a month."

Variety added the warning: "Nothing is more certain than that if Johnston finds himself stymied too often, he will tell the motion-picture industry to get themselves another boy."

Eric was "taking open cognizance," according to the interview, "of increasingly frequent reports being heard of dissatisfaction by certain industry toppers with his administration as president." Nor was it to be overlooked that "Johnston is potential presidential timber in 1948."

ONE BIG, HAPPY FAMILY

The cry of "Timber!" was enough to bring the board of directors of the Motion Picture Association (as the Johnston office had been renamed) to heel. Johnston, it was decided, must be appeased at all costs. To stop wagging tongues, it was determined to extend his 5-year service contract to 7 years.

The new contract was signed with due public ceremony, and the sweet words exchanged, cynics believe, could have been written by one and the same hand.

Said Eric: "My experiences in the past year have strengthened my confidence in the enlightened, imaginative, public-spirited men in this industry. They are men of responsibility and broad vision who desire to bring the screen to its highest fruition."

Said his movie bosses: "Mr. Johnston's deep understanding of the motion picture as an instrument of democratic living, his demonstrated leadership and his farsighted vision have won our admiration and respect."

But this did not end Eric's troubles. For sex had entered the picture.

First, the Catholic Legion of Decency issued figures showing a great increase in "objectionable" films produced by his "enlightened, imaginative, public-spirited" confreres. Martin Quigley, the authentic father of the Motion Picture Production Code and a power in the industry, publicly deplored the "corrosive effects" some of the new pictures were having on young husbands and wives.

Then Duel in the Sun appeared and, despite its beautiful Technicolor, had to be relaundered. How wholesome it was for the kiddies, as originally released, perhaps is best indicated by a review in a leading trade publication. Exhibitors were told, quite simply, that Duel was "very, very hot stuff."

The game of saints and sluts, in which a player made famous by a religious portrayal suddenly was thrown into a sordid role, came to the screen. Ingrid Bergman, cast as a hard-drinking wench in a war-spy film, introduced a new movie kiss in a sequence which the studios promptly named the "nibbling scene." She began with Cary Grant's ear and worked down to his Adam's apple in a tattoo of nibbling little kisses which drew oh's and whistles from all over the house. It made the long, wet kiss a mere peck on the brow.

Eric's difficulties with religious and social opinion reached a climax in Forever Amber. Movieman Howard Dietz, in his year-end review for 1947, put it this way: "Amber was the most-discussed woman of the year: just as she made her screen debut she tripped over the censors and fell flat on her box office."

THE EXHIBITORS REVOLT

Now movie exhibitors, who had looked with high hope on Johnston's entrance into the industry, showed their alarm. The American Theaters Association demanded action "to police the films." The Allied Exhibitors' Association urged that Eric "take definite steps, as Hays did before him." President Zorn, of the United Theater Owners of Illinois, charged that "no small part of the ills that beset the exhibitor can be laid directly at the door of the Johnston office."

Johnston had grandly dismissed, from the very beginning, the work of his predecessor as mere "routine." He paid dearly for his blind spot.

Intention is nine points of the law in movie self-censorship. The production code does permit the entertaining suggestion of seduction and rape—when essential to the plot. It approves of passion—if not made too stimulating. It allows illicit sex—if not presented attractively. Censor Joe Breen knows what he's shouting about when he shouts to a director: "It's not what's in the script, but what's in your mind, that makes this scene dirty."

Back in the Will Hays era it had been a sight to see the boys lined up in similar circumstances, the evidence of public anger rammed down their throats and the threat of punitive taxation burned into their pocketbooks. The awesome rite they followed, called "code reaffirmation" and involving a written promise not to do it again, was something like taking the pledge.

Now, Johnston, too, read the riot act to the producers. He had waked up finally when the flood of bad pictures threatened to engulf him. Most conspicuously, he made a public example of Howard Hughes for using excessive mammary art in advertising his picture, The Outlaw.

Meanwhile Eric's troubles had been extended across the Atlantic. Last year he sailed for England to negotiate dollar payments for United States films displayed there. From Cabinet ministers to newspaper critics, the British rubbed his nose in the muck of American crime pictures.

His success in securing the removal of the ruinous British tax therefore was all the greater. But among his volatile movie bosses he suffered by comparison with Will Hays. Only a few years before his retirement, Hays had quietly negotiated through the State Department the release of a great chunk of frozen movie credits in England—a $50,000,000 melon which the major producers and their satellites distributed among themselves.

Johnston was less fortunate in his dealing with the Senate Committee on Un-American Activities when it trained its guns on the movie industry last fall. His friends were confident that he would mow 'em down, like the late Wendell Willkie in the notorious film "war-mongering" investigation in 1941. But the cinemoguls, who vowed their refusal to be "swayed by hysteria or intimidation from any source," swayed all over the place with contradictory statements.

The Los Angeles Times commented acidly about Johnston's leadership: "He has uncertain control, and experience tells the batter that he can never know where the president of the Motion Picture Association will throw the next one." The hearings left none in the industry proud of the performance.

Nevertheless, on balance, and considering the problems he inherited, Eric Johnston has amply earned his keep. Symptoms of fatty degeneration in the industry and moral halitosis on the screen were evident when he was enticed into the movies. It now is clear that he took much too seriously the make-believe promises from a make-believe world which the controlling film magnates whispered in his ear.

POLITICAL BALLYHOO

A flurry of political activity on his behalf began as soon as he took office—Johnston the Republican dark horse in 1948; Johnston for Vice President; Johnston the favorite son. It marked a dangerous departure from the fundamental policy of the industry. For years the slogan had been: "Keep the film out of politics." Accordingly, the job as Hays' successor had been tendered to (and rejected by) two college presidents.

But with Johnston's coming caution went out the window. "Industry toppers," Variety explained at the time, "hold that Johnston's chances of getting high office gives him added stature in his current dealings on the industry's behalf." Then last summer, Motion Picture Herald took Eric to task for acting as a keynoter at a Republican meeting. "When the executive head of the organized motion-picture industry makes a platform appearance in politics," thundered the Herald, "he inevitably carries his office with him. The motion-picture industry has no business in politics."

That cooked his political goose with the "toppers." Plans for a series of film shorts, featuring the sprightly film czar in a discussion of national issues and scheduled for release in this election year, were quietly buried.

WHITHER THE SCREEN?

Today the motion-picture industry is in a state of industrial and box-office gloom. Mediocrity rules the screen. After the easy money and lush attendance of the war years, when producers burped with prosperity and distributors reveled in a sellers' market, blight has struck—hard.

Television with its big, big eyes is staring hungrily at the industry, which has had its knuckles rapped by the courts for some of its trade practices. Government threatens the empire controlled by a few scared autocrats. Supermarket operators are looking appraisingly at some of the theaters that may go by the wayside. The life of a film czar is not always a happy one.

Yet the fact remains that the hope of better pictures lies in a lean and hungry box office. Then a wailing siren sounds from the theater. "Bank nites" return and free dishes begin to rattle in the lobbies. The smile of "fat cat" complacency—Sam Goldwyn's phrase—disappears from producers' faces. Exhibitors groan in agony. The cry of "Do something" rings out to the studios. The gilded peons of Hollywood are released from their chains and writers, producers, and directors, freed from the restraints of swivel-chair showmanship, strike out in new directions for new entertainment ideas.

And that's how better pictures are born.

There is no greater aggregation of talent anywhere in the world than exists in Hollywood. Pictures of distinction and significance have been made there. They have been made for "prestige," and they have been made from fright, as when church or state turned against the trinity of sex, crime, and horror on the screen.

But only a flow of new blood into the industry is likely to bring about the conditions under which the production of adult entertainment, gaged to various levels of public intelligence and appreciation, would become the deliberate and consistent policy of Hollywood. The tight hold which a few counting-house showmen, without training, taste, or tradition in the arts, now have on the industry would have to be broken.

The movie industry may have to travel a hard road to recovery. It would not come as a shock to the insiders if Johnston decided to take Mike Romanoff's advice and return to his vacuum cleaners, electrical gadgets, bricks and lime. But it will be on his own decision.

If he goes, he'll go with a bang and not with a whimper.

Mr. Speaker, I have noticed during the past year or two that many books which otherwise would be well worth reading have so much of obscenity, filth, and just plain dirt that I have been puzzled to ascertain the purpose of the writer. One such book, very well written, carrying an extremely interesting story, is that by Baynard Kendrick, and is entitled, "The Flames of Time." As stated, the story is interesting, it is entertaining, it is compelling in that once started you hesitate to lay the book down unfinished. But through it all runs a thread on which is hooked references and insinuations, which years ago would not be placed in any book. These constant references to sex, sexual relations, and everyday instances with which we are all familiar but to which one seldom refers, for many, spoil the story, leave the reader with a bad taste.

I asked a very well-known, widely read and competent reviewer, a man who also handles a Nation-wide radio program, why this method was followed. He laughed at me and said, "Why, don't you know, the authors who follow that method are trying to write a story which contains enough off-color incidents, enough references to sex, to passion, and to crime, so that he may sell it for perhaps $100,000 to the motion-picture industry," who so mistakenly thinks the public has a taste for that kind of thing.

The difficulty with the motion picture industry, he said, is that altogether too many of those who select the plays and plots have dirty minds themselves and having that kind of a mind, they think the people like that kind of sordid nastiness. Perhaps he is right, I do not know. Perhaps some day those who direct the motion-picture industry will discover that the American people like pictures which are clean and wholesome, that they do not care for barroom scenes. They do not care for any of those things which a dissolute, decaying nation sometimes sanction.

It would be a relief if we had at least one picture house in each town or city where only clean pictures, modest actions were portrayed where there were no words, sentences, or phrases of double meaning, where the reward went to the decent, the honest—the attendance would in time educate the producers as to what the American picture audience really wanted.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GORDON L. McDONOUGH

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Saturday Evening Post:

TRUMAN'S CENTRAL ERROR: FEAR OF LIBERO-LEFTIES

There must be times during these hot summer nights when President Truman asks himself how he contrived to get into this mess. If he were asking us, our diagnosis would be that he mistook the yips of the left-wingers for actual voting strength. Instead of dividing their pretentions by two, he should have divided by ten. The President's instincts, we imagine, would have told him to stay with the great American middle class. Instead, he permitted Dave Niles, and some others whom he forgot to drop into a deep well, to trap him into the absurd position of attacking a Congress, just elected by the people, as if it were an enemy of the people.

This is surely one of the reasons why the Democratic Party is being consigned to the morticians by almost everybody. It mistook the past support of Roosevelt and the New Deal for real radical sentiment which had to be appeased. Actually, there is little such sentiment in the country, and Wallace will get most of it—and would get it whatever the Democrats did. There never was much genuine radicalism here. The country supported the New Deal because the middle class thought itself squeezed from the top. It also had an idea that the workingman was having a rough trip and wanted to square things for him. Today, however, the middle class finds itself squeezed from below. Assistant office managers getting $75 a week and forced to pay $23 a day to bricklayers and plasterers think the shoe is on the other foot and would like to see labor leaders taken down a peg. So, believe it or not, would a considerable number of union members who are tired of being pushed around by Communist leaders or by non-Communist leaders who regard their prestige as more important than a man's right to work.

Instead of sensing this automatically through his smellers, President Truman let somebody feed into him intravenously the notion that any effort to curb labor-union leaders, even as mildly as this is attempted in the Taft-Hartley law, could be kissed off as "reactionary" and a plot to deceive the people. Why he thought the White House Janizaries would know more about what was popular than recently elected members of Congress would know is beyond us. Nevertheless, that is what he thought, and that is why the Democratic party is in the unique position of basing its campaign on the theory that the American people have conspired against themselves by electing the Eightieth Congress. If Mr. Truman had counted noses on the Taft-Hartley law alone, he might have learned that, of the 92 Members of Congress who voted for that law and sought renomination, only five were defeated in the 1948 primaries. Of these five, at least two could ascribe their defeats to other causes. Instead, Mr. Truman listened to the boys who belonged to the organizations with the long names—Americans for Totalitarian Liberalism Disguised as Democracy, and so on.

There are other reasons, both in the character of the President and in the fragmentation of his party, for the fact that Harry Truman is in over his head. But a central reason is his failure to be himself. At a time when the people were beginning to think more like haberdashers than like social planners, Harry went with the social planners—at least in his messages to Congress. It was bad guessing, and we're keeping principles out of this.

The American People Have the Largest Income and Worst Housing Shortage of All Time—$20,000 Houses Are Out of Reach of the Low-Income Group

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HERMAN P. EBERHARTER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of July 22, 1948:

HOME-BUILDING SLUMP?

Today's home-building boom is built on easy mortgage credit but credit is getting tighter. Therefore, the boom is in danger of fairly early collapse, long before a fraction of the need for new housing has been met.

With its stake in bank deposit insurance, the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation is urging caution on its member banks. It has just reminded them that half the real estate loans they already have are based on high prices and many loans would go bad in a decline of business activity.

FHA rules are becoming more stringent. The law under which it could guarantee mortgages on 90 percent of present values recently expired. It has reverted to covering 80 percent of reasonable long-run values, with the result, says Joseph M. Darst, FHA director in St. Louis, that new underwriting of rental housing has become virtually extinct.

Mortgage lenders are pulling in their horns. Many a homeless family has failed to buy either a new or an old house because the down payment has risen to thousands of dollars. Amounts that mortgage lenders will underwrite fall more and more short of present prices.

Another case in point is the $7,500 house designed by Look magazine. Builders who undertook to market it across the country "sent in the same story: 'Customers like my house very much—want one immediately but haven't ready cash—can't get loans—and I can't finance them."

Yet financial institutions are holding more money than they know what to do with. Why, then, should credit for so basic a need as housing become tight?

The reason is that the building industry has relied almost exclusively on easy credit and shirked the task of bringing the cash price of its product in line with what most families can afford to pay. Ever since FHA came on the scene, builders have assumed that "easy monthly payments" were all their industry needed. The National Association of Home Builders is still calling easy credit "the basic requirement" for a high continued building rate.

Living in that comfortable assumption, the industry tolerates handicraft methods and a chain of wastes and monopolies from the workman clear up the line to the building materials manufacturer. Instead of using Government credit facilities as a temporary crutch to keep going while it converted to mass production, it regarded them as a substitute for mass production. So its prices remained chronically high, and the postwar inflation has made them nearly prohibitive.

Today, therefore, the outlook is dark. Raymond M. Foley, the Federal Housing and Home Finance Administrator, described the outlook some months ago at the Home Builders' convention:

"Reduction of costs with lower prices and lower rents is obviously an essential if the private builder is to continue his large production for any long period. Even a no-down-payment market cannot long absorb full production at present prices. Even a system of fully guaranteed lifetime mortgages will not serve as a substitute for prices adjusted to average income."

In other words, $20,000 houses are out of the reach of $5,000-a-year families. Sheer desperation has made many families go into mortgages over their heads, but the risks which lenders dare to take on this unsound basis are running out, so the building boom is in danger of collapse into stagnation. This prospect is shocking enough by itself but it should also be remembered that the failure of a similar boom in the 1920's foreshadowed the 1929–33 depression, and to some extent caused it.

This happens at a time when the American people have the largest incomes and worst housing shortage of all time. What a devastating commentary it is on the building industry and governmental shortsightedness.

Red-Baiting Charges

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an article by Dorothy Thompson that appeared in the Washington (D. C.) Evening Star on Monday, August 2, 1948:

WALLACEITES' CHARGE OF RED BAITING AGAINST WRITER HELD AVOIDING ISSUE

(By Dorothy Thompson)

"I will not," said Henry Wallace in his convention press conference, "indulge in Red baiting."

I think it time to define this phrase, for it is being used as a means of concealing facts and deceiving the public.

Some time ago I wrote a review of Mr. Wallace's "Toward World Peace." In it I contradicted Mr. Wallace on numerous statements of fact. One of my readers wrote the Wallace headquarters asking for an answer to the charges. Wallace headquarters replied:

"This * * * is another example of the efforts of certain groups in this country to obscure vital issues behind a smoke screen of Red baiting * * *. Mr. Wallace has discussed the true motives behind the use of the Communist label and has exposed these groups whose interests are served by Red baiting."

REPLY HELD CHARACTERISTIC

Here you have a characteristic Communist response to a challenge on fact. Either what I said was so or it was not so. But unable to respond on that ground, the defenders transferred the controversy to a countercharge: I was acting in behalf of certain groups, throwing up a barrage against truth, had sinister motives, and was serving interests.

This tactic is being used to break down confidence in all anti-Communist writers and create the impression that everyone who calls a spade a spade is the agent of Fascist forces. This tactic does throw up a smoke screen, making it difficult to discriminate between Communists and Liberals of any kind, and serving all the forces of confusion. A Red-baiter, if the word has any meaning, is one who lumps all liberal movements together as agents of the Kremlin.

But it is not Red-baiting to assert that the so-called Progressive Party is a Communist-inspired creation, controlled by Communists. This is a statement of demonstrable fact. The roster of convention committees shows that, although there were few Communists on minor committees, the important party rules and platform committees were packed with them, and what issued from both shows that the Communists had their way.

PLATFORM MATCHES THAT OF REDS

Wherever there are Communists in an organization, their tactics is to seek concentration of power. In the Progressive Party rules, representation from the States with the strongest Communist minorities is increased over what they enjoy in other parties. In the national committee, additional members may be chosen by State members, and other opportunities are opened for packing the committee.

The platform committee presented and got adopted a platform which does not differ in one single matter of substance from the tentative platform of the Communist Party, as published in the Daily Worker. W. H. Lawrence, in the New York Times, analyzed the two platforms, point for point, and demonstrated this.

The Progressive Party is soliciting subscriptions for a new publication, the National Gazette Weekly, which "will prove that the truth is now, as it always has been, a vital commodity on the American market."

The first "truth" which this weekly should publish is that its listed contributors, native and foreign, are almost exclusively Communist. By "Communist," I mean they are writers who either are party members or who never diverge from the strict Communist line. They are not "liberals"; they are simon-pure Stalinists. So the Communists will put before the public, in the name of the Progressive Party, another Communist organ.

REFUSED THOMAS DEBATE

I think the American people ought to know these things. Millions of people do not know them. Norman Thomas, commenting on the Wallace convention in the New York Herald Tribune on Thursday, said correctly, "some people just won't believe you when you tell them the Communists are running the (Wallace) show. They won't believe it's fire until they've been burned."

Mr. Thomas, associated all his life with socialistic movements, knows exactly what is going on. It is significant that Mr. Wallace has refused to debate with him, though he has offered to meet President Truman and Mr. Dewey. When I asked a Wallaceite why, he replied, "We don't like Mr. Thomas' manner of debate." I suggest the reasons are, first, that Mr. Thomas knows the score in detail; and, second, that it is impossible for anyone to call him a "tool of sinister catelists."

The last thing that the forces who have pushed Mr. Wallace and Senator TAYLOR into the limelight want is truth, by which I mean publication of plain matters of fact.

Failure of the Special Session

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGIA L. LUSK
OF NEW MEXICO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mrs. LUSK. Mr. Speaker, undoubtedly the young people of this country are going to take a very active part in this Government's affairs in the future. The veterans returned from service with the expectation of speedy readjustment to civilian life, but they have been bewildered by the confusion that daily mounts and prevents or delays any degree of satisfactory and permanent accomplishment toward security for themselves or their young families.

With the directness characteristic of this generation they are tackling the problem of government. They are not inclined to partisanship in their judgments, but they are politically minded in the sense that they want effective action for good government, now.

As evidence of their interest I am submitting for the RECORD excerpts from the letter of a young constituent who is at present enrolled in a university, as follows:

It seems that the President has won this round, hands down, among the people who hold the balance of power in the election. If he can only keep it between now and the election, then Mr. Dewey might be in for a real surprise. Truman seemed to have gaged exactly how the Congress would react, and not too many people stop to realize how complicated congressional procedure really is. Truman carried his point, left it pretty indelibly, that this stuff could be passed in 2 weeks if the Congress would buckle down and go to work. Even the papers most anti-Truman are highly critical of the Congress—and none of them are playing the filibuster at all.

The comment around here, and my own personal feelings go pretty well along with it, is about this: that regardless of the motive for which the session was called, there is a pretty serious situation facing the country so far as inflation and housing are concerned; that it was time for something to be done by the only force which has the necessary power and resources to do the job, the Federal Government; that the President handed the Republican Party an opportunity to rise to statesmanship to contrast with the so-called political motive, and it was refused; that at least the President offered a program of action, whether it be good or not, while the Republicans refuse even to consider any kind of a program, much less formulate one of their own; that Dewey lost ground for saying the fight was not his fight when the problems are national and not personal; that Truman at this point will get the votes of the people who are hardest hit by the whole mess. Causes and reasons for the mess are forgotten. They seem like excuses when mentioned by either side. What does stand out is the fact that the economy is shot to hell and something should be done. The Congress—and that means to nearly everyone the Republicans—have had the opportunity to do something, and they have refused to do a thing. It's going to take a hell of a lot of explaining to get around that one; as long as this situation exists, it is not going to be forgotten. And the Democrats are the winners, regardless of anything anyone might say.

I listened to TAFT and HALLECK the other night, and a lot of other people around here did the same thing. Both were so lame in their reasons and excuses, apparently blind to what people are thinking, that they did the cause no good. Truman's reasoned appeal—and it must be called that—created a very fine impression. HALLECK's statement that "* * * this thing will iron itself out, after awhile * * *" sounds pretty feeble to someone who pays no less than $1 a pound for any kind of meat. There is no edible cut of meat in this country which sells for less. Boy, they have really blundered, and have only themselves to blame for what they did.

The Fuels Supply of the Nation—An Editorial Tribute to United States Senator George W. Malone, of Nevada

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BERTRAND W. GEARHART
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 26, 1948

Mr. GEARHART. Mr. Speaker, because of the great national interest in the fuels supply of the Nation, I hand to the Public Printer for inclusion in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an editorial from the July 1948 issue of the Texas Oil Journal, on the background and work of Hon. GEORGE W. MALONE, United States Senator for Nevada.

Senator MALONE is chairman of the National Resources Economic Committee set up by the Interior and Insular Affairs Committee of the United States Senate. This committee has already published the Minerals Position of the United States, and is at this time engaged in the preparation of the Fuels Position of the United States, to be published early next year as a result of extensive hearings and investigations.

The Fuels report will include, not only an estimate of the actual and potential petroleum, gas and coal reserves, but the status of the pilot plant work and experiments on the production of synthetic petroleum and gasoline from oil, shale and from coal, as well as the foreign supplies available to us under certain conditions.

Senator MALONE also heads a minerals and materials subcommittee of a special Senate committee appointed to review the Trust and Mandated Pacific areas following the special session of the Eightieth Congress—he expects to visit not only the Trust areas, but the East Indies, the South Seas, Japan, China, and India in the interest of coordinating the data and information on the available sources of such materials.

It will be remembered that the Senator visited the coal, steel, and chemical producing and manufacturing areas of the European Marshall plan countries during October and November in 1947, including the Ruhr and Frankfort mines and plants in Germany and the Birmingham production centers in England—also all of the petroleum-producing areas in the Middle East, including Iran—Abadan in old Persia, Saudi Arabia, and the 1,000-mile proposed oil line into the Mediterranean Sea area in Palestine.

The editorial to which I have just referred, Mr. Speaker, is the following:

The Interstate Oil Compact Commission will be signally honored at its summer meeting in New York on August 30–September 1, when United States Senator GEORGE W. MALONE (Republican of Nevada) appears on the program for an address at the invitation of Gov. Beauford H. Jester, of Texas, who is chairman of the Compact Commission.

Acceptance by Senator MALONE of the invitation of Chairman Jester will bring before this august body of the Nation's petroleum industry one of the most powerful figures in the United States Senate and one of the foremost American authorities on availability, production, and conservation of strategic and critical ores, metals, and minerals.

Because of his recognized ability as a lawmaker, his broad basic knowledge of America's mineral resources, and his high technical training combined with years of active experience, the address of Senator MALONE easily will be the high light of the Compact Commission's 3-day summer program and is expected to attract a large attendance of compact officials and committeemen and a wide representation of top officials of the petroleum industry from all over the United States.

Senator MALONE (who has recently been in Texas, largest oil-producing State, at the invitation of Comdr. Carl Estes, publisher of Texas Oil Journal; and who conferred with Governor Jester and a number of important oil men in Longview, Dallas, Houston, and elsewhere) is the real workhorse of the Senate so far as research and planning for the utilization of natural resources and production is concerned.

He is chairman of the National Resources Economics Committee, a division of the important Senate Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs. He also is chairman of the Subcommittee on Flood Control, Navigation, Dams, and Electric Power, a part of the powerful Public Works Committee of the Senate. He is author of a huge industrial encyclopedia of 11 Western States, an important contribution to industrial and governmental knowledge of natural resources in these States, and in the compilation of which he had the assistance of between 400 and 500 technical and industrial experts.

Senator MALONE is a graduate engineer, and is a member of the American Society of Civil Engineers and of the American Institute of Mining and Metallurgical Engineers. He formerly was managing director of Industrial West Foundation (nonprofit corporation), Industrial Encyclopedia and Industrial Service; served as expert consultant to the Secretary of War; former chairman of the Nevada State Board of Registered Professional Engineers; member of the Colorado River Advisory board, as engineer member of the Colorado River Commission; was advisor to the Secretary of the Interior in construction of the Hoover (Boulder) Dam and wrote report on natural resources of area and use of power (published, 1935); consulting engineer on Central Valley water project (cost $334,000,000) and of board of supervisors, Los Angeles County, Orange County, and Newport Harbor, Calif., on special work relating to flood control, water storage and harbor improvement; and was commissioned as United States Mineral Surveyor in California and Nevada.

The Senator became a powerful figure in his home State of Nevada before being elected to the Senate in 1946. He was State engineer in 1927–35, serving as a member of the Nevada Public Service Commission, member and secretary, Colorado River Commission, State Bond Commission, State Range Commission, State Irrigation Committee, State Planning Board, and National Committee on Conservation and Administration of Public Domain; resigned to resume consultant practice in 1935; was special consultant on strategic and critical minerals and materials, Senate Military Affairs subcommittee and to the Chandler Committee on Examination of Military Establishments; and inspected bases in the Aleutian Islands, Alaska, and the South Seas in 1942–43.

He is a veteran of World War I, having enlisted as a private in 1917, Field Artillery, U. S. Army; sergeant, Fortieth Division, AEF; served in England and France as lieutenant, line officer and regimental intelligence officer, 1918–19. He is a former department commander and national vice commander of the American Legion; and a former president of the Nevada Council of Boy Scouts of America.

In the Eightieth Congress, Senator MALONE introduced a most ably conceived and highly important bill entitled "The Mining Industry and National Security," designed to stimulate the production and conservation of strategic and critical ores, metals, and minerals in the interest of national defense. * * * The Senator's work on this measure drew high praise and recognition from many of his colleagues and from authorities both inside and outside the Government, but the crush of "must" legislation and the hurry to adjourn Congress for the party conventions left the bill without final action. It is hoped to secure action in the special called session.

Senator MALONE, an indefatigable worker, is a stanch advocate of a governmental policy which will make possible and encourage private industry and capital to develop strong and adequate domestic mineral resources. He is intensely interested in petroleum and because of his training and experience and his influential position in Congress, his address before the Oil Compact Commission will be highly significant.

High Cost of Living and Housing Problems

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HERMAN P. EBERHARTER
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letters:

UNITED STATES
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., August 4, 1948.

Hon. JOSEPH W. MARTIN, Jr.,
Speaker of the House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: As every Member of Congress knows, the two most important domestic problems in the minds of the American people today are the high cost of living and housing.

The high cost of living is rapidly eradicating the middle class and creating a new group of poor. The poor, as a result of high prices, are being driven down to a level that can only be called degradation.

The lack of a national housing program and the failure to enact slum-clearance legislation has brought discomfort to hundreds of thousands of families.

These two problems can be cured only by congressional action. The failure of the Congress to take cognizance of the plight of millions of our people will not only be a violation of our oath of office, but also an actual tort against the American way of life.

We, the undersigned Members of the House of Representatives, request that you, as a member of the Republican policy-making body which controls the Congress, use your influence against any effort to adjourn unless a program for national public housing and the lowering of the high cost of living is brought out on the floor of the respective Houses for discussion and vote.

Yours truly.

UNITED STATES
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., August 4, 1948.

Resignation of Arthur Prudden Coleman

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS S. GORDON
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article that appeared in the Polish Review of July 28, 1948:

Many of you know me personally, from long years of working together in a common cause. Others know me only from hearsay and from newspaper reports of the care which has been stirred up in recent days by my resignation from the Slavic department of Columbia University.

To all of you I address the following statement, clarifying my position in connection with this case. I assure you I have loved my work at Columbia during these 20 years, and Mrs. Coleman, too, has loved her part in it. With the deepest regret we sever our connections with this great institution. That we must take this step, you will readily understand, once you have read my statement below:

"MY REASONS FOR RESIGNING FROM THE SLAVIC DEPARTMENT OF COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY

"On June 1, 1948, Acting President of Columbia Fackenthal announced in the New York Times and other papers that he had accepted from the present Polish regime in Warsaw an initial gift of $5,000 toward the establishment of an Adam Mickiewicz professorship of Polish language and literature and the appointment of Manfred Kridl to this professorship. This action has now been ratified by the trustees of Columbia and President Dwight D. Eisenhower.

"I am opposed to the policy represented by the acceptance of this gift and cannot continue working in a department financed in this manner. I am unalterably against the acceptance by Columbia or any other American university of money from Poland or any of the other satellite governments of Moscow.

"To continue teaching in a department financed by Cominform regimes would be to fall into the error for which we blame the German professors who, by remaining in their chairs in obedient silence, gave tacit approval of the Nazi regime. I do not wish to appear to condone any totalitarian regime, Fascist or Communist.

"As the national secretary-treasurer of the American Association of Teachers of Slavic and East European Languages, I have signed the non-Communist affidavit, giving my word under oath that I do not support any organization that believes in or teaches the overthrow of the United States Government by force. One has but to read any day's batch of the papers issued in Poland today to know that the regime in power in Warsaw would like nothing better than to do just this: to overthrow not only our Government but our whole way of life, under the leadership of the 'glorious Red Army.'

"There are many ways of working toward the overthrow of our Government and one is by academic infiltration. This is the method we see being undertaken with the above gift. I cannot connive in any such business, or seem to approve it, by collaborating amicably with the professor who is to be the recipient of the subsidy.

"I have taught at Columbia 20 years, and in that time, in accordance with the policy laid down by the late Nicholas Murray Butler, have been free to teach whatever I have felt to be the truth. Can one believe this will be the case in the future, as more and more men are brought in, paid by regimes having as one of their main principles Marxian thought-control? I do not think so.

"It will not be long before professors free to think as they please will be outnumbered by those behind whose backs we can see the shadow of some dictator. In some departments the time is close at hand when this will be the case.

"Apparently Columbia is selling its birthright for the Greek gift of totalitarian subvention. I want no part of this.

"ARTHUR PRUDDEN COLEMAN."

Arthur Prudden Coleman was born in Seymour, Conn., on July 19, 1897, the son of Michael Lyon Coleman and Carrie Davis Coleman.

He was educated in the public schools of Seymour and Southington, Conn., and in the Cheshire Academy, in Cheshire, Conn.

During the First World War he enlisted in the United States Navy and served first as a second-class seaman, later attending officers' training school at Yale.

With the ending of the war, he went back to his studies at Wesleyan University, and was graduated with honors in languages in 1920.

He did 1 year of graduate work at Yale, and it was at this time that he began his formal studies in the Slavic field. Because Yale did not at this time have full facilities for Slavic work, Coleman transferred to Columbia, where in June 1922 he took his master of arts degree in Slavic languages and literatures. From this he went on to work for his doctor of philosophy degree, still in the Slavic field, and still at Columbia, where the Honorable John Dyneley Prince, founder of the department, was chairman.

In the years 1923–24 Coleman studied in Charles University, Praha, Czechoslovakia, as a fellow holding a grant from the Czechoslovak Government.

Returning home in the autumn of 1924, Coleman took his final doctoral examination, and in June 1925 was awarded the degree of doctor of philosophy in Slavic. He was the first American of non-Slavic ancestry to receive this degree. While finishing up his work for the degree, Coleman taught French at New Haven High School.

In 1925 (autumn) Coleman accepted a position as professor of French and German at Olivet College, Michigan. The following year he transferred (along with the former president of Olivet) to Battle Creek College, where he was chairman of the department of modern languages.

In the spring of 1928 Coleman returned to the field of his choice, which was Slavic, when he accepted a post as teacher of Polish in extension at Columbia.

In 1930 Coleman was made lecturer in Polish at Columbia, and in 1946 assistant professor of Polish at the same university.

Coleman has written widely on Polish matters.

New Jersey Legislature Recognizes Importance of Having Merchant Shipbuilding Program Immediately

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, I submit for the RECORD copy of Joint Resolution 10, Public Laws of 1948, adopted by the Legislature of New Jersey, on July 16, 1948. It is further indication of a widespread interest that is being taken in the subject of proceeding with all possible dispatch in the preparation and adoption of necessary legislation to encourage a comprehensive program of merchant shipbuilding in this country.

The resolution is as follows:

Joint Resolution 10

Joint resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to proceed with all possible dispatch to the preparation and adoption of necessary legislation designed to encourage and make adequately effectual a comprehensive program of merchant shipbuilding in this country's shipyards and of expanding our merchant marine

Whereas through the sale of our tankers and cargo carriers abroad, the export of our steel, and the failure to grant authority for the construction of needed merchant tonnage at home, our merchant marine and our shipbuilding activities have suffered drastic decline; and

Whereas while our position in world shipping has thus deteriorated, other nations have achieved new highs in ship construction; and

Whereas we have learned that we must depend upon our own resources of ships and shipbuilding for our national defense and security; and

Whereas the present world situation requires that the United States stand fully prepared against any emergency: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate and General Assembly of the State of New Jersey:

1. That the Congress of the United States be and is hereby urged to proceed with all possible dispatch to the preparation and adoption of necessary legislation designed to encourage and make adequately effectual a comprehensive program of merchant shipbuilding in this country's shipyards and of expanding our merchant marine.

2. That the secretary of state be and is hereby directed to transmit immediately following the passage of this joint resolution a copy thereof, properly authenticated, to the President of the United States, the President pro tempore of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the Representatives of the State of New Jersey in the Congress, and the Maritime Commission.

3. This joint resolution shall take effect immediately.

Approved July 16, 1948.

Birthday Tribute to Hon. Arthur Capper, of Kansas, by Harry W. Colmery

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLYDE M. REED

OF KANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 6 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address by Mr. Harry W. Colmery, on the occasion of the birthday of our distinguished colleague, ARTHUR CAPPER, July 14, 1948, at Topeka, Kans., in recognition of his 34 years of public service as Governor and United States Senator.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Thank you, Mr. Holbrook.

My fellow citizens of Kansas; friends of ARTHUR CAPPER, everywhere; both those who are gathered here in this pulsating, admiring crowd, and those who, listening over WIBW, are likewise a part of our family circle; and our distinguished friend, ARTHUR CAPPER, United States Senator from Kansas.

As the Eightieth Congress of the United States was approaching its adjournment, Senator CAPPER announced his intention to retire from the United States Senate. As a symbol of the esteem in which Kansas and all of her people hold him, the Topeka Chamber of Commerce gives public recognition to Senator CAPPER for his 34 years of service as Governor and United States Senator, and welcomes him back home to Topeka, as our first citizen.

It is fitting that we should choose this, his birthday party, as the occasion for our tribute. For there is no other gathering at which these smiling faces, these voices of good will, this radiant warmth of recognition, manifesting, as they do here, the freshness of a morning friendship which lasts throughout a full and successful day, reciprocates so well that loyalty, as deeply ingrained as the veins of an oak, which Senator CAPPER has for Kansas and her people.

For 40 years, this annual birthday party, has stood forth as an institution through which Senator CAPPER exemplifies his unselfish service to, and his friendship for, others. But great as it is, his personal presence here today confers dignity upon the custom itself, by reason of his life and example.

Nothing could be more appropriate at the conclusion of his long career of distinguished public service, than to welcome him back to Topeka. For here he came, 64 years ago, a country lad of 19 years, and found his first job, setting type. Here he came, a typical American farm boy, with a high-school education, a personality that radiated friendship, a clear head, a desire to work and a will to do. He asked no one to put a blueprint of opportunity in his hands. All he asked for was a job. On his own, with faith in himself, he saw opportunity yonder on the horizon, and buckled up his belt and "made for it." Here, from humble beginning, he laid the foundation upon which he builded an enviable success in private life, a career of distinguished public service, and a gratifying investment in friendships. His guiding maxim has been that, if he would "be honest with the world, the world would be honest with him"—the fundamental truth of all real prosperity and happiness.

In the appraisal of men, it is rather difficult to define what constitutes a distinction. Nevertheless, it is a distinction to be the longest of your line in any pursuit, profession or vocation, because there are many competitors, and there is always a bomb with the fuze lighted, under your official chair. So it is no mean accomplishment that our friend we honor is the first native-born Governor of Kansas; the oldest living Governor; the oldest public servant of our State; and has the longest record of service of any Republican in the United States Senate.

To have been in close and active participation with the leaders of public thought and affairs over a period of 34 years makes a life of extraordinary education and opportunity. And to have known personally and intimately all of the Presidents of that period, and to have had in a large measure the confidence of the great minds of his time, has been a rare privilege. These, also, are distinctions, which our friend may properly claim.

But these are not the distinctions which make Senator CAPPER a great man. He is great because:

He is good, honest, and clean.

He has played the political game straight for 34 years.

He has the courage to be just.

He considers his duty to be a public duty, to preserve the interest of all the people as against any group or sector.

He is modest, kindly, gentle, and generous, and has no vengeance in his heart.

He is patient and humble, a friend of, and interested in, all the people.

He lets kindly sentiment have a voice in an age where the heart has played too small a part in public life.

He typifies the Kansas blend which has always been in the forefront of progress and of new ideas.

His conscience governs his actions, and, though a partisan Republican, the party is only the instrument through which to serve the people.

He is honest in his purpose and sincere in his convictions, and his mistakes are of the head, and not of the heart.

He is more interested in having his idea accepted than to have himself recognized—the mark of a big man.

He does not spend time thinking about what a big man he is, or trying to make you believe that he is something that he is not. His time is so fully occupied in his purpose to get things done, that he has no hours left for self-contemplation.

He dedicates himself to an ideal and a purpose, leaving the result to Providence. He will never choke himself to death burning his own incense.

He believes that we have a duty to preserve our heritage of freedom and liberty which has given us so much and that that can only be done through the character and integrity of our citizenry.

He believes in the people and the will of the majority.

With all of these qualities, inherent in his life and services, Senator CAPPER needs no eulogy. His name is engraved indelibly upon the hearts of the people of Kansas. His service attests his greatness. He has done his duty and trusted to history for his meed of praise. His record is like a torch. The more it is shaken, the brighter it burns. It is with humility that we appraise him in the past, "for on our future laurels he looks down, himself our highest crown."

Senator CAPPER, we gather here to do you honor because of what you are, and because it is in the unshaken faith of men like you that the world finds that its hopes are mightily strengthened. How abundantly your faith has been justified is readily visible to your eyes.

Paraphrasing the epitaph emblazoned in St. Paul's Cathedral, in London, for its architect, Sir Christopher Wren, we may say to you:

"If you would see your monument, look about you." Follow me as I interpret the inscriptions on its four facades:

First. CAPPER, the great humanitarian: These thousands gathered here to welcome you on your eighty-third birthday, bearing testimony of their personal esteem and affection for you, reveal you as a collector of friendships, and that you never sold or gave away a single one.

Thousands of children whose broken bodies have been made whole, whose twisted limbs have been made straight; who, though bedfast or lame have been made to walk; or, though blind, have been made to see, evidence your generosity and Christian interest in assisting handicapped children to have good health and comfort and a fair chance in life—through the program of the Capper Foundation for Crippled Children.

Those stalwart, disciplined, well-mannered Boy Scouts rendering an unselfish service in their own right, are the symbols of your prospecting for strength of character and high purpose among the Nation's boyhood, through your support of the Jayhawk Council of Boy Scouts and your services as a member of the National Council.

Your compassion for homeless children finds its expression in your service as a member of the board of governors of National Home for Orphan Children at Mooseheart, Ill.

And here, I see the thousands of members and alumni of the Capper Pig and Calf and Poultry Clubs, later developing into a Nation-wide 4-H Club organization, through which you have evidenced your trust in farm boys and girls, instilled in them confidence and self-reliance, encouraged their parents to give them opportunity, and have given stability to and strengthened the life and the economy in our agricultural areas.

Second. CAPPER, the great businessman: I see hundreds of your employees, shop, office, and field; worker and executive, here to say hello, proud of you as their boss and friend. They reflect your fairness, consideration, and willingness to give praise to worthy subordinates for the work they have done. Like the chief artist who weaves the Gobelin tapestries, you are content to stand behind the cloth and let those in front appear to be the chief contributors to the beauty of the fabric—your business.

And here I see the march of your business progress, as with particular genius and hard work, you have advanced from the typesetter, to taking your 700 weekly circulation to the post office in a pushcart, to your present publishing enterprise with its eight farm papers and two daily newspapers, read in 4,000,000 homes, supplemented by two radio stations—not bad for an Anderson County farm boy.

And rounding out this success is your well-balanced conception, buttressed by performance, of your willingness to cooperate and to carry your share of civic and community responsibility.

Third. CAPPER, the great public administrator: A good loser and a true sportsman, you refused to contest your first political defeat, even though you lost by only 29 votes—to come back and be elected the first native governor by the largest majority ever given a governor up to that time.

A forthright leader in matters of policy and a capable and fearless executive, who reflected a great love and loyalty for Kansas, and was ever ready to defend her against the assaults of her enemies.

As a wartime governor, you were a great patriot, speaking with that force of affection which a man feels for his country, declaring that "our national honor must be maintained, our flag must command the respect of every belligerent," and that "the one plain duty of every individual is to give his supreme effort to the cause in which we are engaged," stating that "the man who falters, who stops now to whine about what might have been, is disloyal."

Fourth. CAPPER, the great public legislator: Here I see a man of honest purpose and sincerity of conviction, whose conscience governed his vote and action, who looked upon his duty as a public duty, to serve the interest of all the people above that of any group or sector, and who missed only 10 out of 2,000 roll calls.

A Senator who, with a definite conviction that agriculture is the backbone of the Nation, made it his principal interest and devoted his career primarily to the improvement of American agriculture and the status of the American farmer.

A Senator who believes that men should work out their own salvation, and be rewarded according to their just deserts.

The cosmopolitan character of your guests here today, of every race, class, creed, and social and economic strata, symbolizes the dedication of your service to all men, as the only basis for just and fair dealing.

A Senator who would not compromise on matters of great principle, and who embodied in his public service all his capacity for friendship, and a magnanimity to foe and a generosity to friends which will be talked of as long as manly qualities are honored.

A Senator who has given careful attention to our every request, and rendered valuable service in matters of vital interest to our city.

Senator CAPPER, fourscore and more years, seem wonderful in prospect. But as we behold you who have passed the great climacteric of 80, and examine your record, it fortifies us with hope for the future. We recognize that you have not penned any idle platitudes, but that, in your public service, you have spoken the earnest convictions of an honest heart.

The Topeka Chamber of Commerce, which you have served so long and faithfully, has adopted and spread on its official records, a resolution attesting its appreciation for your splendid service to Kansas and the Nation. It is my distinct honor and privilege, on behalf of its board of directors, to present both, that resolution to you and also this bronze plaque:

"In grateful appreciation of your 34 years of untiring service to the people of Kansas, as Governor and United States Senator."

And with deep and heartfelt gratitude, we, the people, bestow our fervent accolade of approval, "Well done thou good and faithful servant," and bid you enter, for we are happy to have you come back home.

Won't you all join me in a hearty wish to Senator CAPPER for his good health, and an abundance of all those things which make life comfortable and happy.

The Farmers' PAC

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. CHARLES R. ROBERTSON

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 6, 1948

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, it has wisely been said that politics makes strange bedfellows, and no place is it more effective than in the State of North Dakota. In the last primary election on June 29, former Congressman Usher L. Burdick, a candidate of the Farmers Union PAC, defeated Congressman CHARLES R. ROBERTSON, Republican, for his seat in Congress.

Usher L. Burdick's son, Quentin Burdick, who once ran for Lieutenant Governor on the Nonpartisan League—Republican—ticket, turned over to be secretary of the Democratic Party in North Dakota. With the growth of the Farmers Union leadership politically, young Burdick became their Political Action Committee chairman, serving in a similar capacity for the Farmers Union as Sidney Hillman for the CIO.

Quentin Burdick, son of Usher L. Burdick, who won the Republican political nomination, supported by the Political Action Committee of the Farmers Union, was a delegate to the Wallace convention in Philadelphia this year. This occurred shortly following Usher L. Burdick's election. And according to newspapers, Quentin served on the Wallace platform committee.

And so you see, politics does make strange bedfellows. Too often their efforts are directed for elections, not public service. If Usher L. Burdick wins the fall election he will come to Congress under the label of a Republican because for 33 years the Nonpartisan League has occupied a place on the Republican ballot both in the primaries and in the fall election. He has maintained all along that he was a leaguer and will probably continue to maintain that he is a leaguer. And he peculiarly has some leaguers' support. But the really intellectual leaguers know that they were taken over body and soul by the Political Action Committee of the Farmers Union, headed by Jim Patton, Bill Thatcher, and Glenn Talbott. This is generally recognized by political writers throughout the country.

Under unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, I include herewith an editorial appearing in the St. Paul Dispatch of July 31, 1948, the subject of which is the Farmers' PAC.

THE FARMERS' PAC

North Dakota farmers are on the warpath again, according to some political experts who have studied the outcome of the recent Republican primaries in that State. The Nonpartisan League, which led many successful agrarian revolts in the past, has been showing its age, and consequently is being supplanted in large measure by the youthful and vigorous Farmers Union Progressive Alliance.

Theoretically, the league and FUPA combined forces against the conservative Republican organizing committee in the primaries. They succeeded in nominating one of the State's two candidates for Congress and captured a clear majority of the nominations for the lower chamber of the State legislature. Candidates for the State senate are almost evenly divided.

Farmers Union members were particularly resentful of the "ripper" bills aimed by the last legislature at the business activities of the union. The State insurance commissioner, who has tried to outlaw the union's companies was almost defeated for renomination, although Governor Aandahl, also backed by the ROC, won handily.

The FUPA seems to be patterned after the political action committees set up by organized labor in recent elections. It has no corporate existence, although the members pay regular dues. It is staffed by the officers of local or county Farmers Unions. This fosters autonomy and tends to prevent the growth of factionalism. The FUPA gives every sign of becoming a permanent force in North Dakota politics.

Loss of a Great Statesman

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK A. MATHEWS, JR.
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 6, 1948

Mr. MATHEWS. Mr. Speaker, on June 14, 1948, the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD contains the reprint of a speech made almost 9 years ago by the Honorable ALBERT W. HAWKES, senior Senator from New Jersey, entitled "Who Can Preserve Representative Democracy?"

On June 19, 1948, this same Senator made his valedictory speech. He is not running for reelection.

These two speeches should be read by every American interested in preserving all that America has meant. They should be read by anybody who wonders whether the principles of this kind of Americanism can last 9 years longer, by everyone who wonders whether the same principles apply today that applied 9 years ago or 99 years ago, and by everyone who wants to know whether there are still men who can stand by these principles in which they believe regardless of what happens to themselves or their political careers.

The words of the senior Senator of New Jersey will be meaningless to those who claim credit for supporting anything and everything they thought popular today, and tomorrow seek to escape the responsibility of the overbearing taxation, the failure of accomplishment, and the loss of personal liberty which result.

The words of this Senator will be sneered at by those who believe the function of the Government is to distribute material benefits derived from liberty equally between those who accept and those who evade its responsibilities.

At a time when stalwart defenders of true liberty, with all the responsibilities, hardships, spiritual strength, and human dignity that go with it, are needed as much as, if not more than, ever before, it is disheartening and discouraging that we must lose from a public body like the United States Senate the services of the Honorable ALBERT W. HAWKES.

I know however, that Senator HAWKES will continue his valiant battle no matter where he is, where he goes, or what he does. I fervently wish him continued and greater success in his distinguished career.

Controls Won't Help

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ABE McGREGOR GOFF
OF IDAHO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 6, 1948

Mr. GOFF. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am including an editorial from the Idaho Statesman of July 29, 1948, which is a sound and well-worded answer to the President's request for price-control authority. Every Member of Congress is anxious to bring help to the harassed housewife, but most of us are agreed that the granting of the President's request would make the situation worse instead of better. This is particularly true when we consider the lack of judgment and administrative ability he has so clearly demonstrated.

The editorial is as follows:

CONTROLS WON'T HELP

President Truman is not shooting square when he blames the Republican Congress for inflation. And he is playing cheap politics when he implies that in 2 weeks of a special session he has called in spite and anger the Congress could, if it would, rectify inflation by applying price and wage controls.

In the first place, the Republican Congress did not cause inflation. The Republican Congress is not responsible for the war which, along with the New Deal policies of spend-and-elect, ran up the tremendous annual budgets which have set unprecedented billions to circulating in this country.

The Republican Congress did not create the world situation which finds Uncle Sam, prompted by a spirit of humanity mixed with the instinct to help those who may one day help us against a common enemy, wisely sharing millions of tons of food and material with starving and Communist-threatened peoples abroad.

The Republican Congress is not responsible for the domestic shortage of food and materials which, thus created, encourages prices already lifted by an abundance of money in circulation to climb even higher.

The circumstances which contributed to our current high prices were engendered long before the Republican Congress was elected less than 2 years ago. The President's timing is bad, therefore, when he tries to lay the onus of inflation on the newly elected GOP.

And when he suggests price control as the solution for inflation, Mr. Truman is even farther off the beam. The present Republican Congress campaigned on a platform of promises to rid the country of the restrictive controls which had, by 1946, created an economic nightmare of shortages and black markets so horrible as to have encouraged even Mr. Truman to begin talking of lifting controls. The American people elected the current Congress to do two things: To balance the power labor unions were abusing—which it did with the Taft-Hartley law; and to remove price controls—which it also did.

Following the removal of price controls, production has steadily increased in this country. Not enough to keep up with the war-delayed demands of millions of veterans and their new families, and with overseas-aid demands, and with the demands of more spending money than has ever before flooded this country. But enough so that there is considerably more to be had these days, albeit at higher prices, than there was to be had in the days of the OPA.

The President, without explaining how or why, has said the resumption of price controls would solve our inflation problems, or at least keep us from going "bust." We wonder. What encouragement is there about freezing the price of butter at, say, 95 cents a pound that is supposed to induce a dairyman to produce more and more butter to sell at a price he already is complaining is too low for a fair profit? The only real result of controlling the price of butter, or anything else, would simply be—less butter, or less anything else.

Price controls would discourage production—which is the basis of American wealth and welfare. They did before, they would again.

Finally, as Mr. Truman himself said, just about a year ago, price controls are a sign of a police state. And we are quite certain the United States does not yet face an emergency strong enough to require its free people to declare themselves a police state—particularly under Mr. Truman's vacillating guidance.

Address of H. Stewart Potter

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN C. KUNKEL
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 6, 1948

Mr. KUNKEL. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks, I include an address made by Mr. H. Stewart Potter, of Halifax, Pa., and Arlington, Va., at the dedication of the beautiful Soldier Memorial Field at Halifax on July 3, 1948. The forward-looking people of Halifax are to be congratulated upon this fine achievement.

The address follows:

Mr. Chairman, General Gilbert, honored guests, ladies and gentlemen, I deeply appreciate your committee inviting me to speak here this afternoon at the dedication of this memorial park. It is an honor indeed. I love Halifax and its people. I am keenly interested in this community. I call this occasion a chapter in the history of Halifax. Today, I am witnessing the fulfillment of one of my dreams—a public recreation park and stadium. I have favored such a recreational center for more than 35 years. Unknown to most of you, my pen, through the columns of the old Halifax Gazette, first advocated such a center as a memorial to our soldier dead—and as a tribute to the living heroes. The granite marker that you citizens had erected on borough property on Armstrong Street back in 1921 is a fine tribute to the boys who participated in World War I, but how much more fitting is this living memorial. In creating this park the citizens of this community have provided a place where your boys and girls can enjoy good wholesome amusement, not only the boys and girls of today, but the boys and girls of the future.

This park will be used to help develop stronger bodies and clean minds. You will also use this park as a means of instructing your young folks how to live the American way. Knowing the citizens of this community as I do, I have no fear that communism—or any other ism will creep into your midst to destroy the way of life we Americans are privileged to enjoy.

It is time for faith in God and confidence in the ways of divine providence in our midst. It is time for the rebirth of patriotism. A time to esteem the sacrifices and triumph of patriots who have gone before us, to proclaim the good in America which lightens our day, to prepare the way for that greater America which by God's grace shall be the future.

The world is in a state of unrest, and it does not yet appear what the future holds for us. Confusion and strife are prevalent throughout the earth. It is probably to be expected, for you cannot blow out the brains of millions of people and destroy billions of dollars worth of property without causing terrific economic, political, and social dislocations.

We have come here today to do honor not only to the brave boys and girls who fought in World War II, but to honor those earnest young men who left their homes to defend them at Concord, Antietam, San Juan, the Argonne, and in the snows of the Ardennes.

For as long as freemen have lived, worked, worshipped, and reared their families in these valleys, so long have their sons been summoned to arms against those who could covet or destroy them. In generation after generation they have been forced to quit their quiet homes to fight—and sometimes to die—in conflicts visited upon them by issues that seemed remote from their everyday lives.

From the chancelleries of London, Paris, Berlin, Tokyo, Rome, and Moscow, these bitter struggles that have scarred the progress of all mankind eventually spanning the seas to invade the quiet parlors and warm kitchens of your homes. And as these world struggles have wasted the youth and resources of nations, they have also left behind them sorrowing women and empty chairs.

It is easy for us who are living to honor the sacrifices of those who are dead, for it also helps us to assuage the guilt we should feel in their presence. Wars can be prevented just as surely as they are provoked and therefore we who fail to prevent them must share in the guilt of the dead.

Let these words be the prayer of every American:

What builds the Nation's pillars high
And its foundations strong?
What makes it mighty to defy
The foes that round it throng?
Not gold, but only men make
A people great and strong;
Men, who for truth and honor's sake,
Stand fast and suffer long.
Brave men who work while others sleep,
Who dare while others fly—
They build a nation's pillars deep
And lift them to the sky.

While a period of 29 years has elapsed since we left Halifax to take up our residence across the Potomac River from the Nation's Capital City, I want to assure you that Mrs. Potter and I have always kept a warm spot in our hearts for you good folks. We have maintained our legal voting residence here through the years. Some of our finest friends live in this vicinity.

In the language of the poet, let me say:

The moonlight falls the oftest,
The summer days come softest,
In Pennsylvania.

Friendship is the strongest,
Love's light glows the longest,
Yet wrong is always the wrongest,
In Pennsylvania.

Life's burdens bear the lightest,
The home fires burn the brightest,
In Pennsylvania.

The sun shines ever brightest,
The breezes whisper lightest,
In Pennsylvania.

Plain girls are the fewest,
Their young hearts are the truest,
Maidens' eyes are the bluest,
In Pennsylvania.

Looking back over the baseball teams that represented Halifax in the long ago, I so well remember the names of such stars as Danny Ludlow, Bill Taylor, Ike Bowman, Hiram Shultz, Charley Poffenberger, the three Biever boys—Harry, Elmer, and Ike; Claude Ryan, John Prenzel, Frank Brubaker, George and Jim Schroyer, Paul Bowman, Sam Bowman, Chic Rutter, Herbie Boyer, and Harvey Bowman. There were still many others whose names have now been erased from my memory by time. Back in 1908—40 years ago—I had the privilege of being manager of a traveling baseball club representing Halifax. The sole reason for calling us a traveling club was because the town baseball diamond had been sold for building sites and no playing field was available. The traveling was mostly between Halifax and Millersburg, and Elizabethville and Duncannon. The means of travel was by a two-horse covered wagon propelled by a team of horses owned and driven by Charlie Knouff. Few of the town's baseball stars ever made the big show, but an exception was Harry Biever, who pitched in the Tri-State and O. and P. Leagues, and in later years Norry Bowman was in organized baseball. I can well remember the rivalry that existed between Halifax and Millersburg, Dauphin, Elizabethville, Newport, Duncannon, and Liverpool teams, and the number of folks who accompanied the team when it was on the road, cheering the boys when they were winning and sympathizing with them when they lost.

Halifax and surrounding community sent its full quota of men and women to help defend our country in its grave hour of need during World War II, 364 persons being enlisted in its defense. Of this number, 13 paid the supreme sacrifice. Some of these will forever sleep beneath the sod of other lands.

In addition to manpower, many thousands of dollars were invested in war bonds. Many other sacrifices were made in order that the war could be brought to a successful conclusion.

Thank God, today the sky has partly cleared of war clouds and the blue sky of peace is beginning to show on the horizon.

It is now vitally important that the citizens of this community begin thinking and planning for the physical welfare of the residents of Halifax and its environs. You folks need many things here. You have now provided a recreation park. You also need a swimming pool. An important and essential need of the community is that more industries be located here to provide employment for your citizens. You need factories here to employ your men, women, boys, and girls. You should make this a definite must on the list of things to be done in the immediate future. To accomplish this goal, you need a good live chamber of commerce which will proceed to advertise Halifax and which will invite industrialists who are seeking factory sites to pay a visit to Halifax and make a survey of the advantages you have to offer.

Every community needs industry if it expects to grow. It needs to provide employment for its citizens. Gainful employment means happy and contented citizens. It also means more money derived from taxes to help keep the community operating. More industry means more citizens, more stores, more churches, in fact more of everything which will help improve the community.

I personally regret very much that the residents of this community permitted the demise of the community's newspaper, the Halifax Gazette, after the death of its publisher more than a year ago. The Gazette was almost our sole means of contact with you folks. Now, old friends pass away, and it is sometimes weeks before the news reaches us. It was a serious mistake to allow the Gazette to pass into oblivion after 59 years of public service. Every community of this size needs a newspaper. I am seriously afraid that Halifax will never again have another newspaper published here to chronicle the happenings of this community. Progressive businessmen should have formed a corporation and continued the publication of the Gazette. Let me add here that the files of the Gazette—a copy of each issue since the very first—should be purchased from the owner and placed in a vault for safekeeping. They are of tremendous value to the community and should be preserved for posterity.

You folks are to be congratulated in providing funds necessary to erect this memorial park which we are dedicating this afternoon. You have done yourselves proud and deserve a lot of credit. The park should stand through the years as a tribute to the brave boys and girls in whose honor it has been erected.

There is much history in the background of Halifax. One hundred and fifty-four years is a long life. I have often thought that Halifax is watched over by the glittering stars and kissed by the dews of heaven. I trust that in the years which lie ahead the citizens of the community will awaken to their responsibility and put their shoulders to the wheel. Every single citizen should start right now to advertise Halifax and not criticize Halifax. Boost your community instead of knocking it.

No community is any better than its citizenry desire to make it. Halifax is not perfect by any means but there are many towns which are inferior to it. Your slogan here should be "What Halifax makes, makes Halifax."

The community has much to offer prospective industry. It has desirable factory sites; it has desirable land for homesites. It has rail and trucking facilities. In fact the community has about everything needed for factory locations. The borough council should be willing to appropriate funds to advertise Halifax, a community upon which God has bestowed many beauties of His creation. Money spent in legitimate advertising will bring great returns in the future.

While many of you folks do not have the privileges some of us enjoy in being permitted to live in the metropolitan area of a big city, I want to say that the great God of the universe has richly endowed you with rocks and rills and templed hills and the beautiful Susquehanna River with its fertile valleys. You, too, have much to be thankful for as Dauphin Countians, as Pennsylvanians, and as citizens of the greatest Nation in all the world.

With apologies to my friend of many years, Mr. Harry H. Hain, of New Bloomfield, I use this appropriate and beautiful poem which he composed a decade ago. It is entitled "Pennsylvania":

"It seems the joy of heaven,
Just flashes at sunset glow,
Over the Alleghenies
And the rivers down below.

"From Lake Erie to the Delaware,
Over the Mason and Dixon line,
You get a glimpse of Heaven
Each evening at sunset time.

"A commonwealth of landscapes
From meadow to timberline.
Keystone of the great Union
Since Seventeen eighty-nine.

"Kissed by the Atlantic breezes,
From the land of the rising sun,
Home of the Quaker City,
Where the Liberty Bell was rung.

"Checkered with mighty highways
Through mountain, valley and glen,
And beautiful by rivers,
Is that wonderful land of Penn;

"Where States were forged in Union,
And were welded to remain,
At Valley Forge and Gettysburg,
In the land of Anthony Wayne."

Again, I thank you, Mr. Chairman, and may I extend my sincere good wishes to each and every person here assembled.

Sale of State Department Art

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. FRED E. BUSBEY

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 6, 1948

Mr. BUSBEY. Mr. Speaker, on July 21 of this year Mr. Drew Pearson commented on the sale of the State Department art collection as follows:

The art exhibit which the Congressmen thought was such a waste of money has been sold—at a profit. The State Department bought the collection for $56,000 and has now sold it for $79,658—a profit of more than $23,000 to Uncle Sam.

I am sure that Mr. Pearson would not want to knowingly mislead his readers by a statement that was not truthful and in order to get the correct figures officially I wrote Mr. Otis H. Ellis, assistant chief counsel of the War Assets Administration, Washington, D. C., on July 27, 1948 as follows:

It is my understanding that the 79 oil paintings and 38 water colors purchased by the Department of State were declared surplus by them necessitating their sale through the War Assets Administration.

It is my further understanding that in a sale recently held in New York City the amount of $5,544.45 in cash was realized. Will you please be kind enough to advise me by letter if this amount is correct, and if it is not correct to give me the exact amount of cash realized from this sale. In order that there may be no misunderstanding, I am not interested in what was bid for the paintings and water colors, but simply the amount of cash received.

The reply I received from Mr. Ellis, dated August 3, 1948, gives the names of the purchasers, the picture numbers and the amounts actually paid to the War Assets Administration for the entire collection. I, herewith, make a part of my remarks the actual document received from Mr. Ellis under date of August 3, 1948.

One can readily see that the actual cash amount received or due the War Assets

Administration as a result of the sale of this collection was only $5,526.68. It is my opinion that if there were some means of compiling the entire expense to the taxpayers directly chargeable to the sale of these pictures it would be in excess of the actual amount received, instead of, as Mr. Pearson stated in his column of July 21, 1948, "a profit of more that $23,000 to Uncle Sam."

In addition, the thousands and thousands of dollars of overhead and administrative cost of purchasing and handling these pictures while in the possession of the State Department, would make a sum that would be startling to the taxpayers.

I am hopeful that the figures which I received from Mr. Ellis of the War Assets Administration will help Mr. Pearson inform the readers of his column of the correct amount realized from the sale of the State Department art collection.

Freemasonry and Communism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. HERBERT R. O'CONOR

OF MARYLAND

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 6 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. O'CONOR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a special committee report adopted by the Grand Lodge of Ancient Free and Accepted Masons of Maryland, entitled "Free Masonry and Communism."

With the threat of communism posed directly at all the principles and institutions which the American people value most highly, it seems to me that this report makes a splendid contribution toward bringing into proper perspective Communist ideologies and objectives and the dangers contained therein for free democratic peoples the world over.

Prepared by a special committee named by Grand Master Harry L. Heuther, the report, a master exposition of the dangers of communism and of steps recommended to combat it, is prefaced with a challenging statement by Mr. Huether as grand master, which deserves the careful attention of every American.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

If the citizens of these United States had a better working knowledge of the status of the average individual in a communistic dominated country and especially what the system of forced labor, which is so common, really means; if people who are devoted to God and who value a free conscience above all else could better know how religion fares in a communistic dominated country; if our people generally, who enjoy the highest living standard of any time or place, could know more about living standards under the communistic scheme; if those who see in the free-enterprise system, as it has been pursued in these United States for more than 150 years as the greatest instrument for material human advancement, could know a little more about industry and management under communism; if those who at some time or other may have found themselves toying with the idea of bringing about a change in our form of constitutional representative government had a better perception of government and governmental methods under communism; if those who have at one time or another felt that a perplexing world required a planned existence, had a broader knowledge of how leisure time is employed under communism; if those who feel that a regulated system of education might be preferable to the free system in the United States had a better perspective of how the educational system operates in a communistic controlled nation, it would halt the march of communism as nothing else could do.

SELECTED EXCERPTS FROM THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE REPORT ON FREEMASONRY AND COMMUNISM

In approaching the subject under discussion, it is quite necessary that we define what we have in mind by the use of the word "communism." The term is used very loosely in these days, so that, frequently, anyone who veers to a broad social philosophy is branded as a Communist, just as one who freely expresses radical, as opposed to conservative, views of government is similarly dubbed. Generalizations of this kind weaken the argument. Free speech and the right to think as one will on matters of government and religion are basic and fundamental rights under our Constitution, and so long as these rights are exercised in an orderly way, they are within its protection, even though the views expressed are contrary to the views of the average American citizen. Free and open discussion of ideas and philosophies which are basically wrong is the most effective way to overcome them. Again, there are many Christian communal experiments which are benevolent in their attitudes and which exist in this country today. These are based upon the principle of mutual helpfulness, and while they are socialistic or communistic in the dictionary sense of those words, they are influences for good, and are not within the scope of the subject which we are discussing. As stated by Grand Master Parker in his paper:

"We are speaking of communism as promulgated by the doctrine of Karl Marx, as furthered by Lenin and Trotzky, and now practiced under the dictatorship of Josef Stalin in the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics."

We are speaking of communism as an organized force, dedicated to the task of overthrowing democratic institutions by force, if need be, and justifying the use of dishonest and underhand methods on the theory that "the end justifies the means."

Furthermore, communism is opposed to all of the things which we, as Masons and as American citizens, hold dear—the right of free speech, the right of assembly, freedom of conscience, the right to worship as one sees fit. All of these are as free to us as the air we breathe. None of these principles, however, has any place in communism. Religion is banned on the theory of Karl Marx that "religion is the opiate of the masses." Communism, therefore, is avowedly atheistic, and is thus basically opposed to the way of life of substantially all of our people. Under a communistic form of government, one may not express his views as to the government which purports to be friendly to him; he may not gather in groups such as this for open discussion; he may not own property; may not travel; may not strike; may not choose his own employment; may not be a friend of a foreigner; and in every way becomes a slave to the government above him. Basically, communism is opposed to every accepted philosophy of life which we, as Americans, embrace.

It stands for the destruction of our American form of government; it stands for the destruction of free enterprise; the destruction of free labor; and it stands for the creation of a Soviet of the United States and ultimate world revolution. It would seem to require no further argument to establish this premise.

The pitiless sunshine of publicity, bringing into the open all of the vicious principles of communism, is the surest way to prevent those principles taking root in the minds of the American people. It behooves us, as Masons and as lovers of democratic processes, to keep continually before our members and before all with whom we come in contact the blighting effect upon our way of life which would result from permitting communism to make any inroads upon our political philosophies.

Secondly, we must not only inform our members of the dangers of communism, but we must stir up in them such a zeal for the preservation of our free institutions that they will not hesitate to express their views whenever the opportunity offers.

Do not be misled by the fact that the number of avowed Communists seems to be small. In the first place, one of the principles of communism is to work under cover. In the next place, by the iron-clad discipline under which communism operates, every Communist works zealously for the objects which communism seeks to promote. Figures released by the Federal Bureau of Investigation state that in 1917, the year that Russia went into control of the Communists, there was only 1 Communist for every 2,277 persons in the country. The same report states that there is 1 Communist in the United States today for every 1,814 persons in the country. Because of its methods, the Communist Party does not need a majority to make itself felt. These figures should give us serious concern.

What we need is an enlightened group of Americans awake to the dangers that lie in wait and willing to make themselves heard in opposition. In a recent paper presented by Brother George M. Armor, of Baltimore Lodge, No. 210, the following statement is made:

"Americans love freedom. We believe that a man should be free to work where he chooses, to open an office or a business, to improve his position. He may speak his mind without fear. His home is sacred. He may read and vote freely. The law, the courts, and the police will protect him, not make him a slave.

"Under communism, there is not a single one of these freedoms. It would impose slavery upon us by force. A secret police would watch our every action. We would live in terror. Freedom to work when and where we please, or to launch a new business, would be gone. This is the actual history of communism where it has ruled. It has been imposed upon the people of Russia, Poland, Rumania, Hungary, Bulgaria, Yugoslavia, Albania, and north China. It is seeking to move in by force or trickery in other lands."

Mr. O'CONOR. Mr. President, the members of the committee who prepared the report are Harry B. Wright, chairman, Harry O. Schroeder, John H. Hessey, George S. Yost, Harry L. Robinson, Daniel Hope.

Along with this report, I ask also to have inserted the attached letter, commending the conduct and accomplishments of the current investigation of alleged Communist activities within the Government by the Senate investigating committee.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HARRISS & VOSE,
New York, N. Y., August 4, 1948.

Senator HERBERT R. O'CONOR,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: May I offer my hearty congratulations and appreciation on the great patriotic service you and your committee are rendering our country and the world in exposing Communists and anti-Americans who plan to destroy our heritage of constitutional and free government. May God inspire you to carry on this splendid work.

With every good wish.

Sincerely yours,

ROBERT M. HARRISS.

Curing a Hang-Over

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WAYNE MORSE
OF OREGON
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, August 6 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Curing a Hang-Over," from the Wall Street Journal. There is some very good common sense in the editorial.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CURING A HANG-OVER

We have been on an inflation spree. For many people a wonderful time was had. Now we are beginning to feel the pangs of a horrible hang-over. And the cure proposed is more of the hair of the dog that bit us.

That is precisely what President Truman prescribes.

Wages, farm income, and business profits are up. The Government has more dollars than it ever had to spend on its services. Everybody—well, almost everybody—has more money than in the days before the war. That's inflation.

The trouble is, Mr. Truman says, that inflation has cut down the purchasing power of money. A dollar won't buy what it once did and so the people who have more dollars aren't actually as well off as they think they ought to be with that many dollars. So, he thinks, what we need to do is to give people more money to make up for the loss in the dollar's purchasing power. Then we could get ahead of the race again.

Mr. Truman suggests that we raise the minimum-wage level, increase social-security payments, enlarge the payments to States for the various projects the Federal Government helps support and start a few new ones. He wants to boost wages to correct inequities. He also wants to spread more Government money around by new public-works projects.

All these new dollars, for instance, have started competing for houses. The price of houses is up. Mr. Truman suggests we make more dollars available to would-be householders, through Government credit, so they can buy the houses they now can't afford.

In short, inflation has sent prices soaring, so the thing to do is to inflate more. The most charitable thing that can be said about this program is that its authors are ignorant of the disease they are treating. If they know what they are prescribing they are practicing economic quackery.

Nothing the President suggests would cure inflation; most of his plans, if carried out, would make it more rampant. Price controls (their fascination proves some people never learn from experience) are like sitting on a safety valve while continuing to stoke the boiler.

All of these things—if we are to take them seriously—stem from inability or unwillingness to recognize that a dollar bill is simply not worth what it was 8 years ago. You get more of them for the work you do and have to pay more of them for the things you buy.

The dollar bill is worth less because the Government made it worth less, first to pay for the war and afterwards to try to offset this deliberate devaluation by giving people more dollars. It was exhilarating at first, as an inflation debauch always is. Now we are paying the penalties of our indulgence, and the responsible officials in the administration can think of nothing to do but to quaff more of the heady wine.

The Congress will be wise to reject this temptation. The only way to cure inflation is to recognize it for what it is, a cheapening of the dollar, and to stop that process—and stop it quickly.

Not because it is likely to be enacted but because it throws a bright light on the Democratic candidate's peculiar mixture of political and economic ideas, other aspects of President Truman's anti-inflation program are interesting.

Mr. Truman wants the power to fix ceiling prices for "scarce commodities which basically affect essential industrial production or the cost of living." Nearly all commodity prices directly or indirectly affect the cost of living and industrial production costs, too. Therefore he is asking for a general price-control power.

Next, he says: "Noninflationary wage increases can and should continue to be made by free collective bargaining." Practically speaking, there is no such animal as a noninflationary wage increase when production is at or near the physical capacity to produce.

Says the message: "The Government should have the authority, however, to limit wage adjustments which would force a break in the price ceiling, except where wage adjustments are essential to remedy hardship, to correct inequities, or to prevent an actual lowering of living standards."

This means that the President and his resuscitated OPA would determine the profits of all employers. Mr. Truman and his running mate, Senator BARKLEY, may wax indignant over this interpretation of their program. But that is precisely how it could be and would be used. For the message itself says: "I have said before and I repeat that many profit margins have been adequate to absorb wage increases without the price increases that have followed."

Let Congress force business into such a strait-jacket and plant expansion now under way would be rapidly curtailed and the launching of new enterprises would cease. The supply of equity capital for venturing, already too small for a normal peacetime economy, would dry up completely.

Civil Rights

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RICHARD B. RUSSELL
OF GEORGIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, August 6 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very able discussion on the subject of civil rights, from the pen of Mr. Maynard Kniskern, the Sunday editor of the Springfield (Ohio) Sun. Mr. Kniskern's editorial reveals a fine understanding of this whole subject, and displays a courage that is all too rare in discussing these vital issues before the American people today.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ISSUE OF CIVIL RIGHTS TODAY HAS LOST ITS ESSENTIAL AND PRIMARY MEANING

(By Maynard Kniskern)

The tragic dissension at the Democratic National Convention has illustrated in vivid miniature what can happen when fellow countrymen sacrifice full comprehension and full perspective to so passionate and ill-timed a cause as "civil rights," as the thorny topic is rather loosely termed. Northerners, especially northern politicians, should never forget that their southern brothers were brought up in a deep sense of history. Very few Americans in other parts of our land, however well educated they may be, normally acquire the intimate and ruling sense of history which even an unschooled southerner inherits as a birthright.

"Civil rights" is a phrase used blithely, glibly, often ignorantly on this side of the Mason and Dixon's line. To the average American it is scarcely more than a political catchword—a battle cry of leftists—and a political catchword is just exactly what "civil rights" should never be. It is a theme that runs all through our constitutional process. It is as old as our Republic and it is heavy with vexation and grief and misunderstanding.

THE FIRST REPOSITORY

1. As a matter of law: The first great repository of civil guaranties is the Bill of Rights—the first 10 amendments to the Constitution. The Bill of Rights, as it has come to be interpreted by the Supreme Court down through the years, specifically protects every United States citizen from the abridgment or usurpation of his rights by the Federal Government. The fourteenth amendment, ratified in the troubled era of reconstruction, has been held by the Court to place the same restraints on State governments—with the "one pervading purpose," observed Mr. Justice Miller in 1873, of protecting freed Negroes.

In 1866, a few weeks before the fourteenth amendment was drafted, Congress passed the Civil Rights Act. It confirmed Negro citizenship by encompassing "all persons born in the United States and not subject to any foreign power." With respect to person and property, those citizens "of every race and color" were held to be equal before law. There were other features of this act, however, which were so highly dubious that President Johnson vetoed it, but Congress overruled him. Meanwhile, however, the same "reconstruction Congress" was canny enough to include the sound features in the upcoming fourteenth amendment.

Shortly before the Republicans lost their congressional majority in 1875 they passed the last of the Force Acts, a law which was intended to supplement existing civil-rights legislation by forbidding operators of hotels, restaurants, theaters, public conveyances, and the like from excluding citizens "of any race, color, or previous condition of servitude." From 1876 to 1883 the Supreme Court, in a series of historic decisions (U. S. v. Reese; U. S. v. Cruikshank, U. S. v. Harris; (109 U. S. 3)) held such clauses to be unconstitutional, and declared further that the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments bar States from racial discrimination (as the Bill of Rights bars the Federal Government) but that there was no law preventing some citizens from discriminating against others on account of race, color, religion, or any other reason. Another extremely important point made by the Court is that such discrimination as the Constitution does prohibit has to do with civil and political rights, not social rights.

SOME NOW HAVE LAWS

Students of current affairs who are of legal training or legal turn of mind (we make no such claim here) might well reflect upon the curious and delicate fact that several States, including Ohio, now have one or more laws bearing upon the social rights of racial groups—fair employment practices, theater admissions, public school and college attendance, travel in public conveyances, and so on. They might reflect also upon the fact that southerners, who are not so eager to mind other people's business as are some nonsoutherners, raise no objection of any sort to such legislation—by States. But because it is social rather than civil legislation, they do object passionately to all proposals that it be carried over into Federal statute.

2. As a matter of politics: It is an unhappy truth that nonsouthern politicians and propagandists are not inclined to distinguish between political and social rights; they lump everything under the heading of "civil rights," and thus manage to confuse issues already in a state of painful disarray. And in the clamor that accompanies a Presidential-election year, the hopelessly confused has also become incendiary.

It should be obvious to even the most liberal Democrat that civil rights has lost its essential and primary meaning in the Democratic platform; it has been installed as a vote-getting vehicle pure and simple, without regard either to its practicability or to the sentiments of those southerners who would be required not merely to swallow civil-rights legislation but, as loyal Americans, to administer it. Their considered and vehement opinion that it cannot be administered in the South, at any rate not in this generation, should have been weighed by Democratic policy makers with an eye to some sort of compromise.

COURTESY IS WITHHELD

But that ordinary courtesy of politics has been withheld from southern Democrats. Some few may have responded, therefore, with foolish act or word; what might better be considered are the southerners by the hundred thousands who are hurt, bewildered, and lost now that their party has seen fit, for what southerners view as reasons of political expediency, to disregard their counsel and convictions.

3. As a matter of morality: This spectacle must surely distress any thoughtful American, whatever his political or regional orientation. In the first place, it is perfectly clear that the South, propelled by its own liberal politicians, its own progressive editors, its own intellectuals, is moving slowly but steadily toward an equitable society. Its leaders know how to deal with ignorance and prejudice—not perceptibly worse in the South than anywhere else—but they find it much harder to deal with the self-elected reformers from other regions whose interference seriously impedes progress by attempting to ram progress down southern throats.

Another heartbreaking obstacle is that state of mind exemplified by a powerful eastern newspaper which, serving a city with its own acute racial and religious tensions and its own noisome slums, can yet somehow find the space to talk about "southern bigotry."

We are all working, or should be, toward what Theologian Reinhold Niebuhr calls a "more tolerable society." Our route of advance in the Midwest is necessarily somewhat different from the route of advance in the East, in the Far West, and in the Southwest; all in turn are somewhat different from the route of advance in the South.

Ohioans would find it odious to have to put up with southern criticism of Ohio's numerous inadequacies and shortcomings, and they would find it detestable if zealous reformers and doctrinaires from the South came up here on their own expense accounts to nag them stridently about the solving of Ohio's many difficulties. Yet southerners have been putting up with just such bizarre and merciless kibitzing since the evil days of carpetbaggers.

CONSENT OF GOVERNED

With a few notorious exceptions—the eighteenth amendment, for example—the legislating of Federal law in the United States has always been predicated on the consent of the governed. To put it another way, the founding fathers and their successors have written into law of the land such principles and purposes as were first enshrined in the hearts of the people. Inevitably there came a time—it is still upon us—when additional refinements of law could not always be adapted with equal consistency to all parts of the country. When we get into social legislation, for instance, we run up against the fact that one section of the Nation, densely populated and highly industrialized for 150 years, presents a social complexion entirely different from another section, sparsely populated and struggling out of a semifeudal, agrarian economy into a modern industrial society.

It would seem that the South is justified in demanding for the States the power of social legislation, and will continue to be so justified until the United States of America is, ethnically as well as socially, a very much more homogeneous Nation than it is at present. The strength of the legal code stems from prior ideals and shared convictions; law cannot compel the observance of ideals and convictions where they are not accepted, save by the application of force; and by applying force it tends to destroy what it is supposed to promote.

There is at least one influential colored minister in Springfield, moreover, who emphatically repudiates all resorts to force in the interests of obtaining equal status for his people. This is a specifically Christian view, and the American Negro is a specifically Christian citizen—in general very much more so than his white brother.

On such ground, we should imagine, such people would have to repudiate the current politicking on civil rights.

IS A MORAL ISSUE

Here we come to the inevitable point that civil rights—when the term is used to include social rights—is a moral issue, not a political issue; and in that same loose frame of reference it is also a regional issue, not a national issue. The tremendous progress made by the South in the past half-century alone, and despite outside interference, may be reason enough for placing full confidence in the ability of southerners to do their part in the total effort toward a more tolerable society.

Then, too, for all the delays and imperfections of Negro citizenship in the United States—and those shortcomings are by no means confined to the South—that citizenship cannot be matched by citizenship in any other nation on earth. Less than a hundred years ago, incredibly enough, these extraordinary people were slaves. What the next hundred years will bring depends less on nonsouthern politicians and reformers than on the citizens of the South, white and colored. The one civil right they appear to need most at this moment in history is the right to work out their own solution. It will not come in a fortnight, but it will come; and it will be an American solution.

Lt. Gen. Robert L. Eichelberger

OF

HON. JOHN W. BRICKER

OF OHIO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 6 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. BRICKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article, appearing in the New York Times of August 5, 1948, in regard to Lt. Gen. Robert L. Eichelberger, who is now retiring from command of the Eighth Army.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JAPANESE VOICE SINCERE REGRETS AS ONE OF CONQUERORS DEPARTS—TRIBUTES TO GENERAL EICHELBERGER INCLUDE SINGULAR DINNER GIVEN BY EMPEROR

(By Lindesay Parrott)

TOKYO, August 4—The departure of Lt. Gen. Robert L. Eichelberger for the United States this morning after he had laid down the command of the United States Eighth Army, which he had headed continuously since 1944, has brought out a peculiar paradox in the Allied occupation of Japan.

Ever since General Eichelberger's intentions to return were announced last month, Japanese of all stations of life have been expressing genuine regret at his leaving. Thus perhaps for the first time in history a defeated nation has deplored the departure of a man who as much as any other contributed to its conquest and who, since the nation's surrender, has commanded troops that occupied it.

What apparently is back of the Japanese feeling toward General Eichelberger's departure is the widespread belief that under his administration as Gen. Douglas MacArthur's second in command they have been fairly if firmly treated and that while no nonsense has been tolerated, sympathetic ears have been open to all legitimate complaints.

The tone of the Japanese reaction was set by Emperor Hirohito when immediately after announcement that General Eichelberger would leave he entertained the Eighth Army commander at a luncheon in the palace—the first time the Emperor had formally and publicly received a high officer of the occupation forces in his own quarters.

Between that time and today General Eichelberger has been visited by dozens of Japanese notables who wished to express their regret at his impending departure. Among them have been Premier Hitoshi Ashida, Tsuneo Matsudaira, speaker of the Japanese upper house and former associate of generals in the Allied occupation of Siberia in 1920; the speaker of the lower house and a delegation of prefectural governors charged with expressing the thanks of all perfectural heads for the assistance given to them by the Eighth Army. Dozens of newspaper editorials have echoed the same appreciative viewpoint.

What is perhaps more impressive, however, is the feeling personally expressed to this correspondent by scores of Japanese who never had and never would have the slightest contact with the General or any possibility to gain through his presence or absence in Japan.

"I and all my family feel General Eichelberger's leaving is a loss to Japan," was only one typical observation made to me.

Japanese sentiment was well expressed this morning in an editorial in the English-language daily, Nippon Times. The editorial said that General Eichelberger probably had had more direct working contact with the Japanese people than any other occupation officer, and continued:

"His efforts to help the Japanese overcome the handicaps of their tragic and mistaken past and achieve a worthy position as a democratic nation endeared him to the Japanese people and his broad understanding of their problems aroused their admiration and gratitude.

"It is already a matter of historical record that this occupation is unique in the extent to which the conquering army, through benevolence, has succeeded in winning the friendship and enthusiastic cooperation of a conquered populace. General Eichelberger's personal contribution to this record cannot be overestimated and the example he has set will serve to influence Japanese attitude toward the United States for all time."

General Eichelberger sailed aboard the United States Army transport, General Buckner, after an honor guard ceremony. Almost all high-ranking Allied officials, except General MacArthur, were present at the ceremony.

The Eighth Army now is temporarily commanded by Maj. Gen. Charles W. Ryder, but will be taken over by Lt. Gen. Walton H. Walker when the latter arrives here.

Views of the Dairy Industry Committee on Regimentation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALEXANDER WILEY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 6 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I believe that every Member of this Chamber has received a letter from the Dairy Industry Committee in which is presented very clearly and concisely the reasons why the American dairy industry opposes any system of regimentation. This letter was sent principally to the Banking Committees of both Houses, but I understand that copies have been made available to all Members of Congress. I believe that the members of the public would also be interested in reading it, and accordingly I ask unanimous consent that it be inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE DAIRY INDUSTRY COMMITTEE,
Washington, D. C., July 29, 1948.

DEAR SENATOR: The dairy industry is as concerned with the inflationary tendencies that are presently existent as every segment of our national economy. It is for this reason that I am writing you requesting that this committee's comments may become a part of the record at such hearings as will be held on this subject.

Milk is produced on about 75 percent of our 6,000,000 farms located in every State. It is processed, manufactured, and distributed throughout the land. Virtually every American citizen is a daily consumer of some form of dairy products. Consequently, as an industry we are directly concerned with all of our people's welfare. It has been estimated that about 10,000,000 people are dependent upon the dairy industry for their livelihood when you consider those engaged in the various allied industries and the families of the workers. The quantity of milk obtained is in proportion to the number of milking cows available, as well as the feed and labor required to produce the milk. The various dairy products are in turn dependent upon the processing and manufacuring facilities available, as well as the labor required to provide the various products so essential to our dietary needs.

The dairy industry is confronted at the present moment with a paradoxical situation—too few cows to produce all of the milk required by our expanding population. Thus the first problem confronting this industry and consequently the Nation as a whole, is to obtain more cows and consequently more milk. We are making progress in this direction. The second factor has been a shortage of feed, which in turn has resulted in exceptionally high feed prices thus curtailing milk production. Indications are that this situation is improving. The coming harvest will provide adequate feed supplies with a consequent lowered feed cost to make possible increased milk production for the months ahead. The United States Department of Agriculture reports that there will be much greater feed supplies per animal unit than existed last year.

The dairy industry is also confronted with shortages of labor, which in turn have resulted in increased wages for the available labor. We also have the same problem as other industries of paying higher prices for the equipment and supplies required to properly handle and distribute our dairy products. Thus it will be seen that the dairy industry is confronted with the same problem as all industry—increased costs of production, manufacture, and distribution.

In spite of these conditions milk prices have not increased as much as other foods. In fact a check of most of the food items which make up any substantial portion of the housewife's market basket shows that only white bread and a few canned vegetables had a smaller increase in price over prewar than fluid milk. Since 1939 the foods customarily purchased by the average family have increased 104.4 percent while the retail prices of milk have only increased 74 percent. From May to June this year, the wholesale price of dairy products increased only one-half of 1 percent, as compared with increases of other foods of as much as 7 percent. City families paid 70 percent more for all commodities in May 1948 than the 1935–39 average, while the farmer paid 112 percent more for his needs. As of March 1948, the farmer received 164 percent more for all of his products than he did in 1935–39, but during the same period nonagricultural income increased 198 percent.

With this as a background this organization is of the opinion that reestablishment of any maximum price of rationing controls or regulations should not be imposed on the dairy industry for the following reasons:

1. It will tend to decrease production. Farmers work as independent operators and it is traditional that they will devote their energies to the production of that product or crop that will produce the maximum return. Controls on one segment of our agricultural economy will tend to cause the individual producer to transfer his efforts to produce the product that is not under control.

Being a freeman, the farmer will not produce products that do not give him a fair return for his efforts and investment. Controls are thus not conducive to increasing production.

Competitive prices have been the historic means of keeping agricultural production on an even keel in a competitive economy.

2. It will be difficult and expensive to administer. There are about 4,500,000 farms on which milk is produced; there are thousands of manufacturers and processors of milk who put the milk into the various products that our consumers desire, and there are the distributors in every city, town, and hamlet whose business it is to see that every consumer has available the several dairy products he needs.

To properly police such a vast enterprise would require a large staff of Federal, State, and local officials with the consequent expense of maintenance and operation. Such an organization would still be powerless to produce more milk which is the solution.

3. It will tend to encourage black markets. Those with sufficient income will still be able to obtain the products they want. It is a classical example of what happened when controls were in operation during the last war, that at least 50 percent of the butter moved through illicit channels in spite of the various regulations imposed.

4. It will disrupt the normal distribution of products to meet consumer needs. Milk is a highly perishable product that must be utilized in some form each day. Technological processes make it possible to utilize the product in various forms. Placing any restrictive regulation on certain products would tend to force utilization of milk into some unrestricted product. Normal distribution would be disrupted. As an example, butter or cheese would be available in the contiguous area of a butter or cheese manufacturer, but might not be available in a large metropolitan area when and where needed.

In conclusion may I state that the basic causes of inflation affect the dairy industry the same as all industries, and it is our opinion that the basic causes rather than the symptoms of inflation should be attacked. We are actively cooperating with the United States Department of Agriculture and State Extension Services to obtain increased production of milk which we believe will be the basis for stabilizing the price of the dairy products so urgently needed by all of our citizens.

Sincerely yours,

M. H. BRIGHTMAN,
Executive Secretary.

The Special Session

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLAUDE PEPPER
OF FLORIDA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 6 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a poetic account of the Republican record in the special session of the Eightieth Congress, contributed by a constituent of mine. I also ask to have printed an editorial from the Miami News of July 29, entitled "Speaking of 'Cheap Politics.'"

There being no objection, the matters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REPUBLICAN RECORD IN THE SPECIAL SESSION, EIGHTIETH CONGRESS

Wall Street calls me safe and sound, labor calls me "Stinky,"
The housewife calls me worse than that—
I'm only safe from "Pinky."

I've been in special session since the middle of July—
The only thing accomplished was to scare you with a spy.
I rigged the game to stop all laws and aggravate the South.
I knew old civil rights would cause a legislative drought!
Until election day rolls round, it's very plain to see
I want to keep the voters as blind as they can be.
True, I put into our platform stirring words for all to read,
And I made some caustic comments on the cost of meat and feed.
I told them "I'se agin it" and I put the blame elsewhere.
In a way I judged would likely put the gals in Harry's hair.
And when we met in session to bring the prices down
I steered the talk to poll tax—then I went underground.
I didn't have to vote at all, 'twas easy as can be
To keep the voters in the dark and not wised up to me.
My platform's full of promises—the things I said I'd do;
A higher income for us all, with costs cut plumb in two;
Aids to health and education, conservation, was my cry—
But I've not done a single thing to be remembered by.
Sure, I promised to the farmers all the things I know they like
And I told the city folks that prices wouldn't take a hike—
But when it came to passing laws to stop the spiral's spree—
Election day must come and go before you hear from me.
Going to blame it all on Harry, going to keep him on the run,
While the country's going haywire, boy oh boy! I'm having fun!
Provocation of the Nation doesn't mean a thing to me—
I'll hide behind my smoke screen so the voters cannot see.

SPEAKING OF CHEAP POLITICS

When President Truman called the special session of Congress, Republican Congressmen accused the President of playing cheap politics. They were highly incensed at being called away from their fence-mending to consider such unimportant matters as the need to combat inflation. It just wasn't fair to call a Congressman back to Washington in the midst of his campaigning to act in the public behalf.

Nevertheless, Congress convened. The Republicans were generous. They listened to the President's speech on Tuesday without so much as a boo or a cat-call. But instead of doing something to halt the increasing threat offered by inflation, the Republicans insist on passage of an anti-poll-tax bill as their first measure of the special session.

And are they worried about the poll tax and its effect on the potential voters in the States which levy such a tax? Not at all. The Republican strategy calls for pressing to a decision on the poll tax so as to bring on a filibuster from certain of the southern Congressmen. Then the Republicans, fine public servants all, can point the finger of scorn at the filibusters and "because no legislative progress can be made," can adjourn the session and return to their orating and hand-shaking among their constituents.

Did someone mention cheap politics?

Why Tolerate Compulsion?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOMER A. RAMEY
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 6, 1948

Mr. RAMEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to revise and extend my remarks, I include therein an editorial from the Sylvania Sentinel, Sylvania, Ohio, on the subject of Why Tolerate Compulsion? Mr. R. G. Corbin, editor of the Sylvania Sentinel, is one of Ohio's most outstanding journalists and authors. He is a courageous statesman who has the courage to speak out in behalf of good government and never fears selfish groups.

WHY TOLERATE COMPULSION?

The last Congress did not act on the proposal to saddle the country with compulsory sickness insurance—a project which would add five or six billion dollars a year to the social security bill of the American people through more deductions from pay roll checks. But that does not mean the scheme is dead. The forces behind it are vocal and well organized, and it is to be expected that they will work harder in the future than in the past.

There might be some justification for political domination of medicine if it were the only way to safeguard our national health. But every objective survey yet made shows that the health standards of our people are among the best on earth, and are steadily improving. Again, compulsory sickness insurance might be justifiable if there were no other way to prepare ourselves for meeting unexpected doctor and hospital bills. But the voluntary plans—of which the largest now has more than 30,000,000 members—have brought this protection within the reach of almost all workers and their families at a remarkably moderate cost. And the fact that the various plans are competing for clients assures that the widest range of benefits at the lowest price is provided.

We must realize that the next logical step beyond compulsory health insurance would be socialized medicine. That view has been expressed by Senator MORSE and others in high positions who have made a study of it. And every country which has tried socialized medicine has run into the same trouble. The over-all cost of medical care has gone up—while the standards of medical service have gone down. What else can be expected when the doctor is subjected to the politician and the bureaucrat? The examples of other nations should alone be sufficient to block every scheme that would endanger free medicine in this country.

TVA Steam Plant

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN J. SPARKMAN
OF ALABAMA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, August 6 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, a letter dated August 4, 1948, from Mr. S. R. Finley, general superintendent of the power board of the city of Chattanooga, Tenn., addressed to Hon. JOHN TABER, a Member of the House of Representatives, with reference to power needs in the TVA area, and particularly regarding the proposed construction of the new Johnsonville steam plant in the TVA area.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AUGUST 2, 1948.

Hon. JOHN TABER,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN TABER: The press account of your comments, following referral to you as Appropriations Committee chairman of the bill presented to Congress to cover an appropriation to begin the TVA's needed steam plant, prompts me to write to you. You are privileged, I grant, as other Members of Congress are, to be somewhat irritated at being called back into special session when you feel there is no need for it. The hot summer weather which makes Washington so unpleasant makes it all the more easy to be irritated. You also have the right of opinion to conclude that the submission of the request for the steam plant under the head of an emergency is dishonest thinking, if in your judgment you believe that.

But I cannot refrain from commenting upon the statement accredited to you in the press about this much-needed steam plant that, "It would make the people outside the area pay the power bills of the people living in the river valley." This statement is not correct nor borne out by the facts and conditions surrounding the Tennessee Valley Authority program and its history. To have such a statement made by a responsible Member of Congress, like yourself, gives credence to it, and I don't believe you wish to be in that position. Our power bills down here are not being paid by people outside the area, and a study of our power relations with the TVA and its financial results will bear this out. We are paying our own power bills, and our payments to TVA for power have borne the expense of furnishing this power and have returned to the Federal Government substantial amounts of the money they have invested in power facilities. Under an act of Congress, recommended by your committee and passed last year, a method was provided for the continuance of this. We are not receiving in our purchases of electricity from the Tennessee Valley Authority any subsidy, instead, our payments for electricity to the Federal Government have been the means of making the TVA project a wise and profitable one for all the people of the United States, not alone for us folks in the Tennessee Valley. There is ample historical evidence that this is a correct statement.

From a power-supply standpoint there can be no question as to the need for the beginning of the construction of this steam plant now. It cannot be disputed that the Federal Government has assumed responsibility for the power supply to this area. Our contractual agreements with the Government do not permit us to obtain an added power supply elsewhere. These agreements were made in good faith by us that they would be continued to be carried out. They are just and equitable agreements, and such an important matter as the power supply to this area should not be trifled with nor made subject to whimsical changes in political philosophy. The TVA has been kept out of politics in its administration, and its growth and development should not be made subject to changes in political party domination.

If not at this special session, I earnestly hope that the next session of Congress will give serious and favorable consideration to the Government's need for this proposed TVA steam plant in order to carry out the obligations that have been assumed by the Government when they contracted with us to furnish this area's power supply.

Yours very truly,

S. R. FINLEY,
General Superintendent.

New York State Mayors Support Slum Clearance and Public Housing

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JACOB K. JAVITS
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 6, 1948

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, the effort to attain adequate housing through the enactment of the Taft-Ellender-Wagner bill is so fundamental in the lives of our people that it counts its supporters among those with the greatest responsibilities. The following resolution of the conference of mayors of the State of New York demanding Federal aid for public housing and slum clearance and urban redevelopment bears this out. It is significant to note that the officers of this conference are largely from upState New York, which is traditionally Republican, and emphasizes again the bipartisan character of the support for this legislation:

CONFERENCE OF MAYORS, AND OTHER MUNICIPAL OFFICIALS OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK,
Albany, N. Y., August 4, 1948.

Hon. JACOB K. JAVITS,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: The New York State conference of mayors passed the following resolution at its annual meeting in June urging the passage of adequate housing and urban redevelopment legislation by Congress:

"Whereas housing is a critical problem in the cities and villages in New York State; and

"Whereas these cities and villages require financial aid for the construction of public housing accommodations and for slum clearance and urban redevelopment: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That we, the conference of mayors of New York State, petition the Federal Congress to enact without delay an adequate and comprehensive housing bill."

The meeting was attended by 510 city and village officials representing most of the cities and villages in the State. The resolution was adopted unanimously.

In 1947 the mayors' conference passed a similar resolution.

May we urge you to press for the passage of this legislation at the present session of Congress.

Very sincerely yours,

MORGAN STRONG,
Executive Secretary.

Failures of the Republicans in the Special Session of Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANCIS J. MYERS
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, August 6 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS] over the radio last night.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I wish every American who hears me tonight could visit Washington now while the Eightieth Congress is in special session. I wish you might see for yourself what is going on here. I am sure you would be shocked by the political maneuvering being carried on by the Republican-controlled Congress. The galleries of the Congress are filled to capacity every day with people who are looking for constructive action on the program requested by the President, but who leave in utter disgust and disappointment.

Republican leaders in Congress have used every means within their power to confuse the American people, to hide the real issues at stake. Their first move was to bring forward the anti-poll-tax bill. This was a bill passed in the House of Representatives in July 1947, and immediately sent to the Senate. No attempt has been made by the Republican leaders from that day on to bring up that bill for consideration until this special session. My friends, this action is not only a sham, but it is downright shameful.

The Republican leadership knew perfectly well that this bill could not pass at this special session of Congress. They knew that when they called up this measure for consideration. They knew that the southern Senators would carry on a filibuster.

Let us look at this special session of Congress frankly, simply, and honestly.

What are the issues?

Is there an emergency which requires a special session of Congress?

Are prices too high? Are prices climbing so fast that it would be dangerous for the country to wait another 8 months before doing something about it?

Is there a housing crisis in America?

My fellow countrymen, I believe you can answer these questions for yourselves. Anybody, especially the housewife who pays a grocery bill or who buys clothing, knows the answer better than any Member of Congress. The truth is that prices are higher at this moment than they have ever been in our national history. Another 8 months of this wild, uncontrolled inflation may well bring a catastrophe for the whole country and for the democratic world which depends upon America.

You know that is true. I know it is true. The Republican leaders know it is true. But what is the Republican reaction? Since the President called this Congress back into session the air has been filled with their cries of anguish. They did not want to return because they were anxious to see high prices and the exorbitant profits which are earned by high prices continue. Notwithstanding the fact that they adopted a platform in their Philadelphia convention, calling for action on high prices, they have done nothing to date and little will be accomplished before we adjourn within the next few days.

Their candidate for President, Gov. Thomas Dewey, said he thought "it would be cruel and inhuman punishment" for President Truman to call a special session.

Well, it is pretty hot in Washington. But the Capitol Building is air conditioned and so are the offices in which Members of the Congress work. So it is not as unbearable as Mr. Dewey would have you believe. The punishment suffered by the Congress by working a few weeks is not half as cruel as the punishment the housewife undergoes every time she visits the corner grocery. It is not as cruel and inhuman as it is for the veteran who cannot find a home for himself and his family. But Governor Dewey has displayed little sympathy for all these unfortunate people. He could do so, you know. He is the Republican candidate for President. I submit he owes it to all of us to say where he stands on these questions. He does not hesitate to talk about foreign policy with Senator VANDENBERG and John Dulles. He does not hesitate to denounce communism at every turn. He does not hesitate to call in farm groups and talk to them at his palatial farm residence in New York. But recently in a debate with Senator TAFT on the floor of the Senate I asked him if Governor Dewey had discussed with him the questions of the high cost of living and inadequate housing, and Senator TAFT replied definitely "No." Dewey continues to remain silent, refusing to give the leaders of the Republican-controlled Congress and the country his position upon these two domestic emergencies.

We all recognize that this is an election year. Of course, our minds are focused on the choice you and all of us will have to make next November, but, as President Truman said in his speech before Congress, "High prices are not taking time off for the election. High prices are not waiting until the next session of Congress. High prices are getting worse. They are getting worse every day. We cannot afford to wait for the next Congress to act." President Truman was right.

My friends, there are at least 14,000,000 white-collar workers in this country who are having a most difficult time keeping up with this senseless, heart-breaking race of continued high prices. They have no fat and pompous lobbyists pleading their cause in Congress. They are the forgotten people of America. I am thinking also of the people who live on pensions, insurance, or the savings of a lifetime. I am thinking also of the teachers, clerks, firemen, and policemen. I am thinking also of the veterans trying in vain to live on meager checks from Washington while they pursue their education. And last, I am thinking also of the vast majority of people in this country who toil with their hands. These people, through their unions and otherwise, constantly battle for wage increases, only to see the benefits they win disappear as prices climb higher and higher.

My friends, unless this economy of ours is leveled off and inflation halted, unless wages and prices are stabilized, the economy of this country will soon burst at the seams. We are now in the period of boom. We are dangerously near the period of bust.

Notwithstanding this, the Republican leadership claims there is no emergency. Yet only today the press reported that cattle and hogs on the Chicago market reached an all-time high. That is part of the meat supply that millions of bread winners on fixed incomes must have in order to maintain an adequate and healthy diet, for themselves and families. My friends, this is the kind of cruel and inhuman punishment that Governor Dewey should talk about.

The Republican leaders in the Eightieth Congress have shown definitely they have no interest in people in the low-income groups. They have demonstrated over and over again that their chief concern is in the special interest groups and not in the common man. That is not just a political accusation. It has been obvious to all students of American politics for many years, but never has it been displayed so blatantly as it is now. Governor Dewey and the Republican leaders in Congress know perfectly well how desperately inflation is grinding down the vast majority of the American people. They know how dangerous the situation is. But no amount of persuasion, no plea of logic, will force them to admit that this is an emergency. They apparently would rather see Nation-wide bankruptcy, misery, and despair than to have any type or kind of controls.

Two years ago Republicans told the people that removal of controls would bring on high prices for a few weeks and then everything would level off and prices would come down and remain at normal levels. Ah, my friends, how tragically wrong the Republicans were. Prices have never ceased rising since OPA went out of existence in June 1946.

But, my friends, that is water over the dam. The important thing today is this: What are we going to do about it now—this week? The assessment of blame, whether it be against Republicans or Democrats, does not bring down the cost of food, shoes and clothing. The emergency is here. The housewife is interested in the cure and not the cause. What will the Republican leadership do? The responsibility is theirs. Well, it is apparent that all they propose to do is give the President a few pop-gun, anti-inflationary measures which will be miserably inadequate to stop high prices from moving on to further dizzy heights.

In conclusion, I want to emphasize one other phase of this problem, which in many ways is more important than our own daily problems of keeping up with prices.

The Soviet world policy is based, to a very large extent, on the belief that our economy, here in America, is headed for another great collapse—a depression more disastrous than the last. They are certain that when it comes, the United States will no longer stand in the way of Soviet expansion through western Europe, the Far East, and, ultimately, the rest of the world.

We must prove them wrong in this domestic crisis. If we should have another depression, the world's last best hope for peace would be gone. I am certain that from our past history the surest way to bring on a depression in this country is to let prices get out of hand. The higher we let prices go, the farther they will fall when the turning point comes. The higher prices go, the deeper will be the depression which will follow.

Remember this: High prices and peace are bound together. The stability of world peace depends on a stable, prosperous America. We must be prepared to make major sacrifices to defeat any threat of depression. If a depression should come, the peace will be lost and great inroads will be made upon our power and ability to maintain ourselves as a free and independent Nation.

Inflation Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN C. KUNKEL
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 6, 1948

Mr. KUNKEL. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks, I include a copy of the testimony given by Mr. Paul Porter before the House Banking and Currency Committee on the President's bill to control inflation. I wish to call particular attention to the vagueness and indecision of Mr. Porter's answers and to the clarity and vigor of Chairman WOLCOTT'S questions and analysis.

The testimony follows:

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Porter, were you Administrator of OPA when the Decontrol Act of 1946 was passed

Mr. PORTER. The Decontrol Act of 1946?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. PORTER. Yes, sir; I believe that act was passed in July of 1946, or was it passed prior to that time? I do not recall now. I think it was in June.

The CHAIRMAN. June 30th of 1946. I am referring now to the bill which the President vetoed.

Mr. PORTER. That is correct; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you recall that some time during the following month, July of 1946, Congress sent another bill down to the President on the question of prices?

Mr. PORTER. Are you talking about——

The CHAIRMAN. I am speaking now about the one he signed.

Mr. PORTER. Yes, sir. That was July 23, as I recall.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you recall the reasons given by the President for the veto of the first decontrol bill?

Mr. PORTER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you recall the formula contained in that bill?

Mr. PORTER. The formula?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir; for the control of prices.

Mr. PORTER. As I recall, Mr. Chairman—I have not reviewed the bill recently and I am relying completely upon my recollection—there were a number of different standards spelled out in the original bill which was vetoed.

The CHAIRMAN. With respect to prices the formula was that we would take the 1941 price base, add to that the average production cost, industry-wide, and that would be our new maximum price.

Mr. PORTER. There were other standards, excuse me, I believe, which were contained in the bill, such as a profit on every product.

The CHAIRMAN. That was taken out later. I might say, by way of history of the bill, the bill the President vetoed would have kept control on prices, preventing them from going unreasonably high, and it was our objective, and we felt that we had met that objective in the formula, to encourage the maximum production of goods. The Presidene vetoed that bill.

The President, in his acceptance speech the other night, was very critical of the Congress for not giving him a workable price control bill in 1946. Do you recall whether the Democrats or the Republicans were in control of the Congress at that time?

Mr. PORTER. To the best of my recollection, the election was in November of 1946, in which there was a change.

Mr. KUNKEL. Elections are always in November.

Mr. PORTER. We have some important ones in August.

The CHAIRMAN. I guess we can take cognizance of the fact that the Seventy-ninth Congress, which was the Congress which passed that legislation, was controlled by the Democrats. That was the bill which the President was referring to when he said it was such a rotten bill that he could not sign it; was it not?

Mr. PORTER. I do not know that he used that expression.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, he used the expression.

Mr. PORTER. I recall that he vetoed the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. You recall that he vetoed it?

Mr. PORTER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. After the second bill was passed and signed by the President, do you recall the action taken by the President later that year with respect to controls?

Mr. PORTER. I think he signed that bill, again expressing his dissatisfaction.

The CHAIRMAN. What did he do with respect to price controls later that year? He took them off did he not?

Mr. PORTER. A number of them were taken off, yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did the President do that, or did the Congress do it?

Mr. PORTER. I think, Mr. WOLCOTT, the statement was made at that time that meat was the principal item, in the fall of 1946, and that the legislation which he had reluctantly approved as being inadequate had proved to be unworkable, and that those were the reasons assigned at that time by the President for doing so.

The CHAIRMAN. You will recall that he made the statement or do you recall that he made the statement when he took the controls off at that time, that the law of supply and demand should now be allowed to operate?

Mr. PORTER. I do not remember that specific statement. I think the hope was expressed that it would.

The CHAIRMAN. In the fall of 1947, he asked for substantially the same program that you are presenting here today. At that time, it was commented upon quite generally, to the effect that the President and his advisers could give us no information as to how these controls could be exercised, specifically. If you are given these controls, under this proposed bill, price controls, allocation controls, priority controls, how do you expect to use them? What commodities will you place under price control for example and to what extent?

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Chairman, as I indicated in my statement, the heads of the departments under whose jurisdiction——

The CHAIRMAN. Well, you are going to be the coordinator, and you are going to advise the President, subject, of course, to this advisory board which is set up, as to what commodities you are going to control. Now, I think, surely, a week after the President sends a message to Congress you should be in a position to give us some indication as to how you are going to use these controls.

Mr. PORTER. Let me state this, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of the record: You state there is provision in this bill for a coordinator. I have no idea of who that will be.

The CHAIRMAN. I think that in view of the press releases during the last week that we may assume you will be the coordinator.

Mr. PORTER. No, sir; I think that would be a most incorrect assumption. My assignment has been limited to help in the assisting of the drafting of this bill and preparation of the presentation.

The CHAIRMAN. Let us put it this way: Has the President ever indicated to you or anybody in your presence, or do you know what the President has in mind at the present time with respect to the use of these controls, if given to him?

Mr. PORTER. It has been the subject of a considerable discussion, Mr. Chairman, with the members of the Cabinet, and the affected departments, and I can state in general terms——

The CHAIRMAN. Who has he discussed it with in the Congress?

Mr. PORTER. That I do not know.

The CHAIRMAN. You said he had consultations with the Congress.

Mr. PORTER. No; I said with members of his Cabinet and the departments. I do not know what discussions have been made with Members of Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. Pardon me.

Mr. PORTER. But the approach proposed in this bill, as I have indicated, is a selective one. Certainly——

The CHAIRMAN. That was the same thing we had last December, Mr. Porter. What are you going to select to control? That is what we want to know.

Mr. PORTER. I would assume the Secretary of Agriculture would be prepared to tell you in considerable detail—I have discussed it with him—the specific commodities where he thinks prices are, at this point, ready, or should be put under a maximum price regulation.

The CHAIRMAN. What are they?

Mr. PORTER. Certainly meat is the most conspicuous one. The supply situation with respect to other farm commodities, I do not have the detailed information on that. Mr. Brannan is prepared to submit that to the committee in as much detail as it would desire. I would think that any department which was administering these price-control powers would have to present, before issuing a maximum-price regulation, a detailed statement of their justification for so doing. There are a number of food commodities which are in trouble; as I have said, meat is one.

The CHAIRMAN. What are some of the others?

Mr. PORTER. The extent to which fluid milk and dairy products would be controlled is a matter that I would prefer the committee ask Mr. Brannan about, because the Department of Agriculture has been going into that question in great detail.

The CHAIRMAN. You think you might put controls on meat and dairy products, then?

Mr. PORTER. The extent to which controls would be placed on all dairy products, I do not know. But I would think that those would be two items which are important in the cost of living, and should be given immediate attention.

The CHAIRMAN. What other commodities have you talked about placing under price control?

Mr. PORTER. Under the bill the standards provide that you could put no maximum price regulation on any commodity unless it had risen 20 percent above June of 1947. That would not exclude very many commodities, because prices have gone, on the most important commodities, considerably beyond that. I personally think that the apparel and clothing situation is one that should receive immediate attention. Certainly some of your basic nonferrous metals and basic steel should be given immediate consideration, but as to the——

The CHAIRMAN. You say giving consideration. Are you going to put controls on them? That is what we want to find out. Are you going to use these powers after they are given to you, and how are you going to use them? You wrecked our economy the last time you had OPA controls. It was not until we took controls off OPA that we had production, which the President contends and which you contend is absolutely necessary to stabilize our economy. We have got to proceed rather cautiously here to see that we do not do something that will reverse this trend. At the present time, as you have said, industry and agriculture are producing at a maximum rate.

Mr. PORTER. And prices are still going up.

The CHAIRMAN. What are the causes? You have stated what you think are the causes. What I am trying to get at is, How are you going to use the powers that we might give you to remove the causes for high prices?

Mr. PORTER. I certainly would agree, Mr. Chairman, that there is not in contemplation in this bill the putting into effect of the whole broad paraphernalia of OPA controls. That rather you would pick out the critical items which are in short supply and try to prevent further price increases by regulation.

Now, I recognize that there is a great deal of difference of opinion as to whether you can proceed on a selective basis. I personally do not think we have any alternative.

The CHAIRMAN. But you cannot tell us what you are going to select for controls, that is the point I am making.

Mr. PORTER. I have mentioned a few.

The CHAIRMAN. You mentioned meat and dairy products.

Mr. PORTER. A few key commodities, industrial commodities, nonferrous metals—I would not want at this time, with the information I have, Mr. Chairman, to suggest a detailed list of particular commodities.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Porter, the President has had since last November—as a matter of fact, since last October—to work out the details of this program, and up to the present time we have had no detailed program presented to us. This is the same program, with a little different language, which he submitted to us last December. Surely in the 7 or 8 months which have transpired between then and now somebody in the administration should be able to tell us what they have in mind with respect to the use of these controls.

Mr. PORTER. As I said, I would not want to particularize by a list of specific commodities. I think that all commodities which have risen beyond 20 percent since June of 1946 should be analyzed on a specific basis.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you think this Congress is going to give the President carte blanche authority to control our economy without knowing how he is going to use those controls?

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Chairman, we are prepared, through the heads of these departments, to get as specific as needed.

The CHAIRMAN. You have talked with them. Can you not give us some indication as to what use you are going to put these controls to?

Mr. PORTER. I would not want to go beyond the statement which I have made, which I think is as specific as I can get at this time. As to the food commodities, which have risen beyond 20 percent and threaten to rise more, and where the regulations are practicable and can be enforced, a maximum price regulation should be enacted to cover, both in the industrial and agricultural field, those commodities.

Now, I don't think it is necessary to go into those that are not essential to the cost of living. I have mentioned clothing and apparel as one item which should be under consideration.

Meat, livestock, dairy products. Certainly the grain situation does not require, in my judgment, because of the supply condition, any immediate consideration of maximum price regulations. The weather factors could change it.

In the case of steel and nonferrous metals, the question, depending upon what this Congress does about the housing program, of building materials, should come in for consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. When you are speaking about the imposition of price controls on these commodities, do you also include the allocation of inventory controls on the same commodities?

Mr. PORTER. I think that you can have, depending upon the distribution pattern and the supply situation, price controls in certain areas without allocation.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you think you could have price controls on meat without allocation controls?

Mr. PORTER. No, sir; I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you think you could have price controls on steel without allocation controls?

Mr. PORTER. Well, I would prefer that Secretary Sawyer give the committee the benefit of his experience under Public Law 395. There are some voluntary allocation controls which are in effect with respect to steel. I think that you could handle steel better on the basis of price control without allocation than you could a commodity where there are more producers.

The CHAIRMAN. Let us get back to the basis for high prices. First, we have an unusually large supply of purchasing power, and some goods are still in short supply.

The next point is the very unusual demand, by foreign countries, for these American goods which are in short supply.

Those are, generally speaking, the causes, are they not?

Mr. PORTER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. So, to attack inflation, we must try to remove the causes for inflation. Has the President had any conferences with the Federal Reserve Board looking to a stabilization of the value of the American dollar?

Mr. PORTER. I assume that the matter has been a question of concern. I am not aware of any specific discussion or conference. It is my understanding that Mr. McCabe, the Chairman of the Board, is going to appear before your committee, and I think he could advise you in greater detail than I can on that.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know whether the President has ever asked the Congress for additional powers, or whether the Federal Reserve has ever asked the Congress for additional powers with respect to that matter?

Mr. PORTER. I think they did last November, yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The request was made by Mr. Eccles for a secondary reserve. I am speaking now of a primary reserve. The secondary reserve program is something new and untried. Now, Mr. Eccles' recommendations were with respect to a secondary reserve.

Do you know whether the Administration has ever asked Congress for additional authority with respect to primary reserve?

Mr. PORTER. I am not aware that they have.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, they have not, as far as I know. Do you know whether they need any additional authority to raise rediscount rates?

Mr. PORTER. Again, that is a question that I think Mr. McCabe can answer more authoritatively. I think that they do have the power to increase rediscount rates.

The CHAIRMAN. Under existing law, the rediscount rates of the Federal Reserve System have been as high as 7 percent. They are 1½ percent now, I understand.

Mr. PORTER. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you not think that is a rather direct influence on the use of our money and on the ease with which credit can be obtained?

Mr. PORTER. I think it may be a factor, but there are probably other considerations of fiscal policy which motivate the Federal Reserve Board to maintain the rediscount rate.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you think the policy of the Federal Reserve Board with respect to the quoting of the bonds at 101 instead of par has some relationship to the value of our money?

Mr. PORTER. I think it has a stabilizing influence.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you recall why we reduced the reserves in 1946 from 35 and 40 to 25 percent?

Mr. PORTER. No; I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. The President at that time forecast we were going to have a depression. In consequence of that, as a hedge against it, the Democratic Congress reduced the deposit liability from 40 to 35 percent reduced the reserves otherwise from 40 percent to 25 percent. So it is now 25 percent. As far as I know——

Mr. SMITH. Was that not at the request of the President?

The CHAIRMAN. I assume it was. At any rate, it was done by the Democratic Congress. That had a tendency to make money easier, did it not? Did it not naturally follow that the reduced bank reserves from 35 and 40 to 25 had a tendency to make credit easier?

Mr. PORTER. I will agree, Mr. Chairman, that at that particular time there was a wide body of opinion which felt that at the end of hostilities and the reconversion program that there would be the prospect of lessening of industrial activity, and perhaps the threat of widespread unemployment. But that did not happen.

The CHAIRMAN. Then why has not the President asked for a restoration of these reserves, from 25 to 35 and 40? We suggested it last year, but he never asked for it.

Mr. PORTER. As I say, I think you would have to discuss that with the appropriate official of the Federal Reserve Board.

The CHAIRMAN. Is not the President concerned about the relationship between debt and the value of money?

Mr. PORTER. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. Then why does he not ask the Congress to do something about the monetization of the debt, by way of, for example, the sterilization of a certain amount of our debt so that it cannot be used as security for Federal Reserve notes?

Mr. PORTER. Well, that is, again, a question of fiscal policy that the Secretary of the Treasury should be asked, rather than myself.

The CHAIRMAN. Why has not the Secretary of the Treasury asked us long before this, if these are the basic reasons?

Mr. PORTER. I think you will have an opportunity——

The CHAIRMAN. I have made speeches since last October, one in particular, calling attention to the basic causes of inflation, chief of which was the easy money policy of the Government. I think we are all in agreement that the easy policy of the Government, whereby industry, agriculture, and everybody can go to a bank and get money for two and a half percent, at a profit to the bank, is one of the basic reasons for inflation, and something that the Federal Reserve Board should take cognizance of. We cannot administer the Federal Reserve Act. We are not going to try to administer the Federal Reserve Act, because it is too extensive. It is a pretty extensive proposition for us to try to administer. As you suggest in this program, that must be a very flexible program. I think this Congress would look with favor upon a program—and we have always looked with favor upon a program—to help the Federal Reserve, if they do not have the authority at the present time, to curtail the flow of credit, because we all agree that it is the volume and velocity of credit and money which has had more influence on prices than anything else. We have been suggesting to the Federal Reserve, we have talked with the Federal Reserve, we have talked with the Treasury, about whether they need any additional authority, and they have never yet asked us for any additional authority with respect to reserve requirements, rediscount rates, the sterilization of any part of our gold hoard or any part of our debt.

Now, the President has got to do something besides give lip service to this inflation problem.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Chairman, I attempted to point out in my statement that it is my belief that while the policies that you advocate may be important and necessary, I do not believe that one aspect of this alone is going to solve the problem of high prices.

The CHAIRMAN. Let us take up the second one, then, export controls. Last December we gave carte blanche authority to the President to control exports. I think perhaps because of an agreement with Canada—I am told—it might be difficult to control our exports to Canada. But to every other country, exports are under very strict control and the President is not hampered at all in the exercise of that control. We saw to it that he would not be embarrassed by too many standards with respect to export controls. Now, buying for foreign account, with the billions which we have made available, superimposed upon this unusual domestic demand for goods naturally affects prices. What has the President done with respect to the control of exports to balance domestic stability against foreign demand?

Mr. PORTER. I think that the program has been administered with a certain amount of rigidity.

The CHAIRMAN. Let us take that statement.

Mr. PORTER. But consistent with the commitments that we have made to western Europe.

The CHAIRMAN. Let us take that statement. When you were asking, last fall and last spring, for grain control, allocation of controls away from the American distillers, do you know that a situation similar to this confronted us: that in 1946, for example, there were only 666 bushels of rye exported to Canada for distillation purposes. Do you know how many were exported in 1947? Almost 3,000,000 bushels of rye were exported to Canada for whisky-making purposes. At the same time the President was asking us to allocate grain away from our American distilleries he was licensing the export of grain in increasingly large volumes to Canada and the United Kingdom. Do you know how much the exports of grain to the United Kingdom increased in 1947 over 1946? About 2,000,000 bushels in 1946 and more than 7,000,000 in 1947. At the same time the President was asking us for legislation to control the export of grain.

Mr. PORTER. But it is my information that a small proportion of that was used for distilling purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. This is just the grain that we know was exported for whisky-making purposes that I am talking about. And they are Commerce Department figures. When we gave the President authority to control exports last November or December, we made it very plain in our committee reports that he was being given this authority so that he could exercise the responsibility which we said was his, to balance domestic stability against foreign demand.

Now, what use has he made of that authority, and what does he mean by telling us now that this exceptionally large export of commodities is having a direct effect upon domestic prices, and at the same time telling us it is necessary to continue these exports, even outside the European recovery program?

Mr. PORTER. Well, I would assume, Mr. Chairman, that that is a consideration of foreign policy, as I have indicated in my statement, which has high priority.

The CHAIRMAN. Then if it is a question of foreign policy which is making American prices high, why not say so and meet the situation and be honest with the American people and tell them that our foreign policy is keeping our prices high and let it go at that?

Mr. PORTER. If that were the only factor, it would be relatively simple. I certainly would not assert that exports do not have an impact on prices.

The CHAIRMAN. I think we agree that the two basic factors are the easy money policies of the Government and our exports.

Mr. PORTER. I think, Mr. Chairman, that the figures will show that the volume of exports now as compared with our total national product are running at a lower than prewar rate. Obviously it has some significance on the price level, but I do not think it has a decisive one, and I doubt very much if you would affect prices substantially. Even an embargo, which no one has ever suggested, might not.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, it has been suggested, and I think I can say without fear of successful contradiction, that the President and the Federal Reserve Board now have the authority to plunge this country into depression, which means that they may stabilize it with the powers they already have. If they do not have the powers to stabilize our economy, then, they should ask the Congress for them. If the Federal Reserve wants any more authority to raise reserve requirements, if the President wants any more authority to control exports, I do not think this Congress would hesitate to give them that authority. The responsibility has to be placed somewhere.

Mr. PORTER. I think, as I undertook to point out in my statement, Mr. Chairman, that, as you have indicated, in the monetary field, reserve requirements, fiscal policy are a very delicate kind of operation, and that the purpose of this program which is now before the committee is to attempt to achieve stability without the danger of a serious recession.

The CHAIRMAN. On the question of export controls, again, let me read an excerpt from a statement made in an address of the President on November 17, 1947, with respect to export controls. He said—keep in mind that he was discussing the European recovery program at the same time as he was discussing inflation, taking cognizance of the effect which exports might have on domestic prices. He says this: "Those goods which we cannot wisely export must be kept here." What has he done to keep the goods here to meet the domestic demand and to bring the prices down?

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Chairman, I think if you would ask any exporter who has customers abroad, where there is demand for commodities in short supply, that he would tell you that the export licensing controls by the Office of International Trade have been administered rather vigorously.

The CHAIRMAN. But those exporters are not responsible for the stability of the American economy and the President is; is that the point?

Mr. PORTER. My point is that it has been. Mr. Sawyer, as I say—the Office of International Trade is under his jurisdiction—can give you as much detailed information about the Office of International Trade as the committee would care to receive. But it is my impression that it has been difficult to get licenses, by American exporters, for commodities which are in short supply.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Porter, last year there must have been licensed—he had the authority last year as well as this year—exports totaling $19,000,000,000. We imported about $8,000,000,000 worth. A differential of about $11,000,000,000. That $11,000,000,000 was financed here in the United States, partly by Government, partly by private enterprise. The controls which the President had over that situation were export controls. Of course, everyone realizes that so long as that wide differential between exports and imports continues, the demand for American goods is going to continue proportionately, and prices are going to be affected proportionately.

Mr. PORTER. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. It is quite generally agreed also that the instability of foreign currencies had an effect upon the exports from those countries. In other words, western European countries, including Great Britain, had priced themselves out of the American market by overvaluation of their own currencies, and at the present time, although France and Italy have done something about it, I do not think any sane American importer would pay $4.03 for the British pound sterling, unless he just had to have the goods. What has the President done about trying to correct that situation which has resulted in our having to export goods and dollars to bridge the gap between the legal and the real value of foreign currencies?

Mr. PORTER. I think that the instrumentalities of the World Bank——

The CHAIRMAN. The World Bank is a loaning agency.

Mr. PORTER. That is correct. The stabilization fund, I mean, have not been applied with any widespread degree, to my knowledge.

The CHAIRMAN. Let us say that the international fund has not exercised the leadership in the field of foreign currency stabilization that we had a right to expect of the fund. And it is rather difficult for me to say that, because Mr. Spence and I were at Bretton Woods, and this committee set up that program. So I think if anyone has the right to criticize it, we in this committee have, and I do criticize the fact, I criticize the managers of the fund, for not giving us the leadership with respect to world-currency stabilization that we need at this time.

Now, the monetary fund, having failed, do you not think it was the prerogative, if not the duty of the President, to call an international monetary conference to consider the stability of world currencies, in order that we might increase our imports to bridge the gap between the $8,000,000,000 and the $19,000,000,000?

Mr. PORTER. It seems to me that preceding that, Mr. Chairman, is the question of getting some stable economic and political conditions in those countries. I do not pretend to have the background and information and the expert eyes in this field that you have had, but I would assume that further monetary conferences, until there are stable economic and political conditions in those countries, would accomplish very little.

The CHAIRMAN. I think the answer to that is the fact that Italy and France being realistic about the situation did cut their franc and lira in two and in consequence it is expected that our imports from France and Italy are going to be appreciably greater this year than they were before they were devaluated.

Do you recall the Little Steel price formula?

Mr. PORTER. That is very reminiscent.

The CHAIRMAN. That was the formula which, in substance, said that steel prices could be raised notwithstanding the fact that they were at that time controlled, if production costs and labor costs increased. They could increase the price of steel to offset production costs. Who started that formula? Who broke the line with respect to steel prices?

Mr. PORTER. I doubt if we ever had any rigid line. There has been, as a result of collective-bargaining negotiations——

The CHAIRMAN. It does not make any difference how production costs were increased. Production costs were increased and steel prices were allowed to rise, though under control, to offset those production costs.

Mr. PORTER. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. That was the pattern set for industry generally, was it not?

Mr. PORTER. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. Who did that?

Mr. PORTER. That was done by the Director of Economic Stabilization, as I recall it.

The CHAIRMAN. Who did he answer to?

Mr. PORTER. In 1945?

The CHAIRMAN. Who did he answer to? He was the right-hand man of the President, was he not?

Mr. PORTER. I presume; yes, he was a Presidential appointee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Congress did not break the line, then, did it?

Mr. PORTER. Well, the line has been a thin and wavering one, but nevertheless, even under the Little Steel formula, where you permitted wage increases because of rising costs of living, there was a relative stability, as long as there was the opportunity to exercise powers of direct price control.

The CHAIRMAN. To refer very briefly to your proposed bill, a copy of which I got this morning and have not yet had an opportunity to study, you recognize in the bill that the prices are the aftermath of World War II.

Mr. PORTER. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. What you mean by that is they are the result of the Government spending incident to the war and the dislocation caused by the war?

Mr. PORTER. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. You ask for consumer-credit controls. I suppose you mean by that a restoration of what we knew as regulation W.

Mr. PORTER. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. Promulgated under Executive Order 8843.

Mr. PORTER. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. Which we rescinded last year.

Mr. PORTER. That is correct, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you think that there was such an economic emergency in the United States as to justify the President calling Congress into special session?

Mr. PORTER. Yes, sir; indeed I do.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know that the President now has the authority, or can get the authority, without legislative act, to control consumer credit?

Mr. PORTER. Installment credit?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. PORTER. In the face of the action of Congress specifically repealing?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. PORTER. I have been advised by the Federal Reserve Board that no such power exists—by their counsel.

The CHAIRMAN. Let me read the law. It is about eight lines, and specifically gives the President the authority to reactivate regulation W if he declares an emergency. Let me read it to you. This is Public Law 386 of the Eightieth Congress.

"That after November 1, 1947, the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System shall not exercise consumer credit controls pursuant to Executive Order 8843, and no such consumer credit controls shall be exerised after such date, except during the time of war beginning after the date of the enactment of this joint resolution, or any national emergency declared by the President after the date of enactment of this joint resolution." We were very careful not to disturb the basic law under which the President gets his power to control consumer credit, which is the Trading With the Enemy Act of 1917.

Now, the President can at this moment, under this law, declare an economic emergency, or declare any other kind of an emergency, because we do not specify what kind of an emergency he has to declare. We just say "or any national emergency." It seems to me that if there was a national emergency to an extent to justify recall of Congress into special session, that likewise there was national emergency sufficient to justify the Congress reactivating this legislation. So I think we can agree that you do not need any legislation with respect to consumer credit control. For that reason, the Congress has not acted on the recommendations of the President with respect to these controls. We felt that he had that authority.

Mr. KUNKEL. Mr. Chairman, may I ask you a question? Was not that language of the act phrased that way so that there would be no question as to whether a war emergency would have to be involved?

The CHAIRMAN. That is right.

Mr. KUNKEL. The language was carefully drawn with that in mind, to make it clear that the President would have that authority in an emergency, whether the emergency was connected with war or with the threat of war.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is absolutely right. There was a question, in the basic law, as to whether the emergency referred to in the basic law did not relate to war. So we made it very clear in this that the emergency to activate these powers by proclamation did not have to be incident to a war. We made it very clear. We did it deliberately. It was planned that way.

Mr. PORTER. Well, I would assume, if I might comment on that, Mr. Chairman, that if the President had concluded that the problem of high prices could have been solved by the declaration of an emergency pursuant to that statute and the reimposition of credit controls and nothing else, that it would have been unnecessary to call Congress back on the inflation problems. But this program——

The CHAIRMAN. I am going through this to find out why he called us back to meet this situation. As I have already said—and I repeat—the President and the Federal Reserve Board now have the power, under existing law, to plunge this country into a depression or anything short of a depression, by exercise of the controls they already have or can get, without any need for further legislative enactment.

Mr. SMITH. By which you mean, Mr. Chairman, that the President has the power to lower prices to any extent.

The CHAIRMAN. Dr. Smith, I mean that this is a credit expansion, and it is through credit expansion that the value of our dollar is affected to the point where prices continue to go up. That is the contention in the message of the President, I believe. If that is so, the President, by simple request of the Federal Reserve Board, could at least cause the Federal Reserve Board to consider the advisability of raising reserve requirements to a point where nobody could get a dollar of credit in this country. He would not need to be fooling around with consumer credit controls. He could make it impossible for any businessman, industrialist, or farmer, to get a dollar of credit, under controls which he now has or can get.

Mr. PORTER. Certainly nobody would advocate that course.

The CHAIRMAN. Why not? I wouldn't advocate, of course, going that far, but I think we have a right to expect that the orthodox methods of stabilizing our money and our economy will be used before new powers are given to the President. And the orthodox methods by which we have stabilized our currency and met the demand of industry and agriculture has been through the manipulation of reserve requirements and rediscount rates. If they are not there for that purpose, then, they are there for no purpose whatsoever. They are there for that very purpose.

Mr. PORTER. I think the Chairman put his finger on the essential weakness of using one device alone, and that is, if you were to go too far, you would be in real trouble as far as a major depression is concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. Let us see what happened when they did go just part way. In February, when the Government was not buying too much for export at that particular time, when the Federal Reserve started talking about raising reserve requirements, when Mr. Eccles started talking about a secondary reserve, and the ABA put on its program to restrict the use of credit for anything but essential purposes, prices started to go down, and we all hoped that that was the stabilizing recession which we felt was long overdue.

Mr. Eccles quoted bond prices, as I recall it, at 101 to 102, as a part of that program.

The administration was getting panicky because prices were going down. I do not want to say that Mr. Eccles' removal was because he was not in sympathy with the President's proposals to keep prices up, but surely something was basically wrong between the President and Mr. Eccles. We have never found out about it. I think Mr. Eccles was rather sincere in wanting to use the powers which the Federal Reserve Board had to stabilize prices in our economy, and I think until the contrary is shown, we have a right to assume that the basic trouble between the President and Mr. Eccles was with respect to the lowering of prices or the stabilization of the American dollar, which was a result of the lowering of prices.

Then the Government went into the market and started buying grain. Instead of supporting prices of agricultural commodities, they went in and bought large quantities, not spread over a month's time or 2 months' time, but they bought I do not know how many millions of bushels, in 1 day, which could have no other effect, of course, than to cause prices to go back up. Although the Commodity Credit Corporation and the Department of Agriculture had ample authority to support prices at 90 percent, and, although they could have let them go down to that and the farmer would have been better off, because by increasing the price of commodities to the consumer he was increasing the price of everything which the farmer had to buy. We realized that, but, instead of doing it that way, they went in and bought these huge stocks of grain and other commodities for export, forcing prices back up again.

Finally, the rediscount rate was increased to one and a half, losing altogether the psychological effect of that by the increase in purchasing by the Government for foreign countries. Now, I dare say, Mr. Porter, that if the Federal Reserve and the President, acting together today, were to initiate a stabilization program, there would be a psychological reaction to it to the point where we would be able to stabilize prices, because I think that 50 percent of our inflation is due to psychological reaction. If people think prices are going higher, they are going to buy and force them higher. If they think prices are going lower, they are going to sell and bring them down lower.

The President wants power. He wanted this program in December to prevent prices from going up. He came before the Congress in February of 1948 and demanded the same powers to prevent the prices from going down. How do you reconcile that?

Mr. PORTER. I do not recall specifically what you refer to.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, I do. I think we all recall it.

I refer to the fact that when prices were going down, when we thought this stabilizing recession was starting, in February, the President was reiterating that he needed controls to prevent a depression. That was in 1948.

Mr. MONRONEY. Was there a message on that, Mr. WOLCOTT?

The CHAIRMAN. There were letters or messages of some kind.

Mr. MONRONEY. Did they come before this committee?

The CHAIRMAN. I don't know where they went.

Mr. MONRONEY. Wouldn't this be the committee they would come to?

The CHAIRMAN. They are available. There was a message or letter, or something of that nature, or perhaps press statements. We all remember it very well. We will get the specific language for you.

Mr. BUFFETT. Mr. Chairman, will you yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. BUFFETT. I find that, according to the BLS index, on March 15, this year, the cost of food items was lower than it was on September 15 last.

Mr. BUCHANAN. How many points?

Mr. BUFFETT. It went down.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Where is it now?

The CHAIRMAN. It has gone up again.

Mr. PORTER. There is the chart which shows the index. Did you say February?

Mr. BUFFETT. March 15th.

Mr. PORTER. March 15th?

Mr. BUFFETT. Yes. It was actually lower than it was on September 15th of last year.

Mr. PORTER. That would be that point there. [Indicating.] But in spite of that particular variation, the thrust has been continuously upward, as you can see by this chart.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Porter, your chart there says something about consumers with moderate incomes in large cities.

Mr. PORTER. This is the same index to which I think Mr. Buffett was referring. It is the BLS index.

Mr. STRATTON. That is not a general index.

Mr. PORTER. That is the one generally referred to as the consumer's retail price index; yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Let us get back to your statement and the statement of the President again.

The President, in his message, asked, in rather unusual language, for wage controls. In what industries do you expect to use wage controls if the power is given to you?

Mr. PORTER. There is no reference, in what is proposed to be set up in the bill, as to the temporary wage board in the event of any collective bargaining agreement where there is a maximum price regulation if the employer does not require a price increase. So wage controls would be limited to those industries or commodities covered by a maximum price regulation where the employer sought a price increase.

The CHAIRMAN. Sought a price increase or was given a price increase?

Mr. PORTER. Sought a price increase by virtue of increased wages.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that the Little Steel formula?

Mr. PORTER. It is analogous to it.

The CHAIRMAN. You are asking us to legislate the policy which broke the line back in 1946.

Mr. PORTER. That is a matter of opinion.

The CHAIRMAN. The President says the Government should have the authority, however, to limit wage adjustments which would force a break in price ceilings, except where wage adjustments are essential to remedy hardship, to correct inequities, or to prevent an actual lowering of the living standards. Does the President want the authority to manipulate prices to remedy hardship, to correct inequities, or to prevent the lowering generally of living standards?

Mr. PORTER. I think those were the standards, generally, Mr. Chairman, that were used and applied by the old War Labor Board.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, we assume that he means that he is talking generally of living standards and hardships and inequities, industry-wide, but I think we have a right to know how he is going to exercise the authority to control wages to correct these hardships and inequities or to prevent an actual lowering of living standards.

Mr. PORTER. I think where you would find a marginal industry which required a price increase—

The CHAIRMAN. Where is there one?

Mr. PORTER. I think you could probably take one of the textile industries as one that comes to mind.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you advocate raising the wages of the textile industry worker?

Mr. PORTER. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Then what do you mean by taking the textile industry as an example?

Mr. PORTER. Well, I mean there are certain industries—one doesn't come to mind at the moment—where there are inequities in the wage structure. If that is arrived at and remedied by the collective bargaining agreement process and the Wage Board would approve such an agreement, then the employer could apply for a price increase.

As to what industries those are, I have no specific one in mind at the moment.

The CHAIRMAN. Surely there must be an example that you could give us as to how you would use this power?

Mr. PORTER. I will be glad to submit for the record the wage rates—

The CHAIRMAN. What do you mean by a "marginal" industry?

Mr. PORTER. Well, you could take where there is a collective bargaining agreement in a small plant, for example—perhaps in lumber or building materials; but offhand the wage levels generally, it would seem to me, if prices could be held, would, or should, remain at about the present levels.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you think that wages are generally too high?

Mr. PORTER. No, sir, I do not. As a matter of fact, I think, as I pointed out in my statement, that price increases in the cost of living, in spite of the third round of wage increases that we have had, have more than taken away the benefits from those wage increases.

The CHAIRMAN. You take the position, I assume, with the President, that there are industries which could absorb wage increases and higher production costs without a rise in prices.

Mr. PORTER. Yes. I have not stated——

The CHAIRMAN. All right. Just a minute. You say "Yes." Then you say, in the same breath, that there are industries which are making excessively large profits. There undoubtedly are. I will agree with you. Would you roll back the prices of the commodities produced by these industries making these excessively large profits which, according to your standards, are excessively large?

Mr. PORTER. It is permissible, in the standards, Mr. Chairman, to get prices back to November of 1947.

The CHAIRMAN. Can you tell us which are the commodities on which you think you will roll prices back?

Mr. PORTER. I would put it this way: I would think that if this bill prevented further increases it would have achieved its purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. Are we coming to the point that you expect to freeze all prices where they are at the present time until you can look at these commodities in their cost-production relationships and until you can make these adjustments?

Mr. PORTER. No, sir; I would not think so.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, what will you do? Will you freeze all prices where they are now? What will you do with your power, if given to you?

Mr. PORTER. I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, that this be a program which would follow the pattern of the old general maximum-price regulation of April of 1942; that it be administered, as I said, on a selective basis, taking both food and industrial commodities and issuing maximum-price regulations covering those.

Now, there is the further authority in the bill—which, I think, is a new device—which provides that in certain areas the Administrator, or the Department, may issue a temporary regulation, and then, if the industry itself wanted to increase prices, they would have to make application to the Department or to the Administrator; and if he did not act upon it within a period of 30 days, or hold a public hearing, the price increase would become effective.

The provision I refer to is contained in the bill; the requirement for a temporary regulation. But even that, I think, would be used selectively.

The CHAIRMAN. You would be given the power, however, under the bill, to freeze prices at their present level generally?

Mr. PORTER. Yes; the power would be there.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you want to discuss marginal requirements and excess-profits taxes?

Mr. PORTER. I would prefer that the Secretary of the Treasury or the Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board discuss those questions with you. The bill is being prepared, as I understand it, and will be submitted.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that we may have a short session on the floor, can we recess and come back?

The CHAIRMAN. We cannot. Would it be agreeable to you to come back tomorrow morning, Mr. Porter?

Mr. PORTER. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Can we meet this afternoon?

The CHAIRMAN. No. We have a Republican conference this afternoon.

If it is agreeable with the committee, we will recess at this time to reconvene tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock.

(Whereupon, the committee recessed, to reconvene at 10 o'clock a. m., Friday, July 30, 1948.)

Price Control or Free Economy?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WINT SMITH
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 6, 1948

Mr. SMITH of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, former Federal Reserve Board Chairman Eccles declared, in testifying against the President's anti-inflation program, before the House Banking and Currency Committee August 3, 1948, that the only people who wanted price control were the black marketeers and the tax-evaders. He should have added a third group—those who would destroy our system of private enterprise and individual initiative and replace it with a centralized, controlled, regimented, planned economy.

It is true that prices today generally are higher than they were before World War II. Why? We have built, in this country, an agricultural and industrial machine designed to produce the goods and services required to meet the demands of 145,000,000 people. A large part of the machine during the war was necessarily diverted from producing for consumers to producing for war, thereby creating a huge backlog of consumer demand which now must be met. In addition to this backlog of demand, we now—under the present foreign-aid program which we are told is to preserve individual liberty everywhere in the world—are demanding that our productive machine produce goods and services to meet the demands of 600,000,000 people.

If we are to continue that program, we must choose one of two alternatives: Either we pay higher prices for everything we need, as our individual contribution to preserving individual liberty in the United States as well as everywhere else in the world—or we refuse to make that individual contribution, accept price control and its regimentation, thereby losing individual liberty here in the United States.

Everyone today apparently wants to receive 1948 prices for his own production, but wishes to pay only 1939 prices for the other individual's production. It just can't be done—even with price control. Price control never has worked. It is not new. It was tried as long as 4,000 years ago in Babylon and has been tried again and again and again down through history with only one result. It has wrecked every nation that tried to enforce it.

That is amply proved by the history of price control from 2130 B. C. to A. D. 1946, which was prepared 2 years ago at the request of Members of the Congress by Women Investors Research Institute, Inc., of 224 Second Street SE., Washington, D. C., of which Miss Catherine Curtis is president. I am convinced that—if the people of the United States only know the historical effects of price control—they never again will listen to the siren song of those who would impose that form of regimentation upon us. There is no better way for the people to know those facts than to read this history of price control. It is as follows:

THE HISTORY OF PRICE CONTROL FROM 2130 B. C. TO A. D. 1946

"There is no new thing under the sun. Is there a thing whereof it may be said: See, this is new? It hath been long ago, in the ages which were before us." Ecclesiastics, 1:9-10.

A planned economy—with fixed prices or price ceilings—is the oldest type of economy in the world. It necessitates a static, unchanging economy. As the body economic is dynamic and everchanging—due to inventions and technological improvements—this economic system evidently is opposed to the realities of life and the personal freedom of the individual.

One of the outstanding economic historians of today—C. T. Revere—has assayed its fallacies as follows:

"A cardinal weakness of planned economy lies in its tendency to approach its problems as though it were dealing with things instead of people. Statistics laboriously gathered, endless questionnaires going into the most minute details, meticulously compiled into dossiers so voluminous that the patience of Job and the wisdom of Solomon alone could discern their import, are relied upon to furnish the desired solution.

"Perhaps some day bureaucracy will make the interesting discovery that while the Euclidian method has its merits in certain narrow fields, our great social economic and even political problems do not always yield their secrets to mathematical treatment. Strange as it may seem, biology, the way of nature, can point the way more clearly. Nature has laws, as such great scientists as Robert A. Millikan, the two Comptons, and others have contended, that cannot be ignored. Statistics and graphs have their charm for the doctrinaires, but no one yet has been able to chart human emotions, with their cantankerous quirks."

The United States has been almost engulfed with a steady stream of propaganda designed to lead the people to believe that planned economy is something new—that it is the economy that will lead the country into the land of the more abundant life—that it will give the workers particularly more and greater benefits.

Since the price-control resurrection law passed by Congress July 24, 1946, provides the legal machinery through which price control, the keystone of planned economy, can become permanent in this country, it might be well briefly to review the 4,000-year record of planned economy and its ultimate effects upon nations before the United States is led into passively and unknowingly accepting it as its national economy.

BABYLON, 2130 B. C.

Hammurabi (2130-2087 B. C.), a testy old king, promulgated the Code of Hammurabi. This bombastic individual apparently was the Chester Bowles of his day and equally expert in propagandizing the people with such now familiar words as "justice," "security," etc., as the following epilogue from his code indicates:

"Hammurabi the perfect king am I; I brought health to the land; I made the populace to rest in security; I permitted no one to molest them. The great gods proclaim me; and I am the guardian governor, whose scepter is righteousness and whose beneficent protection is spread over my city; in my bosom I carried the people of the land of Akkad; under my protection, I brought their brothers into security; in my wisdom I restrained them, that the strong might not oppress the weak, and that they should give justice to the orphan and the widow.

"Babylon, the city whose foundations are firm as heaven and earth for the pronouncing of judgment in the land, for the rendering of decisions for the land, and for the righting of wrong, my weighty words I have written upon my monument and in the presence of my image as king of righteousness have I established. The king who is preeminent among city kings am I. My words are precious, my wisdom is unrivaled. By the command of Shamash, the great judge of heaven and earth, may I make righteousness to shine forth upon the land. Hammurabi indeed is like a real father to his people. In the days that are yet to come for all future time, may the king who is in the land observe the words of righteousness which I have written upon my monument. May he not alter the judgments of the land which I have rendered.

"Hammurabi the king of righteousness whom Shamash has endowed with justice am I. My words are weighty; my deeds are unrivaled."

Hammurabi went all out for price control. Not only were all commodity prices fixed; he also controlled wages for boatmen, reapers, threshers, shepherds, laborers, artisans, bricklayers, tillers, stone cutters, milkmen, and carpenters. In addition he also regulated builders' fees and warehousing, as well as rental of cows in milk, calves, oxen, wagons, and freight and passenger boats, as the following excerpts from his code show:

"If a builder build a house for a man and complete it, that man shall give him two shekels of silver per sar a house as his wage.

"If a man hire an ox to thresh, 20 ka of grain is its hire.

"If a man hire an oxen, a driver, and a wagon, he shall pay 180 ka of grain per day.

"If a man hire a laborer from the beginning of the year until the fifth month, he shall pay 6 Se of silver per day, from the sixth month until the end of the year he shall pay 5 Se of silver per day.

"If a man hire an artisan the wage is 5 Se of silver.

"The wage of a brickmaker is 5 Se of silver. The wage of a tailor is 5 Se of silver. The wage of a carpenter is 4 Se of silver. The wage of a mason is 4 Se of silver per day.

"If a man hire a boat of 60 gur he shall pay 1/6 of a shekel of silver as its hire per day."

On the basis of historical evidence, these ceilings did not hold "for all future time" as he had boasted they would, because of popular revolt against these tyrannical rules and regulations. While certain parts of the Code of Hammurabi became the basis of other ancient and even present law, revolt against price control reveals one of the fundamental themes of human history—a struggle between regimentation and freedom.

EGYPT, 1700 B. C.

The Book of Genesis reveals that—during the time of Abraham—there was a granary in Egypt where all the people were supposed to be sure of a plentiful supply of corn—but the true story of Joseph shows how control of the food supply by government reduced a people to slavery.

Joseph gathered and stored for the Pharoah—in years of abundance—one-fifth of the harvests. When famine came, the Egyptians went to Joseph and bought food from him until all their money was gone. Next—they gave him their cattle in exchange for food. Then—after they had bartered away all their cattle they offered first—their land—and finally themselves in exchange for bare subsistence.

Having thus reduced them to slavery as the price of life, Joseph—about 1700 B. C.—gave them seed and put them on the land again. Joseph was certainly no philanthropist—for Flavius Josephus tells the story as follows:

"When famine came, the multitude, sorely oppressed, repaired in crowds to the stores and magazines of the king. The situation of the poorer and common sort was piteous beyond description, for, having laid in but a very scanty store and not being able to obtain a supply without ready money, when that was exhausted, they were reduced to the necessity of exchanging their cattle, slaves, lands, nay, their last little all, to procure grain from the king's granaries to protract a needy, miserable life. When by these means they became totally destitute, they were abandoned to a desolate world, that the king might secure their bartered possessions. But when at length the river overflowed, watered the earth, revived drooping nature, and produced a fertile aspect, Joseph made the tour of the kingdom and, summoning his respective landholders, restored to them such parts as they had sold to the king, on condition of their paying a fifth,[1] as tribute to him by virtue of his prerogative, and then enjoined them to the same diligence in their improvements, as if they were to derive the emoluments resulting from the whole. Transported at the returning prospect of plenty and the restitution of their landed property, the people applied themselves to agriculture with unremitting assiduity; so that by this well-timed act of policy Joseph established his own authority in Egypt and increased the standing revenue of all its succeeding monarchs."

The outstanding result of the Egyptian control of grain crops and their prices was a system of land tenure by which the land became the property of the monarch and was rented from him by the agricultural class.

THE HITTITE CODE, 1385 B. C.

The great Hittite legal code was formulated during the so-called New Empire period (about 1385 B. C.) under King Shuppiliumash and was in two parts, containing about 200 paragraphs. It dealt with assault and battery, slaves, marriages, bandits, land-tenure laws, feudal duties, military service, domestic animals, theft and damages, incendiarism, horticultural laws, laws fixing wages, rentals, and fees for certain services, and laws on adultery and rape.

Laws 150 to 161 fixed wages, rentals, and fees on services. The rental of the plow ox was, for example, 1 shekel per month (151). Another law showed the great discrepancy between the wages of men and women:

"If a man goes and offers himself for wages and undertakes the management of a cart, is lodged in a straw barn, and irrigates a cultivated field, his wages for 2 months are 30 pas (or pecks) of barley. If a woman goes and offers herself for wages in the kitchen (or harvest?), she shall receive as wages for 2 months 12 pas of barley (158)."

Not only were fees fixed, but prices as well. One of the largest sections of the code (172–186) fixed prices not only of livestock, grains, land, wearing apparel, skins, and meat, but also of the services of various types of artisans for different periods of time.

"If anyone hires an artisan, either a potter, a smith, a carpenter, a shoemaker, a tailor, a weaver, or a maker of lace, he shall pay 10 shekels of silver" (176B).

"If anyone employs a skilled bird raiser he shall pay 25 shekels of silver" (177).

The prices for given species of animals differed according to sex and use.

"The price of a plow ox is 15 shekels, of an ordinary full-grown ox 10 shekels, of a full-grown cow 7 shekels, of a 6 months' old bull calf 4 shekels, of a pregnant cow 8 shekels, of a calf 2 shekels" (178).

Similar gradations prevailed for horses, goats, asses, and sheep. The price of a sacred headdress was fixed at 12 shekels, two pairs of breeches 10 shekels, an apron 3; a storm cloak 4, and a turban 1 (182). A considerable range of prices prevailed for the fresh meat and dressed skins of different domestic animals (185–186).

It would seem that supply and demand were either deliberately ignored in the ancient Babylonian and Hittite civilizations or that the cultures were so submissive to customary procedures that variations in supply and demand were not recognized.[2] In spite of the classifications established, the fixed prices also seemed to ignore qualitative variations within the classes.

History again records that the wage, price, and rent laws had to be abolished or drastically revised because of popular pressure. The ancient ruler met with deep-seated resentment against his attempts to block the activities and trade of his citizens. Before the end of the eighth century, B. C., the Hittites had been absorbed by Assyria, primarily because of a break-down in their economic system.

CHINA, 427–387 B. C.

Dr. Chen Huan-Chang, in his book, The Economic Principles of Confucius and His School, points out:

"There are two sets of interests, those of producers and those of consumers. But nothing more markedly affects the interests of both sides at once than prices. Therefore, price is the great problem for society as a whole. According to the Confucian theory, the government should level prices by the adjustment of demand and supply, in order to guarantee the cost of the producer and satisfy the wants of the consumer.

"Its chief aim is to destroy all monopoly so that the independent or small producer can be protected on the one side, and the consumer on the other. It prevents the middleman from making large profits, and gives the seller and buyer full gain. It is the task of the superior man to adjust demand and supply so as to keep prices on a level.

"When Li K'o became the minister of Wei he said that if the price of grain were too high, it would hurt the consumers, and that if it were too low, it would hurt the farmers. If the consumers were hurt the people would emigrate, and if the farmers were hurt, the state would be poor. The bad results of a high price and a low price are the same. Therefore, a good statesman would keep the people from injury and give more encouragement to the farmers."

Dr. Chen summed up the Chinese experiment in price control as follows:

"The failure was the result not of the original law itself, but of the administration of man. The chief difficulty in administering it is that it is not easy for officials to undertake commercial functions along with political duties."

ATHENS, 404–337 B. C.

The Athenians also experimented with price ceilings. This is discussed in a book entitled "Public Economy of the Athenians," by Boeckh. He states:

"In order to prevent as much as possible the accumulation of grain and the withholding it from sale, forestalling it was confined within very narrow bounds. It was not allowed to buy at one time more than 50 backloads (about 75 bushels). The transgression of this law was punished with death. The grain dealers were also not permitted to sell the medimnos of grain at a higher price than 1 obulus (3 cents) more than they had paid for it. These dealers, who were commonly aliens under the protection of the state, enhanced the price, notwithstanding, by overbidding others in the purchase of grain in time of scarcity, and they often sold it the same day on which they purchased it at an advance of a drachma (17.1 cents) on the medimnos. Lysias cannot relate particulars enough respecting the profligacy of these extortioners. They were hated fully as much as the same class in modern times. * * * 'Were they not menaced with the punishment of death,' said he, 'they would hardly be endurable.' While the Ageranomi (Market Masters) had the superintendence of the sale of all other commodities, the state, in order to prevent the extortion of the grain dealers, appointed a particular body of officers called the Sitephylaces (grain inspectors) to have the oversight of this single business. * * * They kept accounts of the grain imported, and besides the oversight of grain, they had also the inspection of meal and bread, that they might be sold according to legal weight and price."

Proof that the Athenian lawmakers found themselves in difficulty can be found in the oration against the grain dealers by Lysias. In speaking of the necessity for capital punishment of price ceilings' violators, he stated:

"But it is necessary, gentlemen of the jury, to chastise them not only for the future; for as things now are they will be hardly endurable. And consider that in consequence of this vocation very many already have stood trial for their life; and so great are the emoluments which they derive from it that they prefer to risk their life every day rather than to cease to draw from you unjust profits. And indeed not even if they entreat you and supplicate, would you justly pity them, but much more rather the citizens who perished on account of their wickedness, and the importers against whom they made a combination. * * * If then you shall condemn them, you shall act justly and you will buy grain cheaper; otherwise dearer."

Here again, history records that—despite capital punishment—price control was unworkable.

ROME, 301–361 A. D.

Early Roman emperors, such as Tiberius, Commodus, and Alexander Severus all attempted partial price control. One of the greatest price-fixing attempts occurred in Rome in A. D. 301 when Diocletian issued what has become known to historians as the Tariff of Prices. This was issued after the deficiteering on the part of an extravagant bureaucracy resulted in continued dilution of Roman money. The following sympathetic appeal from the preamble of Diocletian's edict would indicate that he was even more melodramatic than Chester Bowles, Paul Porter, or any of the contemporary professional "protectors of the poor."

"Who has so hard a heart, or is so bereft of human sympathies that he can be unaware, nay, that he has not seen with his own eyes, that in the sale of wares exchanged in the market place or handled in the daily trade of cities, extravagance in prices has

[1] It would appear from this that Joseph levied a 20-percent withholding tax on the people of Egypt to sustain the spendthrift policies of that country's rulers.

[2] OPA Administrator Porter stated May 10, 1946, before the Senate Banking and Currency Committee, "I would say that we (OPA) are in the business of keeping the law of supply and demand from working. There can be no question about that." The American people do not seem to have yet recognized this fact.

gone so far that the unbridled lust for plunder is held in check neither by abundance of supplies nor by fruitful seasons.

"It is our will, therefore, that the prices of commodities designated in the enclosed schedule be brought to the attention of the whole Empire so that everyone may know that they are not at liberty to exceed them. Whence it is justly our will to decree that nowhere shall merchants dispose of their wares at extortionate rates. Rarely indeed have human transactions been found beneficial to the many, and ever has salutary fear been proven the most equitable feature and regulator of civic duties.

"It is our will that if anyone shall trespass against this decree he shall become liable to capital punishment. No one should deem this a harsh measure, since there is at hand a ready means to avoid its severity by keeping his profits within bounds. Nor shall he be considered innocent, who having goods necessary for daily life and use, shall have determined to hoard them, since the punishment ought to be even heavier for him who causes scarcity than for the ordinary lawbreaker.

"For, if the raging avarice * * * which, without regard for mankind, increases and develops by leaps and bounds, we will not say from year to year, month to month, or day to day, but almost from hour to hour, and even from minute to minute, could be held in check by some regard for moderation, or if the welfare of the people could calmly tolerate this mad license from which, in a situation like this, it suffers in the worst possible fashion from day to day, some ground would appear, perhaps, for concealing the truth and saying nothing; * * * but inasmuch as there is seen only a mad desire without control, to pay no heed to the needs of the many, * * * it seems good to us, as we look into the future, to us who are the fathers of the people, that justice intervene to settle matters impartially, in order that that which, long hoped for, humanity itself could not bring about may be secured for the common government of all by the remedies which our care affords."

In this edict, prices were specified for between 700 and 800 items, practically all the articles which his subjects would have occasion to buy. Wages also were fixed—teachers, advocates, bricklayers, tailors, weavers, physicians—all were included.

"The carpenter and joiner are paid by the day, the teacher by the month, the knife grinder, the tailor, the barber, by the piece, and the coppersmith according to the amount of metal which he uses."

The prices given in the edict were not normal but maximum. As the prevailing prices were so high, however, it is not probable that the maximum prices differed very greatly from them. The net result was failure and the law had to be repealed because of its impotence in correcting the condition of affairs. Lactantius in A. D. 314 writes as follows of Diocletian and his edict:

"After that the many oppressions which he put in practice had brought a general dearth upon the Empire, then he set himself to regulate the prices of all vendible things. There was also much bloodshed upon very slight and trifling accounts; and the people brought provisions no more to markets, since they could not get a reasonable price for them; and this increased the dearth so much, that at last after many had died by it, the law itself was laid aside."

The historian Gibbon relates that 60 years after Diocletian's effort to control the cost of living by fixing prices, the Emperor Julian made a similar attempt, with no greater success. He writes:

"When the luxurious citizens of Antioch complained of the high price of poultry and fish, Julian publicly declared that a frugal city ought to be satisfied with a regular supply of wine, oil, and bread; but he acknowledged that it was the duty of a sovereign to provide for the subsistence of his people. With this salutary view, the Emperor ventured on a very dangerous and doubtful step, of fixing by legal authority the value of corn. He enacted that, in a time of scarcity it should be sold at a price which had seldom been known in the most plentiful years; that his own example might strengthen his laws, he sent into the market 422 moddi, or measures, which were drawn by his order from the granaries of Hierapolis, of Chalcis, and even of Egypt. The consequences might have been foreseen and were soon felt. The imperial wheat was purchased by the rich merchants; the proprietors of land, or of corn, withheld from that city the accustomed supply; and the small quantities that appeared in the market were secretly sold at an advanced and illegal price."

The decree of Diocletian, by the very completeness of the list of articles it controlled, must have been felt in every village and countryside in the imperial domain. The prices of all articles of trade, from a measure of beer and a bunch of watercress to a piece of genuine purple silk and a bar of pure gold—as well as services for the shaving of a man or the shearing of a sheep to the fees of a lawyer for presenting a case—all were set out in detail.

Moscow Talks

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHESTER E. MERROW
OF NEW HAMPSHIRE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 6, 1948

Mr. MERROW. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial which appeared in the New Hampshire Morning Union published in Manchester, N. H., on August 5, 1948:

MOSCOW TALKS

After engineering itself into an impossible position with relation to Russia in Europe, the Truman administration is now trying feverishly to get Stalin to help it out. Our trouble in Berlin is due directly to a stupid agreement at Potsdam that provided for a four-power occupation of that city and furnished no access for the three Western Powers across Russian-controlled territory. Berlin today is an island surrounded by the Russian occupation zone which we can cross only with Russian permission. The stupidity of thus putting ourselves at Russia's mercy is quite beyond comprehension.

Under the Balkan peace treaties the Danube was to be free and open to navigation and controlled by international agreement. But as in so many other cases, Russia has flouted this arrangement and treated the Danube as a Russian river. Now we have entered a conference at Belgrade to settle the matter in which Russia and her satellites are a majority and we must accept their decision or go home. Russia has presented a new Danube pact in which the west would be excluded completely from control of the river.

The danger in this whole situation is that it will lead to another Munich in which the west will grant concessions that strengthen Russia's position in the hope of obtaining a temporary peace. For despite optimistic statements that are coming out of Moscow, the hard fact is that Russia's attitude in Berlin and at the Danube Conference has not changed. The same harsh, incorrigible position is maintained.

Nor is there any indication that the Kremlin has abandoned, or will abandon its drive to communize the world. It may accept negotiation and make minor concessions for the present that strengthen its main objective for the future. Just now that objective centers on hitching Germany to the Soviet bloc. If that can be accomplished, reconstruction in western Europe will be wrecked and Russian control of Europe will be assured.

Nor should it be forgotten that it was Russia who wrecked all past four-power conferences because she could not have her way. Stalin will accept a new four-power conference on Germany if he thinks he has the west in a corner where it must yield to his demands. We can have a settlement on Germany any day if we will abandon our economic and political program for western Europe and turn Germany over to Communist control. Such terms we cannot accept.

While no one will desire to close the door to negotiation at any time, we must be alert and not make our position more hazardous than it is. Another Munich will result exactly as the first Munich did. It will encourage the aggressors and makes the showdown inescapable. These Moscow talks, unless we are as sharp as Stalin, may turn out to be the most dangerous turn the European situation has yet taken.

Equity for Labor and Capital

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALBERT W. HAWKES
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, August 6 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. HAWKES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address I made approximately 10 years ago on the subject, Equity for Labor and Capital.

This speech was made to the Congress of American Industry, held in New York City at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel, on December 9, 1938, and shows the thoughts I was trying to get over to industry and labor with reference to the spirit of justice and equity which should guide each of these factors so important to the success and preservation of our American system of making a living, with the right to improve one's own standard through his contributions to the success of the American system of free men.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EQUITY FOR LABOR AND CAPITAL

I have chosen for my subject Equity for Labor and Capital. I purposely put labor before capital, as it is very easily proved that capital or property is the fruit of labor. It might be properly called the stored up or canned fruit of labor—something that is available for use at times when required to build jobs and keep the human endeavors for life and progress going.

The brand of canned capital fruit, known as surplus in corporations, is something that makes available fruit out of season, when the trees of industry are not producing profits. Labor comes first, the same as the tree comes before the fruit—in fact, the tree is responsible for the fruit.

Before I get into my subject I wish to state that I am a believer in our American form of representative government—the Constitution of the United States, with its included powers of amendment by certain prescribed processes—and in the free-enterprise system of economics, which has made this country the greatest place on earth to live. Nothing that I say herein should be construed by anyone as not squaring with sound economics and our American system and way of living.

I believe that the usefulness and happiness of human beings in this country is in the inverse ratio to the amount of paternalism that is shown to people physically able to work and earn a living. The aged, the sick, and the incapacitated are recognized by all right-thinking people as being our charge, and I do not believe this country will ever deny that the fit and capable are their brother's keeper. But I believe in the last analysis the people of this country will resent part of the fit taking care of another part of the fit through any system invoked by any agency along the lines of paternalism.

I am not going to deal with wages or hours, working conditions, wage incentives, bonuses, group, life, and health insurance, vacations with pay, or even some of the fine plans of forward-thinking companies which have devised or are endeavoring to devise plans that give the workers a participation in profits after the payment to the stockholders of a reasonably sound dividend. Those things will be taken care of by other speakers.

A DOUBLE PROBLEM

It has been said that labor is the No. 1 problem of industry and business. I might be permitted to make an amendment to this statement by saying that labor and capital combined are the No. 1 problem in industry and business, because, after all, industry is made up of two distinct factors, namely, labor, on the one hand, and capital and management on the other. Labor, under our economic system, can do little in establishing a business or making jobs for itself without capital. Capital can do little in establishing a business and making returns for itself without labor. Therefore, labor and capital must find a way to cooperate wholeheartedly and sincerely to produce satisfactory benefits.

Every man and woman of legal working age in this country is a potential laborer. Some labor with their hands; some with their brains; and some a combination of brains and body.

Many men in industry say they never had any real labor problems. They mean they never had labor problems which they were unable to solve through a fair and honest discussion.

I recall the story concerning a United States Supreme Court Justice, who had just celebrated his fiftieth wedding anniversary. He met a Senator and Congressman just after the celebration and one of them said, "Good afternoon, Judge. You are certainly looking fine." And the Justice replied, "I am feeling fine, gentlemen. This is my fiftieth wedding anniversary and we have just had a few very dear friends to luncheon with us. I am a most fortunate man because my wife and I have lived together 50 years in complete harmony, without a cross word." The Senator then said, "Judge, it is wonderful for you to be able to say that. I wish I could." Whereupon the Congressman interposed and said, "Go ahead, Senator. Why don't you? The Judge said it."

Now the Justice did not mean by his remark there never had been any difference of opinion or problems, because problems and differences of opinion come to all people in every human relationship in life. The Justice meant that he and his wife had established a relationship based on faith, confidence, and equity, and when problems and differences of opinion arose they were promptly settled and not permitted to grow into a breach.

If labor and capital could deal on the same basis as the Justice and his wife, there would be no need of laws attempting to control their actions. Such laws usually breed class hatred and bitterness—and class hatred and bitterness have never successfully solved a single important problem in the history of the world.

THE RULE OF EQUITY

Common law in itself is crystallized common sense, resulting from the experience of the majority of human beings from time immemorial. The administration of common law is sometimes bounded by hard and fast rules; and statutory law is still less flexible. Equity is more flexible—it is the soul and spirit of righteousness. Equity has been described as "The spirit and the habit of fairness, justice, and right dealing, which should regulate the intercourse of men with men." Justinian, the great Roman Emperor, described equity, "To live honestly, to harm nobody, to render every man his just due." Perhaps the best definition of all is in the words of the Man of Galilee, "Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them."

Equity must come from within labor and capital—it must be born, it cannot be legislated. It is born of right-thinking and good conscience. Equity, the child of these two, should serve as the keystone of cooperative efforts of labor and capital—thereby bringing happiness and satisfaction to those invoking its aid.

Equity must rule human acts so far as humanly possible in this world. This means many new decrees of equity (public opinion) will appear as humanity develops. For instance, humanity has yet to decree that a woman doing a given piece of work as well as a man, should get the same pay. Sex should not determine the rate of pay.

The important thing in the procedure of equity is that humanity cannot absorb great changes too rapidly without damaging many of the good things it has accomplished.

Hence, the tempo of each change is quite as important as the change itself—as related to the successful system we have produced.

MAKING THINGS WORK

The paramount problem confronting capital, management, and labor today is the same as has confronted human beings through all recorded history—namely, to make things work and to give every man his just due. The signers of the Declaration of Independence and the makers of the Constitution of the United States, had this in view when they summarized in the Declaration of Independence the inalienable rights of men as "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." They then endeavored to so frame the Constitution as to carry this announced principle into effect.

If this great principle of equity is abandoned, human relationships—small or great—fall to pieces, with the result that misery and suffering and chaos are brought, not only to those who destroyed this great principle, but to all who live within the boundaries where the destruction takes place.

The world has been looking at the United States of America for more than 150 years, watching the experiment of the American system of representative government. Undoubtedly there have been many who have wished it failure. Many nations have been born and have perished. Dictators have risen and fallen and risen again—but our great country has successfully gone on with its progress in making things work, because the American people have tried to hold fast to the cardinal principle of equity, upon which our country is founded, and I believe the great majority of American citizens are interested in giving every man his just due.

The genius of America has always been to make things work. The steam engine, telegraph, telephone, automobile, radio, airplane, and a thousand other important developments, have been brought into existence for the benefit, comfort, and happiness of mankind.

It is our responsibility now to make things work in human relationship. Just as the engineer is called upon to find out why the engine or machine will not work when it ceases to operate and then to reappraise stresses and strains, considering the particular nature of the work the machine is called upon to do—so we at this time are called upon to make human relationship work satisfactorily.

Labor and capital and management should carefully examine the delicate and intangible thing that holds them together and makes them work, because we are living in a new world era where changes require constant examination and reexamination of those human relationships.

This is our job today—the job of labor and capital and management, as engineers of the human industrial machine of America. Capital cannot function successfully without labor, and labor cannot function successfully without capital. Hence the indispensable cooperation between the two.

WHAT IS A MAN'S JUST DUE?

The first thing management should do is to ascertain, as far as humanly possible, What is the "just due" of each grade of manpower employed in an industry? This is a difficult job and all human minds could never be expected to reach precisely the same conclusion. However, if the great majority of men charged with directing the affairs of industry, business, and agriculture will seek earnestly and in the proper spirit for the truth of what is every man's "just due"—I feel that we can develop sufficient patience and tolerance to enable us to proceed in a cooperative way on a basis of mutuality while we are moving steadily in the direction of the objective—namely, equity for labor and capital.

We all have a very heavy responsibility resting upon us right at this period of our lives—and history will record whether we are equal to the task. We must realize that the price of failure will be disaster to all of us and our country. But I say we shall not fail because I have absolute confidence in the desire of the great majority of those in the industrial and business arena to solve this problem as promptly as possible in a way that is satisfactory to the great mass of the American people. We must and will solve this problem the same as we have solved other problems in the past—the American way for the common good of all.

No man in this country can successfully act in disregard of public opinion. After all, public opinion creates governments and the form of governments, and it changes them at will when it is sufficiently crystallized.

THE CHARACTER OF LABOR

As I consider the many representatives of capital and management whom I know; and the many laboring men whom I also know—I am sure that a cross section of all human beings is pretty much the same. There is just about as much selfishness in one quarter as another. There is just about as much good in one quarter as another. There is just about as much love of country and our form of living in one quarter as another.

I believe the intelligent workingman who has been taught the story of this country and our enterprise system is strongly in favor of it, and that he recognizes the fact that in every country where the system of free enterprise has been destroyed, the rights of "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," have been endangered or taken away. If we can proceed on the basis that the laboring man is just as good a citizen as the capitalist or those engaged in management (and I believe he is), we will make tremendous progress. After all, the court of equity in this case of cooperation between capital, management, and labor, is nothing else than the great American people, who—after hearing the case—form public opinion, which is the decree of equity. Public opinion, with the power of the American public back of it, can and will enforce its decrees upon any group of people.

THE IMPORTANCE OF LABOR

"He who comes into equity must do so with clean hands"—which means to me that neither capital and management, on the one hand, nor labor, on the other, can expect to get into equity unless its hands are clean. Then when capital and management and labor find themselves before the court of equity they must follow another cardinal rule, which is that "He who asks equity, must do equity."

I believe a small portion of labor and a small portion of capital have been wrong most of the time. But I also believe most of labor and most of capital have endeavored to cooperate most of the time. There is no reason why most of labor and most of capital should not cooperate all the time, if they understand each other thoroughly and completely and each knows that the other is thinking straight, playing the game on the square, and only wants equity—its "just due."

That labor is a dignified and honorable calling will not be disputed by any fair-thinking person. Our great President, Abraham Lincoln, accepted honorary membership in the Workingmen's Association of New York on March 21, 1864, and stated to the committee:

"The honorary membership in your association, as generously tendered, is gratefully accepted."

Then this great man of humility, with malice toward none and charity for all, gave labor a rating of honor and dignity in his speech to them, partly as follows:

"Labor is prior to, and independent, of, capital. Capital is only the fruit of labor, and could never have existed if labor had not first existed. * * * Capital has its rights, which are as worthy of protection as any other rights. Nor is it denied that there is, and probably always will be, a relation between capital and labor, producing mutual benefits. * * * Again, as has already been said, there is not, of necessity, any such thing as the free hired laborer being fixed to that condition for life. Many independent men everywhere in these States, a few years back in their lives, were hired laborers. The prudent penniless beginner in the world labors for wages for a while, saves his surplus with which to buy tools or land for himself, then labors on his own account another while, and at length hires another new beginner to help him. This is the just and generous and prosperous system which opens the way to all—gives hope to all, and consequent energy and progress, and improvement of condition to all. No men living are more worthy to be trusted than those who toil up from poverty—none less inclined to take or touch aught which they have not honestly earned. * * * The strongest bond of human sympathy, outside of the family relation, should be one uniting all working people. * * * Nor should this lead to a war upon property or the owners of property."

And still quoting Lincoln in the same speech to labor:

"Property is the fruit of labor; property is desirable; is a positive good in the world. That some should be rich shows that others may become rich, and hence is just encouragement to industry and enterprise. Let not him who is houseless pull down the house of another, but let him work diligently and build one for himself, thus by example assuring that his own shall be safe from violence when built."

CAPITAL AND MANAGEMENT

Now so much in commendation of labor, and we can turn to a little commendation of capital and management—because, after all, there are thousands of men called captains of industry who, by their life's work, have demonstrated their love of their fellow men and a square deal in their belief. We must remember that our American justice is presumed to rest on the theory that it is better that a hundred guilty men should escape than one innocent man should be punished.

So why should all of labor or all of capital be punished for the sins of a few?

Man can only be custodian of funds. He can only eat so much a day and sleep in a single place at one time and all of those who have accumulated wealth through our free-enterprise system have found that the very plan of life—brief as it is—makes them custodians of funds in an involuntary trusteeship or stewardship. Hundreds of them have spent a large part of their lifetimes trying to make comfortable jobs that give a satisfactory living standard to the men working for them or for the company they represent.

The Rockefeller interests have spent hundreds of millions of dollars in creating jobs for and to benefit mankind through research and other fields. Endicott Johnson have created thousands of good jobs and used their money wisely for the benefit of the people. George Eastman, and many others, gave a substantial part of their wealth to the benefit of mankind. B. Altman, right in this city of New York, gave his store to those who helped him build his business.

I could go on with hundreds of others who have done likewise—but there are so many known cases it seems unnecessary to cite them to prove my conviction that most successful men recognize they can only be custodians of funds in the interest of others.

If this be true, as I believe the records prove, then both sides have much to be said in their favor and little to be said against them. Jobs must either come from the use of private capital or from the use of public funds—and from what I know of the history of the world, I have no hesitation in saying I would rather see funds to create jobs handled by private individuals who created the funds, than by politicians who frequently use funds for a short period of time without the responsibility of having created those funds themselves. The individual who created the funds lives with the job he is doing until he gets his "final summons." The politician frequently has a short tenure of office and regardless of his sincerity, does not have that continuing responsibility.

A MUTUALITY OF INTEREST

This means to me that the important problem lying in front of both sides of industry is adopting a policy that is founded upon true mutuality and then working to create the patience and tolerance that are necessary to find the truth and solve the problem on the basis of equity for all. The interested parties in this discussion are so interwoven in their relationship that their objectives must be the same, if either or both are to be satisfied with the results achieved.

I believe capital and management have been wrong many times in assuming that labor in the past has been happy, when it was dissatisfied. This reminds me of a little story of a Negro circuit preacher who was just closing his year with the congregation. He liked his pulpit and his comfortable little home, and the only way he could remain there another year as the pastor of the church was by having the congregation vote that they wished to keep him. So on the last Sunday of the year he said:

"Brethren and sisters, dis am the last Sabbath in the year, and I must move on unless you vote that you wants me as your pa'son for another year. All those in favor of me remaining for another year, please raise their right hand."

Not a hand went up.

"All right, brethren and sisters, all those in favor of me remaining another year will signify by saying 'Aye'."

Not an "Aye" was heard. Whereupon the parson said:

"Thank you all, very much, brethren and sisters. I's your pa'son for another year, because silence gives consent."

SOME RECOMMENDATIONS FOR MANAGEMENT

I believe a great many of the troubles of the past have come through the assumption that silence gives consent. Therefore, I recommend that every manufacturer who is interested in the continuance of our enterprise system and our form of government make it his business in the future to do the following things:

1. Regardless of fine wages, working hours and other conditions—wherever the size of the company permits, see that at least once a year all the employees of the company have a chance to look at you or some of the upper officers to see that you do not have horns. In large companies, I recommend the heads of the subsidiaries or plant divisions carry this policy into effect.

In our company we feel this contact—meeting the men face to face and showing them we are human beings—is one of the important contributing factors to the fine understanding between the management and the employees. This is illustrated by comments individually made by workingmen in one of our plants following a meeting at which several of the officers of our company attended. Here are some of those comments:

J. H. said: "Enjoyed the talk and can see that he (Mr. HAWKES) is as interested in the workingman as in the rich man. Every man I spoke to enjoyed the talk and the party. These men came to us as perfect strangers and in no time at all we saw they were just one of us."

T. H. said: "I was afraid to meet Mr. HAWKES and the other officials. I thought Mr. HAWKES was very tall and fat. After I saw them I enjoyed being around them. They are just regular men like you and me."

E. M. said: "I figured he would come down, say his speech, hello, and get the hell out. Sure surprised me."

J. R. said: "'Would like to have his salary (referring to Mr. HAWKES), but not his job. Guys like him work too hard."

These remarks show that the men had a fine, friendly feeling toward the management after a personal visit and enjoyable little party.

2. If your company policies do not square with the progress of human relationship in this country, then square them as far as is possible, based on sound economics, and make it your business to see that your men understand them.

3. Don't mislead your employees by bidding for popularity through doing the unusual or economically unsound thing which cannot last and which damages not only the company that tries it but all industry, because human beings still relate and compare what happens to their neighbors with what happens to them.

4. Be sure that no superintendent, foreman, subforeman, or supervisor attempts to be sharp or shrewd in dealing with the manpower of the company.

5. Be certain that no man between you and the men down the line breaks the chain because he misunderstands the company's policy or fails to carry through the instructions of management.

6. The definition of a corporation in the past has been, "An invisible, intangible being, existing only in contemplation of law, without heart and without soul." We must prove that a corporation can have the equivalent of a heart and soul and that the representatives employed to direct its affairs serve as an agency of human beings—if it is to remain a useful agency for the conduct of business.

7. Have your men in the plant understand that the laborer of today is the potential capitalist of tomorrow. That his interests of tomorrow may be identical with others of today, and his acts of today should be so measured that he will be willing to have similar acts from others tomorrow.

One of the most interesting experiences the management of our company has had was when we raised wages at a crucial time, the men—of their own volition—sent a committee to the superintendent to inquire if the company could afford to raise wages, in view of competition, low prices, and lesser volume of business.

Think of this interest in the welfare of the company of which they were a part.

WHERE INDUSTRY CAN SERVE

Industrial management should support the fine movements for the dissemination of correct information regarding our free-enterprise system to the youth of America. The junior achievement movement I believe justifies our support. The plan back of the Institute for Industrial Progress was most excellent. The general educational plans of intelligent, farsighted business managements in training and educating superintendents, foremen, and the men in their plants all contribute a great deal toward this end.

The fine women of this country can play a most important part in backing up industry and business if they (the women) are convinced industry and business are operating along fair and sound lines. Most of those who know about the businesses in which their husbands are engaged believe in the fairness of those particular institutions—whereas, not knowing about other businesses, they frequently are in doubt about them—and being in doubt, are not good sponsors for them.

This avenue, I believe, offers one of the most valuable and hopeful opportunities available to us to bring the truth home to a very large percentage of the population. Women train the minds of youth, and youth of today will be our industry and business of tomorrow.

To keep the Government from stepping into business further than necessary or desired, men must be able to do things by themselves as well as or better than the Government can do those things for them. If men can do the job and labor and capital will cooperate, understand, and respect each other, their combined power will keep government where its founders deemed it could serve its people best. And further, their combined strength will remove from the statute books any bad laws that have been put there and will keep from enactment further bad laws that are incubated in the minds of politicians.

POINTS TO REMEMBER

Remember, next to wages, labor is interested in regular work on a permanent job. Management should endeavor to work out such a system to accomplish this, but that system must square with sound economics or it will fail.

Remember, giving labor its just due in wages and working conditions will increase labor's determination to work, rather than to be satisfied with relief or relief work.

Remember—workingmen standing with the management, will resent the acts of any outside agency or laws that injure business, because they will understand such things injure their interests also. When such understanding arrives, bad laws will be promptly corrected or repealed.

Remember—your men should thoroughly understand your company policies, principles, and objectives—don't leave anything to silence.

Remember—the local community should understand your company principles, policies, and objectives—and, understanding them, should vote the company a good citizen.

Remember—faith, confidence, and mutual respect must be in the picture with good practices. "Faith begets faith"—and confidence begets confidence. Both lead to mutual respect.

Remember—sharp practice anywhere along the line helps destroy faith, confidence, and equity.

Remember—the public is equity's court—and public opinion is equity's decree.

Remember—labor and capital make industry, and with either one removed there is no industry.

Remember—Government only derives its just power from the consent of the governed—and, after all, it is nothing but a creature of the people, unless it gets out of hand and through force becomes the master of the people.

SIGHT BEING RESTORED

Two verses from the Bible are at this time worthy of consideration by both labor and capital—quoting from St. Luke, chapter 6:

"And why beholdest thou the mote that is in thy brother's eye, but perceivest not the beam that is in thine own eye?"

And then again this great question:

"Can the blind lead the blind? Shall they not both fall into the ditch?"

My answer is—the blind on both sides are coming into sight and have already begun to read the decrees of equity on the wall of public opinion. Hence, each with sight and patience can help both to keep out of the ditch. The National Association of Manufacturers and other vital organizations are helping tremendously to restore this sight, and labor and capital are showing daily evidence of their appreciation of the necessity of choosing good leaders who believe in law and order.

"He who comes into equity, must do so with clean hands," and "He who asks equity, must do equity." If understanding cooperation is accomplished between labor and capital—I predict both labor and capital will appreciate that no one-sided law can long bring benefits to the side it favors, because that is not equity.

If the President of the United States believes that the great majority of labor is understanding and trying to do equity, and that the great majority of the captains of industry are cooperating and trying to do equity, then I believe a definite and direct word from him to this effect would be most helpful to the country right now.

In closing let me urge that we all join in fervently expressing the hope that the days to come will justify man's faith in his fellowbeings. That his intelligence, industry, and goodness of heart will prevail over the destructive forces that have threatened his civilization. That he will come to the realization that but one heart beats for all, and that mutual love, respect, and understanding will make "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," a glowing reality.

The Pulp Production in the United States and Imports

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. REID F. MURRAY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 6, 1948

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the production of newsprint in the United States was shown in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of August 4, 1948. This record shows that of the newsprint used in the United States in 1948, 82 percent of it was imported and 18 percent produced in the United States.

The United States production and importation is opposite to the newsprint situation. The following official table shows that about 80 percent of the wood pulp used in the United States is produced in the United States:

United States production and general imports of wood pulp, 1930–48

Address by Governor Green, of Illinois, at Annual Encampment of One Hundred and Ninth Antiaircraft Artillery Brigade

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. C. WAYLAND BROOKS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 6 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. President, approximately 1,100 civilian soldiers, members of the One Hundred and Ninth Antiaircraft Artillery Brigade, Illinois National Guard, participated in their annual encampment at Fort Sheridan, Ill., beginning July 24.

The brigade under the leadership of Brig. Gen. Julius Klein, at the Governor's Day ceremonies on August 4, was lauded by the Hon. Dwight H. Green, Governor of Illinois, as one of the outstanding organizations in the Illinois National Guard.

I ask unanimous consent that the Governor's address may be printed in the Appendix.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The opportunity afforded me today to visit with the officers and enlisted men of the antiaircraft artillery branch of the Illinois

National Guard is one that I deeply appreciate.

I am only sorry that all of the citizens of our great State could not join with me in reviewing the training program that you have undertaken at your summer camp here at Fort Sheridan.

The new Illinois National Guard is scarcely 2 years old, yet the rapid progress that has been made in its reorganization already has established it as the greatest in the history of our State.

The troops of the Thirty-third Division and other organizations of the Illinois National Guard in their summer training installation at Camp Ellis, like those stationed here, have made a most favorable impression and they have exhibited real enthusiasm. It is a very healthy sign that although many of you are somewhat new at the business of being soldiers—you are willing and anxious to do your part toward learning your job and making your unit one of the best in the National Guard.

Illinois now ranks second in strength of all the States and Territories and this reflects the untiring, unselfish, and patriotic effort of all the fine officers here today as well as the enlisted men who make up the Illinois National Guard.

When the Illinois National Guard was inducted into Federal service prior to World War II, more than 7 years ago, approximately 10,000 officers and enlisted men were members of the guard. Now our strength already has exceeded the 19,000 mark and during June it was necessary to halt enlistments to keep Illinois within the strength ceiling established by the War Department.

The people of Illinois are proud of the achievements of their Illinois National Guard both in times of peace as well as in time of war. The history of the National Guard dates back to the years before our State was admitted to the Union. In those days the pioneers banded together in militia units to protect themselves from marauding bands of Indians.

In World Wars I and II the history of Illinois troops of the National Guard was one of brilliant performances on the field of combat.

Many of you men here today are getting your first taste of military life. It is to you that Illinois looks now to carry on the traditions of honor and service that are the proud heritage of Illinois soldiers.

Modern warfare has developed new weapons—jet-propelled planes, buzz bombs, and the atomic bomb. The speed with which modern aircraft travel has reduced the size of the earth to the extent that now there is no point in the world more than 48 hours air distance from Chicago.

Thus, you men of the One Hundred and Ninth Antiaircraft Artillery Brigade are training for one of the most important assignments that it would be possible to receive in event of future conflict. Your ultimate objective at this training camp and in your training hours through the year is to function as a team in the accomplishment of the destruction of enemy aircraft, should that mission ever be assigned to you.

As members of the Illinois National Guard you men form a major bulwark of our national security.

When the first steps were taken to reorganize the Illinois National Guard, I as Governor, insisted that the officers to be commissioned be the highest type of men available.

I demanded that the sole basis on which commissions were to be granted would be previous military training and proven efficiency. Those qualifications have been followed in the reorganization program and I feel that they have paid dividends in the form of steady progress.

With Major General Boyle serving as adjutant general, the pioneer work of the guard's reorganization was ably directed by its first commanding officer, Lieutenant General Haffner. His capable successor, Major General Teece, with the fine cooperation of every officer and enlisted man in the guard, has carried the program forward rapidly until it has produced the results we have seen today. This brigade has made marked progress under the leadership of General Klein who is a veteran in Illinois National Guard service.

The State of Illinois will continue to demand that its National Guard shall have the finest officers and best enlisted men. We want you to have the most modern equipment and the most competent instruction in up-to-date military tactics that it is possible to provide.

Many of the units of this antiaircraft artillery brigade are in urgent need of additional armory facilities and it is my hope that the State of Illinois eventually will be able to provide each unit of the National Guard with the necessary armory facilities.

The Illinois Armory Board's construction program was delayed during the war years by the restrictions placed upon all types of building in favor of the war effort. In recent months it was further delayed by a test case in the Illinois Supreme Court. The supreme court, as you all know, in a recent opinion upheld the powers and authority of the armory board. On that basis I am hopeful that immediate action will be forthcoming on the construction program.

Meanwhile it is up to you officers and enlisted men to continue to carry on your duties in the same high spirit of cooperation that has always made the Illinois National Guard the most outstanding in the Nation.

Double Talk

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD KNUTSON

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, President Truman received his political education in the Pendergast political university and he learned his lessons well, as is attested by his recent radio talk to the Nation when be blamed the Republicans for all the ills that were created by the New Deal.

President Truman's political fortunes had struck a new low and it was necessary to do something about it. Utterly ignoring the fact that he has full authority to act in the inflationary crisis, through which we are passing, he called Congress together in extraordinary session to give him yet more powers. It is reasonable to ask, Why does not he use the powers he now has to check the upward price spiral?

The New Deal is responsible for every contributory factor to the inflation which now afflicts the country, but the people do not know this. Many feel that Congress should give him yet greater powers, which are not necessary, to bring the situation under control.

One of the many who heard his radio talk on inflation wrote me and demanded that Congress do something about the high cost of living. Based upon the President's radio address on the subject, her demand was logical and reasonable. Unfortunately, she did not have all the facts.

I am today writing this constituent and giving her the real facts. For obvious reasons I do not use her name. Her letter follows:

COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., August 6, 1948.

DEAR MADAM: I have read your letter with every sympathy, and am in complete agreement that everything possible should be done to put this inflation into reverse. That is also the attitude of this Congress. Unfortunately, it is not a simple matter to do so.

Under the New Deal our circulation of currency has increased from less than $6,000,000,000 to $28,000,000,000—nearly 500 percent. As the volume of money increased the demand for everything else also increased proportionately. Inflation is caused almost altogether by too much money and too little available of what we need.

Mr. Truman is certainly in no position to complain as he is largely responsible for our present plight. Although we have been unable to get definite figures, we all know that enormous quantities of our production are going abroad when such production is needed at home. That has also helped to create inflated prices. To make matters worse, per capita production in this country is steadily going down. Then we must not forget the repeated wage increases, all of which have to be paid by the consumer.

I have pointed out the large exports which have been made. During the past 2 years the Truman administration has sent nearly 1,200,000,000 bushels of grain principally to European countries. The purpose of these shipments was to help feed starving people in war-torn areas. Grain in this country means an abundant supply of meat, dairy, and poultry products. When unusually large quantities of grain are taken out of the country, it can only mean shortages and higher prices for feed to livestock, and higher prices to the consumers. That is what has happened to us. I might also state that during the past 2 years tremendous amounts of meat, dairy, and poultry products have been shipped out of the country, which has had its effect upon our price levels.

While we are anxious to help feed hungry people, we must not overlook the fact that causing shortages in this country is a primary factor which brings about the inflationary prices for essential food items.

I am personally doing everything that I can to encourage increased production of food and other necessities so as to create an abundance in this country and lower prices to American consumers.

I am told that local plasterers are receiving $30 a day, plus $2 travel pay. Bricklayers, carpenters, and masons are drawing proportionate wage scales. Do you wonder that there is a housing shortage? A person of ordinary means cannot afford to build at those prices.

Another important item in the cost of living, second only to labor, is the burdensome war taxes which must be continued because of the President's profligate spending. Economists estimate the cost at 30 percent of what we buy.

We are told that OPA should be restored. Can it be that the American people have so soon forgotten what happened under OPA? We couldn't get meat, butter, eggs, sugar, and many other necessities, except in the black market, but the President very conveniently forgot to mention all of these things in his radio talk. He didn't tell his hearers that he himself removed the ceiling price on meats because he recognized it was unworkable.

You will recall that last winter the price index took a sudden and violent drop which threw the President and his advisers into a ditter. They feared that if the downward trend was not checked it would bring on another recession so they hurried to Congress and asked for legislation to hold the price line. President Truman also conveniently forgot this incident in his radio talk.

In 2 months I will be 68 years old but I cannot recall ever having seen such chaotic conditions under Republican rule and I am sure you cannot remember anything like it. It always happens when the Democrats are in and they usually manage to get us in a war for good measure. Then people talk about voting the Democratic ticket. It is beyond my understanding.

The President now has the power to act if he will but declare an emergency. This he does not want to do on the eve of an election, because he lacks the nerve to do the things that are necessary. If he is reelected we can only conclude that the people are satisfied with the way things are going under his guidance. How can we expect very much from a man who didn't have the foresight to secure a corridor to and from Berlin, and it is well within the range of possibility that his folly and failure may force us into another war.

I am indeed sorry to hear that the situation in the St. Cloud trailer camps has not improved. I visited the camps a year or two ago in company with Mrs. C. H. Tanner and Mrs. Harry B. Clark, and at that time wired the Federal Public Housing Authority to improve the conditions existing there. It is my recollection that the city of St. Cloud fixes the rentals at the two camps. I suggest that you check on that. It is also my recollecion that at that time we secured a reduction in rent from $23 to $18 per month, which was to include water and electricity for lighting. I was also promised that the trailers would be winterized.

I trust you will pardon the length of this letter, but long as it is I could have said a great deal more.

With best wishes, I am,

Yours very truly.

I. G. Farben Nazis Must Not Regain Power

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE G. SADOWSKI

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 6, 1948

Mr. SADOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, recently a few of the German warmakers who put Hitler in power were found guilty of minor offenses and received light sentences. These evil men who have caused so much trouble in the world and are responsible for the killing of millions of people must never be returned to power again. This pledge, we the people of the United States, through our great President Franklin D. Roosevelt, made to all the people of the world while we were engaged in World War II. We as Americans are bound to keep this pledge that we made to the people of the world who suffered so much during the war, or we shall be regarded by them with fear and suspicion. Our future policy toward these German cartellists is the yardstick by which we will measure the number of friends and allies that we shall have. It is the yardstick which shall determine whether there will be peace or war.

At this time I wish to include an article which appeared in Labor, Saturday, August 7, 1948. Labor is a national weekly newspaper owned by 15 recognized standard railroad labor organizations, and is their official Washington weekly newspaper.

COURT CONVICTS FARBEN AND KRUPP MAGNATES OF PLUNDER AND MASS MURDER

Some of the big German industrialists who put Hitler in power were sentenced to prison this week by an American military court at Nurnberg, Germany.

Alfred Krupp, head of the giant Krupp steel and armament works, got 12 years, and 10 of that concern's directors received terms ranging down to 34 months.

Thirteen top officials of I. G. Farben, vast German chemical combine, were handed prison sentences of 18 months to 8 years.

They were convicted of plundering factories in countries conquered by the Nazis, and of abusing and murdering "slave workers" dragged from those countries to toil in the Krupp and Farben plants. The evidence presented against them is horrifying, but too detailed to go into here.

MAY COST US DEARLY

The average American will say: "Well, that's that." Unfortunately this may not be the end of the story. It may have future chapters which, like its past ones, will affect Americans and cost them dearly.

After the First World War, nothing was done to curb the big German industrialists and financiers who supported, and were part of, the Kaiser's militarist machine. As a result, they kept their power, and joined American, British, and other foreign big business in international cartels. Thus they acquired powerful friends in the United States and elsewhere.

These friends helped the German industrialists and financiers arm the Nazis and put Hitler in power, just as they had previously aided Mussolini. They liked the way the German and Italian dictators "put labor unions in their place."

The result of all this was the Second World War, which cost the American people 350,000 dead, a million wounded, and a national debt of nearly $300,000,000,000.

SAME STORY AGAIN?

Is the same story being repeated after the Second World War, at risk of a third conflict? Are American, British and other big business interests again protecting their German friends, and secretly reestablishing the international Cartel Trusts?

No one can prove that yet, but there is reason to fear it is going on. The evidence is being more frankly discussed in some other countries than in the United States.

For example, a Canadian newspaper recently published an article asserting that the members of the American military court, which tried the Farben and Krupp magnates, were picked by Howard Pederson, now Assistant Secretary of the Army, but formerly with Sullivan and Cromwell, a big Wall Street law firm which handled business for German industrialists and financiers.

LOOKED LIKE STALLING

The history of the Farben and Krupp trials looks like a deliberate scheme to "stall" until public opinion cooled off, and comparatively light sentences could be handed out.

At first, the trials were blocked by British interests. Then the American court took over, and has been dawdling along for more than 2 years.

In the end, it gave the German industrialists far lighter punishment than was meted out to the men they put in power. Not long after the war was over a dozen top Nazis and German military officers were sentenced to death, and a dozen others to life in prison.

Socialized Medicine Approved by Democrats

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the cat is out of the bag. President Truman and the New Deal want to impose a program of socialized medicine upon the American people. In his message to Congress on July 27 he recommended a comprehensive health program based on health insurance. That sounds very innocent, Mr. Speaker, because everybody is interested in health and insurance, but is it as innocent as it looks? I don't think so.

Now to get behind the real meaning of his language we have to go back to his message of February 7, 1948. Then he said, "Our ultimate aim must be a comprehensive insurance system to protect all our people equally against insecurity and ill health." When he seeks to protect "all our people," he is saying that "all our people" will be forced to take this service. This is absolutely a scheme to compel the people of this country to be subjected to a program of socialized medicine. It would be administered by Washington bureaucrats and will cost the taxpayers billions of dollars every year.

Mr. Speaker, Governor Dewey is opposed to this scheme of socialized medicine, which is a Socialist doctrine. Recently he said:

> This idea which has been shared by the last two occupants of the White House that you can improve medical care by passing a law must be stopped. We must get vast broad educational ideas to the people as to the quality of care that now exists and, as to a greater program that is going forward by men of medicine, we must have a program all can take a share in. Let's get some good public-relations men and get the businessman to do his share and get the lawyers and the labor leaders and everybody else. They are the ones who will lose most of all, if freedom in medicine is ever lost.

The issue between the two major candidates for President of the United States is clear and clean cut. Mr. Truman believes as an ultimate aim there must be a compulsory comprehensive insurance system to apply to all our people. Governor Dewey believes that compulsory socialized medicine is no good. For my part, I believe that the position of the Republican candidate, Governor Dewey, is sound, backed up by theory and experience. I believe the ideas of the Democratic candidate, President Truman, are a distinct threat to the medical and allied professions as we now know them and to our American way of life.

The advances in public health in the United States already may show that our basic institutions are sound. Existing shortcomings—and some are admitted—can be corrected within the framework of our time-tried, time-tested system of nonpolitical medicine. Relying in the future, as in the past, mainly upon individual initiative and personal cooperation, we may reasonably expect the health of the people of the United States to continue to improve.

Address of Mrs. Charles W. Tillett, Vice Chairman, Democratic National Committee, at Democratic National Convention, Philadelphia, Pa.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HELEN GAHAGAN DOUGLAS
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 6, 1948

Mrs. DOUGLAS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by Mrs. Charles W. Tillett, vice chairman, Democratic National Committee, made at the Democratic National Convention, Philadelphia, Pa., Tuesday afternoon, July 13, 1948:

Four years ago I was honored to address your great convention in Chicago.

The war was still going on. I said then that the women of America had pledged their unwavering support until victory should be achieved.

That pledge was made good. The women of America were steadfast to the end.

They worked, they suffered, they sacrificed. But for their sacrifice they now demand a just return. They want their coin in human good.

I tell you now that the women of America say: "Give us peace. Give us the peace for which we sacrificed. Give us a peace that will endure."

In the villages, the towns, the cities of this country our boys are still coming back home. I have stood in the railroad station of my town and have seen many simple shipping cases resting there, draped with American flags. I have known that each of these flags covered the hopes, the affections, the ambitions, and the sacrifices of some mother, some wife, a sister, a father, or a brother.

These scenes have intensified for me, as I know that similar scenes have made real for you, the knowledge that the supreme duty of our country is to lead the world to lasting peace.

This is the highest concern of our time. It must be the highest concern of this convention.

The United Nations conference occurred at San Francisco in 1945. It was held as the result of the unfaltering determination of that inspiring leader in peace, that courageous leader in war, that enlightened statesman of the world, Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

The great international principles that came out of that conference have moulded our common thinking, and their blessings have been shared by all, regardless of party. The last speech that President Roosevelt wrote before his death, the one that he prepared but did not deliver, concluded with a stirring call that all Americans dedicate themselves to the cause of abiding peace.

There is one American known to us all who has responded to that call with all of his body, mind and soul. I refer to that courageous, determined and faithful servant of the people, President Harry S. Truman.

President Truman has sounded the call that President Roosevelt issued across this entire land. He has worked with ceaseless devotion to repay our debt to our God, to our dead, and to our children.

"Our goal," he has said, "must be—not peace in our time—but peace for all time."

Helping President Truman, as his strong right arm, is that dedicated American who was the organizer of victory over the Axis powers, and who is now the organizer for the whole world of recovery and peace, Secretary of State George C. Marshall.

President Truman has continuously placed the power of his great office behind the United Nations. He has established as the cornerstone of his foreign policy support of that great organization. He knows, as you and I know, that the peace that will endure, the peace that will ease the terror which is in the breast of every woman that her boy will be called to war and killed—that peace will be based on the justice that comes out of consultation and agreement.

Women have learned many things about peace since the writing of the United Nations Charter. They know that we must not be gadget-minded about world peace. The Charter is not something that, when wound up, can be left to do the job alone. Congress must support it as well as the President. But with Republicans in control of Congress, the country never knows, nor is the world ever sure, that Presidential leadership in support of a peaceful solution of world problems will be implemented by congressional action. I remind you that once before, under a Democratic administration, an organization was put underway for world peace, but was frustrated by what the Republicans did.

Three weeks ago, in this very hall, there was a proposal that the Republicans include in their platform a bold and challanging statement. It was proposed that their platform assert that they would implement with appropriations any international commitment made by legislative enactment. But isolationist Members of Congress who were powerful in that Republican convention would not tolerate such a pronouncement. The statement was cut from the platform. Notice was thereby served on the country and the world that Republicans reserve the right to promise internationally with one breath and repudiate internationally with the next.

The American woman is not so uniformed on world affairs that she does not know that an acute area of world tension relates to international trade. If any problem ever needed a peaceful settlement, this one does. Congress has appropriated billions to stimulate European recovery so that European nations can enter the field of international trade, but that same Republican-dominated Congress has refused to do more than grudgingly and half-heartedly extended for 1 year, and with crippling amendments, the laws authorizing reciprocal trade agreements. But support of the United Nations requires support of trade agreements. Without them the European recovery program is bound to fail. We are a Nation that accepts our responsibilities and discharges our obligations. We must put a Congress in office that will make reciprocal trade agreements, that are enlightened and just, a permanent fixture in world affairs. In that way, and only in that way, can we bring to pass the vision of peace created by our brave, noble, and beloved elder statesman Cordell Hull.

The United States is the home of the United Nations. We must give this organization the understanding and devotion that future generations demand of us. The despair and devastation of a weary world must hold us to our course. It is a solemn obligation. And yet, just a few weeks ago, Republican Speaker MARTIN, of the House of Representatives, declined to allow the House to vote on the proposition to lend the United Nations the necessary dollars to build their much-needed permanent home in New York. As late as 3 a. m. on the day the Congress adjourned Democratic Representative SOL BLOOM was pleading with Speaker MARTIN to relent, but he held firm until the bitter end. His stand was endorsed by other powerful Republican leaders. This action on the part of Republican congressional leadership has placed in danger the continuance of this country as the permanent home of the United Nations.

I ask you to remember, please, that the Speaker of the House of Representatives who did this was the same MARTIN, of the famous Martin, Barton, and Fish, who, in President Roosevelt's time, were playing politics with our national security. President Roosevelt, in his famous Madison Square Garden speech, charged and proved that, in a world that had been moving swiftly toward war, this trio had deliberately blocked the rearming of America by their votes and by every other means at their command. We cannot allow such men any longer to control the destinies of America and the world.

Women support the Marshall plan. They know that it is the plan by which American dollars are to be used to enable the democracies of western Europe to regain their hold on hope and faith. They know that the mere promise and expectation of Marshall aid has saved these democracies from being pulled into the awful mire of Communist totalitarianism. Congress solemnly adopted this plan as a dynamic instrument of national policy. The time came to appropriate the necessary dollars. But the House of Representatives attempted to cut so much from the funds needed that the plan, instead of being a means to place Europe on its industrial feet, would have been little more than charity and a hand-out. This was an outrageous breach of faith. It was done under the leadership of the Republican chairman of the Appropriations Committee. We cannot allow to remain in this powerful position a man who is so grasping to save a dollar that he will risk Russia overrunning the democracies of Asia and western Europe, the commencement of a third world war, and the atomic destruction of the world.

The nomination of Mr. Dewey was accomplished by the support of some of the most dangerous isolationists in Congress. One of them, Representative HALLECK, the man who turned the tide by swinging Indiana's 29 votes to him, has this incredible record: He voted against the repeal of the arms embargo; against selective service in 1940; against its extension a year later; against lend-lease; against arming American merchant ships; against the British loan; against reciprocal trade treaties; in favor of cutting a billion or so from the European recovery appropriation. Had this Republican king-maker's will prevailed, the British would have had no American planes or arms to resist Hitler, and America would have had no army when the Japs attacked us at Pearl Harbor; we would not have given lend-lease to our allies, the British would be bankrupt and the current effort to put the European democracies on their feet would be doomed to failure. This is one of the men who is counting on the success of Mr. Dewey in November, because he would then be controlling in the councils of the Nation. I hold that women must fight such a catastrophe with all the power they possess.

I know women and I know that the women of America believe in the purposes and principles of the World Health Organization. It was conceived at the San Francisco Conference and founded more than a year ago. The joint resolution designed to bring our country into this organization was kept from the floor of the House of Representatives by the powerful Rules Committee for many months. The Republican chairman of that committee, when urged to release the measure and give the House a chance to vote on it, cynically replied that he was sorry for the poor children who were sick, but he did not think their condition was our responsibility. More important than those sick children, he said, was the necessity for a cut in taxes. Such cynical isolationism in the atomic age is cruelly reckless of the humane hopes of women for progress in America and peace in the world.

In all of this I do not fail to recognize the splendid service to the cause of the United Nations that has been rendered by many individual Republicans. But neither they, nor anyone else, can deny that the story of the betrayal by many powerful Republicans of the cause of international cooperation leads inescapably to this one conclusion—internationally the Republican Party cannot be counted on. Their support is shifting and fugitive. When any important question of international cooperation is up for decision, we are filled with anxiety and apprehension. Republican support in such matters each time depends wholly on chance; on what man happens to be in charge of what matter when the subject of world affairs is presented.

I do not believe that the women of this country will be willing to make Republican isolationists the guardians of the peace.

Notwithstanding the utterly predictable course that many powerful Republicans have followed, the result of President Truman's policy to support the United Nations has borne much fruit. Many times in the last 3 years the United Nations has brought about peaceful settlements as substitutes for wars.

First. The Soviet Union was induced to withdraw its troops from Iran.

Second. The British and French were induced to withdraw their troops from Syria and Lebanon.

Then the political independence and the territorial integrity of Greece were aided.

And a truly great piece of work was done in Indonesia. War had been under way between the Dutch and the Indonesians. The Security Council, acting under the peaceful settlements section of the Charter, was able to obtain a truce. Through the splendid work of a good offices committee, composed of one member from Australia, one from Belgium, and the chairman from the United States, 18 principles to guide the setting up of the United States of Indonesia were agreed upon. These 18 principles provided for self-determination, civil liberties, free elections, and a constitutional convention for the organization of a free and independent United States of Indonesia with representation based upon population.

Thus a war has been stopped and progress is now being made toward a peaceful solution of the Indonesian controversy.

Had the peaceful settlements machinery of the United Nations not been available for this Indonesian controversy, a war which was then going on could easily have spread around the entire globe.

These are but a few of the peaceful settlements that the United Nations has been able to accomplish, supported always by the powerful influence of our Government and President Truman.

The plain design and objective of the United Nations, and of our Government in supporting it, is not so much to maintain peace by force as it is to build peace by eliminating those strains and tensions of the world that can result in war if not relieved.

During the 3 years since hostilities ceased, more instruments for constructive international cooperation have been built than ever before in the history of the world. During the present 12 months through which we are now living, this network of international organizations will bring together, in sincere and constructive conference, representatives of the governments of the world at more than 2,500 meetings. Out of these conferences and meetings I firmly believe there will occur the birth, and that there will develop the growth, of international confidence which in turn can produce a world community of real and enduring peace.

During the years that are just ahead the United Nations must have a support from the President and Congress of our country that is firm and constant. In that way, the foundations of a deep and lasting peace will be laid.

The commissions and organs of the United Nations are planning their work with statesmanship and insight.

The Commission on the Status of Women has adopted as its guiding principle that, in the world of today, women have a definite role to play in building a free, healthy, and moral society.

The International Labor Organization is pledged to the improvement of conditions, life, and opportunities of workers all over the world.

The Food and Agriculture Organization has set as its objective increasing the production of food, the raising of nutrition standards, and the betterment of rural conditions everywhere.

The World Health Organization has declared that there shall be extended the benefits of modern medical knowledge and the highest standards of health to all peoples everywhere.

The Human Rights Commission has drafted a declaration to secure basic rights to each individual member of the great human family. This has been done under the leadership of a great American woman, the first woman of the world today, Eleanor Roosevelt.

Women want peace. But women know that we cannot have peace by just wanting it.

Peace must be planned.

Peace must be constructed.

The ideals of the United Nations must be translated into achievement by action. Action that is bold, gallant, and unwavering.

That is the kind of action President Roosevelt gave to the world yesterday.

That is the kind of action President Truman is giving to the world today.

That is the kind of action the Democratic Party will give to the world tomorrow when, in November, the voters of this country give to it the power and responsibility of victory.

"A Little White House"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BERTRAND W. GEARHART

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 26, 1948

Mr. GEARHART. Mr. Speaker, in the hope of securing the unanimous support of the membership of each of the major political parties, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GREGORY] and I have introduced companion bills, identical in form, the enactment of either of which would provide an official residence in the District of Columbia for the Vice President of the United States. The bills have been popularly referred to as the little White House bills.

Among the great newspapers of the country which have editorially endorsed this proposal, as contained in the bills, is the Evening Star, of Washington, D. C. In an able and most persuasive editorial, this metropolitan daily, in its issue of August 5, 1948, expressed its approval in the following words:

A "LITTLE WHITE HOUSE"?

There is a lot of merit in the Gearhart-Gregory proposal to establish an official "Little White House" for the Vice President. The idea is not a new one, of course, but the arguments in favor of it have grown with the years. The chances of adoption of the plan are probably better now than at any time in the past.

Although the latest move is bipartisan in nature, it undoubtedly was stimulated by the discussions during the Republican national convention about inadequacy of the salary paid Vice Presidents, and by Governor Dewey's suggestion that they be given greater powers. Governor Warren, the Republican Vice Presidential candidate, will suffer a salary cut of $5,000 a year if he is elected Vice President. Governor Dewey favors increasing the Vice President's pay from twenty to fifty thousand dollars a year and making the job vastly more important than it is now. He told reporters after the convention that, if elected, he would try to institute "historic" reforms in the Vice Presidency, with a view to relieving the President of many burdens. Under the Dewey program, the Vice President would be more of an "Assistant President" than the obscure official he has been too often in years past.

If this plan were to be carried out the proposals to raise the Vice President's salary and to provide him with an official residence in Washington would carry a great deal of weight. The Vice President really is a stand-by President. He should receive enough salary to enable him to live in a style befitting this high position. And it would not be overdoing things to relieve him of the task of house hunting by assuring him of a rent-free home for him and his family while he occupies the No. 2 executive office. If the special session cannot find time to consider the bills introduced by Representatives GEARHART and GREGORY the next Congress should give the matter earnest attention.

Mr. Speaker, echoing the sentiments of the Evening Star, another widely read newspaper, one which is also published in the city of Washington, added on the day following the support of its editorial columns, as follows:

A "LITTLE WHITE HOUSE"

Two Members of Congress, a Democrat from Kentucky and a Republican from California, home States of the two Vice Presidential nominees, are joint authors of a bill for an official residence for the Nation's No. 2 man.

It's a sound proposal—something that should have been done long ago.

California provides Governor Warren an official residence, and if he changes jobs as a result of the election he will take a lower salary when he comes to Washington. He shouldn't be expected to go house-hunting at the same time.

But while we're on the subject of housing, the little folks should not be overlooked, either. Congress should pass the Taft-Ellender-Wagner housing bill, too, but the voice of the real-estate lobby is louder than the voices of the little folks.

The Republicans and the Republic

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, as part of my remarks I am inserting a most interesting article which appears in Human Events for August 4, 1948, by Edna Lonigan. It will serve as a challenge to every Republican who is interested in maintaining free government in this country as opposed to socialism, communism, and statism.

THE REPUBLICANS AND THE REPUBLIC

(By Edna Lonigan)

President Truman has recalled Congress to present a program including Government provision of housing, Government control of education, and Government management of the national income through price control and rationing.

The President really crossed the Rubicon to socialism in his acceptance speech at Philadelphia, as Human Events pointed out in its issue of July 21. He there put himself at the head of a movement to set up a welfare state on the European model, in which all power is centered in the hands of a few, and the masses are kept quiescent by subsidies from the public treasury.

The question now is whether the Republicans will openly oppose the President's radical departure from American principles, or whether they will temporize with the idea that the state can bring gifts, and merely promise to spend moderately and administer it all much better.

Under the two-party system, if one major party turns Socialist, as the Democrats have done, then political contests tend to become a race between the two parties in the direction of state dictatorship.

Yet the system of providing welfare through Government aid to certain classes is not a success; it is a total failure. It has been tried many times in many places, and it has always lowered the well-being of the nation which tried it. In the United States this system would destroy our constitutional form of government, and substitute the continental form of democracy, in which embattled classes struggle to the death for control of an all-powerful government.

The Republican Party has not yet clearly revealed its position. Many Republican leaders do not understand the constitutional issue any better than does President Truman. Others know that the peculiar slant of written and spoken discussion over the last 16 years has badly fitted the voters to make intelligent choice. So there is real danger that we shall have no party to take a stand against the groups which are getting used to Government benefits. Then, like Europe, we shall have only a choice between two kinds of collectivism.

Liberalism in Europe did not die in battle. It was not treacherously stabbed in the back. It yielded to the vested interests which grew as Government spending grew. If the Republicans are to defend this country against the loss of liberty through Government benefits, they must do better than any party in Europe was able to do.

II

A nation is a tremendous river of people, pushing and forcing its way through time. It can wear down the hardest granite of cruel circumstance, only to be dispersed in mud and swamps, if the current of its life slows down. That has happened to both Germany and Britain.

As industrialism spread in Germany, in the nineteenth century, it brought a movement for political liberalism. Germany was moving toward limited government, free trade, and voluntary organization, on the then English model.

In the 1870's Bismarck adopted the German new deal policy, making the state responsible for the industrial masses, protecting them against fear and want. The only price the masses seemingly had to pay was to protect the Hohenzollern dynasty against the liberal opposition, by voting the funds for a strong central government. This policy of state beneficence was really not new. It was in the direct line from the great elector. It was Prussian.

The impact of Bismarck's socialism on the mind of western Europe was not in its divergence from German tradition, but in its direct challenge to England and the liberal tradition there. Here was a powerful industrial nation saying, for the first time: "We discard the theories of the British liberals; we laugh at the Manchester School. We will improve on their industrial capitalism but we despise their petty bourgeois political freedom."

With the introduction of State socialism, German liberalism was finished. The Government gave "benefits" to labor, industry, farming, banks. Liberal arguments could not defeat these vested interests.

So the Germans had only a choice between two collectivist groups. One wanted the state controlled by the imperial family, the other by the rising labor oligarchy. But both agreed on State control of industry, labor, farming, banks. No poltical force was left to educate the people constantly in the idea that the State should not control or regulate economic life at all, that the citizens, through the free market, can best direct their own economic destiny.

III

English liberties were not lost in the election of 1945. They were not lost in either world war. The further back we go, the clearer are the signs that the English were surrendering their liberties before Queen Victoria's diamond jubilee. By 1900, the astounding rate of growth in British economic wealth had begun to slow down, while the population curve continued upward. As an inevitable result, real wages declined, and the "social problem" reared its ugly head.

There were two kinds of economic doctors: those who believed in holding more firmly to free experiment as the creative force, when difficulties increased, and those who said, "Let us try the new medicine from Germany. The patient shows a quick improvement. Those who say the people will be permanently enervated can't prove it. If it doesn't work, we can always turn back."

In 1910, Britain adopted the German system of old-age and sickness insurance. By 1924, Britain was taking the lead in socialization, "insuring" workers against unemployment before the German Republic did. Lloyd George had transformed the Liberal Party into a middle-class Socialist Party. It was, of course, the end of the liberals. The Labor Party could promise more.

No party in Britain stood for liberty first. There were many individual liberals, but there was no party constantly warning the people that government cannot give them benefits which they do not pay for themselves. Even before Lloyd George, we see the English gradually building a government bureaucracy; we see the decline in enterprise and the growth of price-fixing. In colleges, graduates of German universities taught that rights were given by the state, and so the state could take them away.

A century ago, Cobden warned the English that they had only one more generation in which to reorganize themselves before American and Prussian industrial gains overtook them. He urged repeal of the corn laws, to buy time for Britain. But in the sixties both America and Germany were distracted by war, and England thought she could hold her lead. When the crisis came, the English people turned to the state.

Liberalism was dead before socialism took over. As the English turned to the philosophy of statism, made glamorous by Prussian professors and generals, as government bureaus and cartels and other vested interests grew, the English lost their independence to the state.

IV

In the last 16 years, we too have seen business, education, labor, and local government in this country become accustomed to gifts from the Federal Government. Our danger is not from a dramatic abandonment of liberalism, but from a leaking away of principles, a little compromise with this spending program and with that, until the Republican Party is as completely enmeshed in its commitments to mass supporters as were the New Dealers.

In such a race the ruthless always win, or as Hayek said, the worst get on top. The winners are those most skillful in finding benefits to attract new classes of supporters. Money is given first to the very poor, but soon farmers and labor are openly given premiums for supporting the party in power. As the government elite grows more skillful it devises benefits by which businessmen, investors, city and State governments, are inveigled into the net of the spending power, to give up their liberty in return for their own money.

The answer to political power built on spending is not to spend less, or to spend it more efficiently, as some Republicans sometimes assert. Any spending program must grow in the direction its nature prescribes—increasing ruthlessness.

The only possible answer to the debauchery of the electorate is to stop all new giving, and to set a terminal date for every existing program beyond the bare minimum traditional for our Federal Government.

The Republicans have fought four campaigns against a socialist government, but they have still to raise real opposition to the socialization of agriculture, the socialization of banking, and the attempts to socialize housing, education, and medicine.

The only way to fight the vested interests built up by a spending government is to organize all the people who have a vested interest in preserving freedom.

Farmers can give up their benefit checks—if everyone else does. Colleges can give up their Federal tuition fees—if spending is stopped and private gifts are available again. Investors can give up their "guaranteed" investments—if the Government can no longer manipulate the money market. Banks need not depend on Government banking business—if competitive business is made free.

If the Republicans yield now to the appeal for spending, or lift a finger to attract mass support, we will have no choice but to travel down the road the Germans entered under Bismarck and the English entered under Lloyd George: the road to totalitarianism. It would be far better from every viewpoint for the Republicans to go down fighting for the principles of freedom, if they must, than to win a "glorious victory" by yielding to European statism in the name of public welfare.

On Need of Screening DP's

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR G. KLEIN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 2, 1948

Mr. KLEIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave, I am inserting in the RECORD the third and concluding portion of an article by Mr. Abraham G. Duker on the need for screening immigrants to the United States:

(Part III)

Reference has been made to the armbands which distinguished the collaborationists—killers. A captured film made by an amateur Nazi photographer and shown at the Nuremberg trial showed a large aggregation of women, many of them naked and swollen, being beaten and dragged by the hair by these collaborationists.

COLLABORATIONISTS AIDED IN THEIR ESCAPE TO GERMANY

These collaborationists, who come for the most part from relatively small cities and villages, and are therefore known to the local populations, have naturally fled with the Nazis and are fearful of returning to their places of origin. As a rule, the Nazis during their retreats were not concerned with the fate of the collaborationists and left them to shift for themselves. Exceptions were nevertheless made for loyal Poles and Ukrainians. The following entry is found in Frank's diary (August 5, 1944):

"President von Craushaar submits to the governor general a teletype addressed to Gauleiter Bracht concerning the transport of loyal Poles and Ukrainians back into the Reich. In this teletype it is requested that undisputed passage across the borders into the Reich should be granted to these Poles and Ukrainians if they could identify themselves as loyal Poles and that they should not be recruited for the construction of fortifications. The governor general signs this teletype."

Koerner, deputy chief of military government in the Ukraine, writes as follows about the westward retreat to Germany:

"Greatest immigration of peoples in the Ukraine of all time. Over a million people, 150,000 racial Germans, over a million heads of cattle, thousands of voluntary assistants (Hiwis), and millions of soldiers are moving in a westerly direction." (Document 1198–PS.)

The thousands of voluntary assistants are present day political refugees. What a metamorphosis.

THEY SAVED THEIR FAMILIES

Because of their close association with the Nazis, the eastern collaborationists succeeded in taking along their families. The Nazis did not want children as slave laborers. They only took sturdy adults. The children found in the camps are those of collaborationists. Often collaborationists can be identified precisely because they have their children with them.

It is only reasonable to suppose that these criminal elements would endeavor to escape the wrath of neighbors and the kin of those whom they murdered or mistreated. This is precisely what they did, joining the tens of thousands of their brethren who were already in the Reich, serving it voluntarily in various capacities.

Dr. Karl Gruber, Foreign Minister of Austria, declared on November 15, 1946, at Lake Success that there were many "fascistic elements and criminals" among the displaced persons in Austria. "These elements fled west ahead of the German Army as it retreated from the eastern front and settled in Austria."

What is true of Austria is truer yet of Germany and even Italy. Those in Italy are collaborationists with almost no exceptions. It might be added at this point that the present exposition takes no account of the collaborationist element constituting the bulk of the displaced persons from Slovakia, Yugoslavia (the murderous Ustashis and the Moslems), Rumania, and Hungary. For sheer delight in massacre the Moslem SS, the Ustashis, Slovaks and Hungarians were not inferior to the Balts and Ukrainians.

Still another aspect of the collaborationist saga should be noted. The Poles have excellent reason to hate the Ukrainians for what they did to them during the occupation period. Yet there is a remarkable quiescence on this score. The reason is that both factions found outside Poland know that they are guilty of identical crimes. This does not apply, of course, to Poles who left before 1939, and the genuine slave laborers.

SOVIETS DEPORT DEMOCRATIC ELEMENTS

Yet another factor is to be considered. The Soviets had indeed brutally deported many Balts and Poles to Siberia during 1939–41. Parenthetically it might be noted that the Communist Party—indeed, leftist parties of all descriptions—were banned under the regimes which prevailed in the Baltic States. When the Communists took control they naturally had a field day squaring accounts with their former persecutors. The Nazis, who certainly had no interest in minimizing Bolshevik brutality, placed the number of deportees at about 40,000.

In any event, the deportees to Siberia who may very justly lay claim to being political refugees, are not the ones who are found in the DP camps. Many in the camps and outside them are the ones who dispatched hundreds of thousands of innocent persons to death, contributed to the prolongation of the war by aiding in the extermination of partisans, drove their own peoples to forced labor, starved their own people to feed the Nazis, and plundered the wealth of their respective countries for their own and their masters' enrichment. These people are not refugees from political oppression.

While in the west, where collaboration did not include massacre or torture to the extent practiced in eastern Europe, trials of collaborationists were initiated immediately following liberation, and have continued since with full approval of liberal public opinion. Yet, collaborationists from the east are regarded as martyrs. Never was the crown of martyrs more easily acquired and more unjustly worn.

LAXNESS OF AMERICAN AUTHORITIES

The American authorities have not, in fact, made any attempt, even of a superficial nature, to check on the identity of these political refugees. They have, as a matter of record, released collaborationist murderers who had been recognized as such by survivors. A former American soldier reports that in April 1946 several Jewish survivors recognized in the streets of Fuerth, near Nuremberg, the Ukrainian collaborationist, Stepan Harasimowicz, and had him arrested. Incidentally, like all faithful collaborationists, he had his family with him. Harasimowicz was commandant of the Ukrainian police in Delatyn, Poland. He participated in the massacre of 1,700 Jews of Delatyn on October 14, 1941. Subsequent to that he drove out other Jews to the mass graves and ordered them to wash the dead bodies and to drink the water. The witnesses were requested to execute affidavits, and they did so. Two weeks later they saw Harasimowicz walk about freely in Fuerth. They appealed to Justice Jackson's office. Upon inquiry the C-I-C agent said that, first, the jails are too full, and, besides, he was not at all clear as to what disposition is to be made of men like Harasimowicz. Members of Justice Jackson's staff were repeatedly approached about the problem of collaborationists but were helpless to do anything.

It is extremely doubtful that these collaborationists give their correct names to the authorities. No proper screening is possible unless the names and data given by them can be verified at their places of origin. One might add that the statistics on occupational distribution among the collaborationists, published by various American bodies, are largely worthless, as the collaborationists prepared the statistics themselves with a view to complying to the rumored needs of the various countries considering their admission. Hence probably the large proportion of farmers among them.

WHY SO MANY DP'S RETURNED TO THEIR HOMELAND

Upon the collapse of the Nazis 6,000,000 persons of those who had been brought to Germany made their way back home at once. They did not even stop long enough to avenge themselves on their German oppressors. Having been torn from their homes and families by force, they followed the natural human impulse and returned to kin and hearth. Nearly another million followed soon afterward. These people had committed no crimes and therefore had no qualms about returning home. (Senator COOPER places the repatriated at 8,000,000.) Many of the Jews did the same upon liberation, but finding no homes or kin and being surrounded by a hostile population, had no alternative but to return to the western zones. It is clear that many among those who did not return and refuse to return are doing so because they know very well that their criminal activities are known to their neighbors, not because they believe in democracy.

It is one of the cruel ironies of our day that the victims, the tormented, exploited, and starved have returned to their, in many cases devastated, homes, to poverty and privation, and to totalitarian regimes, while the oppressors and tormentors and exploiters, they who enjoyed the good life under the Nazis, have been acclaimed as apostles of freedom, the living embodiment of the spirit of liberty, and are to be given the supreme boon of admission to the United States by special legislation, which gives them every priority over the real victims.

It is sad to relate that in spite of the facts elucidated above which are self-explanatory, there is not even a hint in the three reports prepared by committees of Congress on the real nature of some of these DP's, namely, those outside of the Jews and those who were found in concentration camps as "detainees" and not as guards and capos. On the contrary, the most pernicious collaborationists, the Balts, are showered with praise.

The problem of the collaborationists-murderers of Eastern Europe is one of morality, of criminal law, of social ethics. It reaches beyond the gullibility of the ill-informed public and the one-sided propagandists. Let every honest American, every one who truly and genuinely cherishes the spirit of freedom that generated and gave meaning effect to the concept "political refugee" beware of giving his support to the killers and tormentors. Let us not confound martyrs with murderers. If these criminals are admitted to this country as political refugees, and moreover given priority as such, the term born in sanctity and nurtured in idealism will have come to an ignominious end in the year 1948 in these United States.

SCREENING IS ESSENTIAL

If admitted, these quislings, collaborationists, and just ordinary murderers will strengthen the Fascists and reactionary wings of the foreign language groups in this country. They will be on hand to furnish instructions in mass murder and Fascist connivings to all ambitious totalitarians, as these people have no scruples at all. They will poison the fair atmosphere of this country. A real and thorough screening is essential. However, effective screening is impossible without thorough studies of the Nazi reports and records, as well as depositions of Jewish DP's and residents of the localities from which the pogromists hail. A special body ought to be established for this purpose, with representatives attached to our consular bodies.

Mr. Truman Ignores Economic Facts in Urging Inflation Checks

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAUL W. SHAFER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks I include the following timely discussion by John S. Knight, editor of the Detroit Free Press, of President Truman's demands upon Congress, now in special session:

MR. TRUMAN IGNORES ECONOMIC FACTS IN URGING INFLATION CHECKS

Up on Capitol Hill, a sullen Congress is sitting in special session called by the President of the United States to meet the urgent needs of the people.

Elsewhere in Washington, the city is deserted except for Government officials, forced by the President's action to forego their August vacations, and the usual seersuckered summer tourist trade.

Because of the political factors involved, no one is regarding the special session seriously or anticipates that any constructive action will be taken.

When President Truman used the rostrum of the Democratic National Convention to announce his intention of calling Congress back this summer, he gave the Republicans good reason to cry "politics."

For more than a decade, a Congress dominated by Mr. Truman's own party had failed to find a solution to many of the problems now characterized by the President as urgent.

It is therefore not surprising, although disappointing, that the Republicans were unable to dispose of the many complexities facing the Eightieth Congress in less than the year and a half they have had a majority.

In his fight for reelection, Mr. Truman realizes that he has only two valid issues: High prices and the record of the Eightieth Congress.

It is, of course, possible to make a substantial case against the record of any Congress, no matter which party is in power.

If the Republicans have failed to enact a housing bill, the Democratic record was no better. In fact, the feeble efforts of Wilson Wyatt, Truman's one-time Housing Expediter, were a standing joke in Washington.

If the Republicans have refused to swallow the President's anti-inflation remedies, it is because they are nostrums rather than cures.

With regard to civil rights, the Republican record is immeasurably better than that of Mr. Truman's party.

Mr. Roosevelt talked glibly about these matters but never once did he force the issue on his fellow Democrats from the deep South.

When the President urges repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act, the country must not forget that more Democrats in both the Senate and the House voted for Taft-Hartley than voted against it. In fact the Taft-Hartley Act could never have been passed over the President's veto without strong Democratic support.

On many of the other recommendations contained in the President's special message to Congress, Republicans and Democrats are divided in their support and opposition without regard to party lines.

The frailty of President Truman's position on the high cost of living is that he is dodging the realities of the situation in order to gain a campaign issue.

No one likes high prices, not even the manufacturers who seem to profit most. Ultimately, a constantly spiraling economy leads but to one end—economic disaster for all.

The President would deal with inflation by reinstating the excess profits tax, restoring price controls and restricting credit.

Possibly these measures could be effective, if they were coupled with an all-out attack against inflation on every front.

As Walter Lippmann says so aptly: "There is a simple test by which the public can find out who is trying to deal sincerely and intelligently with inflation.

"Does the candidate begin or end his oration with a clear and stern warning that if his program is effective, it must be painful to farmers, wage earners, businessmen, and bankers?

"Does he put the public on notice that they cannot continue to enjoy the benefits of inflation—that is to say full employment, high wages, booming markets, high profits—and at the same time be able to buy at lower prices everything they are trying to buy?

"If the public man says none of this, if he believes or pretends to believe that he can reduce prevailing prices without reducing current incomes of farmers, workers, and businessmen, if, in other words, he talks as if the people could have their cake and eat it, too, he is deceiving himself."

Mr. Lippmann's devastating sincerity test would flunk Mr. Truman on every count.

It was Truman who thought we could have ceilings on prices without applying the same rule to wages. It is Mr. Truman who is now trying to create the illusion that he, with the help of Congress, can reduce the cost of living without breaking the boom.

The President's failure to recommend an anti-inflation program which is all embracing exposes his insincerity and lack of statesmanship.

Truman wants a campaign issue, not a remedy.

It is to be hoped, as the campaign progresses, that the public will examine the speeches of both Presidential candidates, not so much for what they say as for what they fail to say.

As yet, Governor Dewey's views are unknown. It is unlikely that he will clarify his position until the special session of Congress has been concluded. So far as we are able to determine, he is making no effort to influence its judgment and will not be bound by its acts.

Mr. Truman's record is, of course, open to inspection.

That record is a sorry contradiction in economics. He has tried to control prices without placing similar ceilings on wages. At one time, he denounced controls as the methods of a police state; now he urges their necessity.

The President is for continued Government support of farm products but he omits any reference to their effect on consumer prices.

Housewives are not told that our taxpayers are making it possible for the British housewife to purchase bread at 4 cents a pound, beef rib roast at 40 cents, bacon at 48 cents, and butter at 30 cents a pound.

We don't begrudge the British housewife these lower prices, but it should be understood that when Canada sells Great Britain bacon at 36 cents the United States Government gives Great Britain the dollars with which to pay the bill.

United States gifts of about a billion a year finance British buying abroad. This is money paid by American citizens who are plagued with sky-high prices at home.

We have never heard President Truman denounce the various unions in the building trades whose restrictive practices inflate the cost of housing.

He has recommended no cuts in the ordinary affairs of Government.

He has not cracked down on the Department of Defense for failing to introduce the economies that were anticipated under the Unification of the Services Act.

In short, the President is either lacking in any knowledge of elementary economics or he willfully chooses to deceive the public by disregarding the contributing factors to inflation which are laden with political dynamite.

It is in such a climate of mutual distrust and partisan politics that the Congress has gathered in Washington's midsummer heat to consider the President's wholly inadequate program.

A few days spent in the galleries of the House and Senate are enough to convince any visiting fireman that the only result of this special session will be an unwarranted waste of taxpayers' money.

Mr. Truman wants an issue for his campaign. The Republicans are determined he shall not have it.

"The vigor of our democracy is judged by its ability to take decisive action," says the President.

"Congress would be fully justified in adjourning at once," retorts Senator TAFT.

What they both mean and fully understand is that in accordance with the great game of American politics, nothing will be done until after the November elections.

JOHN S. KNIGHT.

American Taxpayers Finance Stupid Policy in Germany

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the American taxpayer is a long-suffering individual. Some day he will rise up and hold Congress responsible for the crazy policy that has been used to destroy industrial plants in Germany. There is positively no excuse for it. The State Department offers an alibi by saying it is part of the agreement made with Russia and other European countries by Roosevelt at Yalta and Truman at Potsdam. The cost of this wanton destruction of property can never be estimated and the American taxpayer will carry the load for generations. Truman should be impeached and the State Department officials who have carried out the program removed from office. This episode in our history will forever shame us and the generations that follow.

Notwithstanding this diabolical crime imposed upon the people of this country, for it is our burden, Mr. Speaker, there are groups within our orders who want to destroy the German people. It is their avowed and sworn objective to reduce the people of Germany to abject slavery. Many of these people are influential private citizens; some of them are in high office. They are out to get revenge. I would remind them of that biblical injunction: "Vengeance is mine, saith the Lord."

Mr. Speaker, several months ago members of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs were advised that the dismantling program in Germany had stopped. Word reaches us now that it has not. I am informed that as late as last June, 54 steel production plants, 31 rolling mills, and 54 pipe-making or assembling factories have been or are being dismantled.

Mr. Speaker, just last week our distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. STEFAN] returned from a trip to Europe. While there he went into Germany on a special mission to a small town by the name of Kamen. One of the cities in Mr. STEFAN's district, Bloomfield, Nebr., decided to adopt a German town and it was Kamen, in the Ruhr. So when he was there he met the mayor and many of the people and they thanked our colleague for the Care packages that had been sent to them by the people in Bloomfield. In this little town was a factory that manufactured freight car wheels and the mayor, very sadly, told that the occupation authorities had decreed that the wheel plant must be dismantled. This will be a great loss and it would mean unemployment for the workers and that many more people for the Americans to feed.

It is a pressing necessity, Mr. Speaker, that the railroads in Germany be reconstructed if it is to rehabilitate itself. Yet we find, as above, acts of sheer stupidity on the part of the occupation authorities. I am informed that since VE-day a great number of these plants have been destroyed under the dismantling program.

Mr. Speaker, the democratic administration must be held accountable and responsible for the wanton destruction of property that is going on in Germany. The people will not forget.

Mr. Speaker, the taxpayers of the United States are paying the bill to sustain the economy of Germany and of western Europe to the tune of $4,000,000,000 annually. It will not be denied that some plants have been dismantled and now they are on a schedule to be rebuilt, again with American dollars.

There is a considerable question, Mr. Speaker, as to the legality of our action in Germany in connection with the dismantling of industrial plants. This is a new idea and I believe contrary to the rules of war. This country has never embarked on this unchartered sea before and we were participants in the Hague Conventions. It seems to me that we are open to an unlimited number of claims for damages that might total billions of dollars.

Mr. Speaker, on April 6, 1948, I introduced a resolution, House Resolution 520, in which I requested that the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, of which I am a member, conduct a full investigation of the conduct of the occupation of Germany with respect to its economic rehabilitation, first, with special reference to the dismantling program, including all executive agreements under which the dismantled plants are being given away; and, second, with reference to the legality of our occupation activities from the standpoint of international law and the law of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, I urge at this time that the House Committee on Foreign Affairs be authorized to sit and conduct the investigation as contemplated by my resolution.

A Negro Looks at Civil Rights

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. A. WILLIS ROBERTSON
OF VIRGINIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 6 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. ROBERTSON of Virginia. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "A Negro Looks at Civil Rights," published in the Danville (Va.) Register, of August 1, 1948.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A NEGRO LOOKS AT CIVIL RIGHTS

It is unfortunate that most of the news discussing race relations comes from professional agitators who have, or think they have, something to gain from creating animosity while talking rabidly about discrimination and, in the same voice, good will.

As publisher of a newspaper with a large circulation and a corresponding influence, Davis Lee, Negro publisher of the Telegram, of Newark, N. J., which has some 500,000 Negro readers in the Southern States, grew less willing to accept the preachments of agitators concerning racial relations in the South. He decided to do a bit of investigating personally. Last Sunday he reported to his readers in a comprehensive article on the editorial page. Some excerpts which reflect his objective approach to the problem and provide sound counsel were called to our attention by the Bedford Democrat, which also was impressed by Publisher Lee. Keeping in mind that the comment is that of a distinguished champion of Negro advancement, and that it was printed in New Jersey, the Telegram editorial takes on added significance.

"I have just returned from an extensive tour of the South. In addition to meeting and talking with our agents and distributors who get our newspapers out to the more than 500,000 readers in the South, I met both Negroes and whites in the urban and rural centers.

"Because of these personal observations, studies and contacts, I feel that I can speak with some degree of authority. I am certainly in a better position to voice an opinion than the Negro leader who occupies a suite in downtown New York and bases his opinions on the South from the distorted stories he reads in the Negro press and in the Daily Worker.

"The racial lines in the south are so clearly drawn and defined there can be no confusion. When I am in Virginia or South Carolina I don't wonder if I will be served if I walk into a white restaurant. I know the score. However, I have walked into several right here in New Jersey where we have a civil-rights law, and have been refused service.

"The whites in the south stay with their own and the Negroes do likewise. This one fact has been the economic salvation of the Negro in the South. Atlanta, Ga., compares favorably with Newark in size and population. Negroes there own and control millions of dollars worth of business. All of the Negro business in New Jersey will not amount to as much as our race has in one city in Georgia. This is also true in South Carolina and Virginia.

"New Jersey today boasts of more civil rights legislation than any other State in the Union, and State government itself practices more discrimination than Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, or Georgia. New Jersey employs one Negro in the motor-vehicle department. All of the States above mentioned employ plenty.

"No matter what a Negro wants to do, he can do it in the South. In Spartanburg, S. C., Ernest Collins, a young Negro, operates a large funeral home, a taxicab business, a filling station, grocery store, has several busses, runs a large farm and a night club.

"Mr. Collins couldn't do all that in New Jersey or New York. The only bus lines operated by Negroes are in the South. The Safe Bus Co. in Winston-Salem, N. C., owns and operates over a hundred. If a Negro in New Jersey or New York had the money and attempted to obtain a franchise to operate a line he would not only be turned down, but he would be lucky if he didn't get a bullet in the back.

"The attitude of the southerners toward our race is a natural psychological reaction and aftermath of the Civil War. Negroes were the properties of these people.

"Certainly you couldn't expect the South to forget this in 75 or even a 150 years. That feeling has passed from one generation to another, but it is not one of hatred for the Negro. The South just doesn't believe that the Negro has grown up. No section of the country has made more progress in finding a workable solution to the Negro problem than the South. Naturally southerners are resentful when the North attempts to ram a civil-rights program down their throats.

"The entire race program in America is wrong. Our approach is wrong. We expend all our energies, and spend millions of dollars trying to convince white people that we are as good as they are, that we are an equal. Joe Louis is not looked upon as a Negro but the greatest fighter of all time, loved and admired by whites in South Carolina as much as by those in Michigan. He convinced the world, not by propaganda and agitation, but by demonstration.

"Our fight for recognition, justice, civil rights, and equality, should be carried on within the race. Let us demonstrate to the world by our living standards, our conduct, our ability, and intelligence that we are the equal of any man, and when we shall have done this the entire world, including the South, will accept us on our terms. Our present program of threats and agitation makes enemies out of our friends."

The findings of Publisher Lee are just what any well-informed southerner, white or colored, has known all along. The only difference is that Publisher Lee has chosen to state plainly facts which agitation distorts, and which any Negro leader of lesser standing could not declare without subjecting himself to vituperation and charges of being "a white man's Negro."

Both white and colored people of the Nation must come to understand, and quickly, that much of the agitation attempting to break up their friendship and cordial relations is inspired by persons at home and abroad who have no interest whatever in seeing southern whites and Negroes march toward a firmer economic base and to higher economic base and to higher standards of living for both races.

Our Trojan Horse

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 6, 1948

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an editorial from the Washington Evening Star of July 26, 1948:

OUR TROJAN HORSE

It would be entirely fitting if the new Progressive Party of Henry Wallace and his Communist followers were to adopt the Trojan horse as its symbol. For the record of the past week end at Philadelphia makes it abundantly clear that this new party, while posing as friend and champion of the people of America, is committed to policies which, if adopted, would spell the almost certain destruction of our political system.

It is hard to identify the true place of Henry Wallace in this new party setting. Perhaps he is its willing tool. Or it may be that he is a dupe, a figurehead subject to manipulation by the sinister men who are actually in control of the party's policies. But it does not matter greatly, for in the end the result is the same. Whatever the place of Mr. Wallace, the party is the enemy within our gates and there ought to be no hesitation in branding it as such.

Mr. Wallace's acceptance speech is worthy of attention, more so perhaps for what it leaves unsaid than for what it says. One can follow the devious line of this speech from beginning to end and not find anywhere one word or hint of criticism of the Soviet Union. There is denunciation in abundance of our own leaders and our own policies. Mr. Wallace has no word of indorsement, or even of tolerance, for anything that the leaders of either major party have done or tried to do. He simply condemns them and all their works.

But in the eyes of this man, so far as his spoken words go, the Soviet Government is beyond reproach. This self-appointed champion of the people, this advocate of the dignity and freedom of man, passes over without a murmur of protest the Soviet slave-labor camps, the rigged elections, the purges in the satellite states, the broken pledges and the provocations of the Soviet leaders. He ignores the refusal of the Soviets to come to any agreement on the problem of Germany, he closes his eyes to their flat rejection of any workable program for the control of atomic weapons, and he passes over in silence the near-paralysis of the United Nations which has resulted from Soviet abuse of its veto power. Mr. Wallace can see our own shortcomings and he can impute to us a variety of sins of which we are not guilty. But he finds nothing in the long record of Soviet transgressions which he deems worthy of even passing mention.

He tells us that if he were President there would be no crisis in Berlin today. "I assure you," he says, "that without sacrificing a single American principle or public interest, we would have found agreement long before now with the Soviet Government." How would he have done this? Mr. Wallace does not say. Beyond advocating a retreat from Berlin, he sets out no specific policies or methods by which he would succeed where others have failed.

The people of this country need not remain in ignorance of what Mr. Wallace, if he were President, would do, however, for the details are set forth in the new party's platform, to which he subscribes.

First, he and his party would abandon the Marshall plan. This would pave the way for chaos in western Europe and make it easier for the Communists to grab what is left of that unhappy continent. To make certain that this country could not interfere when the Red march begins, Mr. Wallace would discontinue the draft, cut back our preparedness program, surrender our foreign bases, and destroy our stock pile of atom bombs. In short, he would leave the United States defenseless and helpless to exert any influence abroad.

The next phase of the Wallace platform is designed to soften us up from within. The loyalty check would be discarded. Even the security checks of workers in defense plants would go by the board. The Government would be forbidden to interfere in strikes that cripple the Nation, and strikes against the Government itself would be permitted.

The effect of this, and one may well believe that it is the intended effect, would be to open the door to ultimate Communist domination of the economy of the United States. At any rate, this is the pattern that has been followed in Czechoslovakia, in France, in Italy, and in other lands where some native son has been found who would come forward and serve as a front man for his Communist manipulators.

The redeeming aspect of the third party's convention is that it has brought all of this into the open. The aim and purpose can be plainly seen. A vote for Henry Wallace in November will be a vote to open our gates to the Trojan horse that is waiting to come in.

Our Displaced Parents

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN C. BUTLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 6, 1948

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I want to talk about DP's right here in America. We have talked and talked about the DP's of Europe and we did more than talk. We appropriated millions of dollars for their care and support, and we did not hesitate on making their grants in accordance with their needs. But, here at home we have a group of DP's that should at least be as near to us both as citizens and as Congressmen as the DP's of Europe. I am thinking of our badly neglected fathers and mothers, the parents of us all. Mr. Speaker, their meager appropriations in the way of old-age assistance averaging around $1 per day is ridiculous when we consider that the dollar they receive today is only about 42 cents in buying power compared to the dollar when the Social Security Act was passed by Congress.

When the social security was passed by the Congress, many of us who are now on the majority, decried the inadequacy, the inequality and the regimentation that we said would grow into its administration. Mr. Speaker, our predictions at that time have been fulfilled. The inadequacy has grown by the declining buying power of the dollar making the grant more and more inadequate. The administration by the case workers and investigators have humiliated our elders until many choose to be hungry rather than to submit to the humiliation of their questionnaires and their investigations. The fact that the Federal Government in its matching system pays varying amounts in the different States is a sad commentary on our fair motto, "Equal justice under law."

We, on the Republican side of the aisle, have had much to say on this subject, Mr. Speaker, in the days that have intervened. We have called loudly for a decent American pension to replace this hodgepodge that is termed "old-age assistance." We have been highly critical of the present administration along these lines. We have even gone so far as to make some pretty definite promises to the American people. How many times have we Republicans proclaimed during the very recent passed years, "just let us have a majority in the Congress and we will give you a decent old-age pension to take the place of this farce known as old-age assistance."

Mr. Speaker, they gave us the majority in the Congress. We have had many months in which to give this matter our consideration. Now, a majority of the Members of this body has petitioned the leadership for a $60-per-month Federal pension to take the place of old-age assistance. The responsibility certainly is inescapable. I for one on the majority side of the aisle want to make it crystal clear that I stand for giving this matter our attention. I want us to think of the DP's, the deplorable plight of our displaced parents, in the United States of America. I pray that the leadership of this House will yield to the expressed petition of the majority of the Members of this body. I urge with all of my strength that we shall make good our pledge to enact a decent old-age pension to take the place of old-age assistance, and that we do it before we adjourn.

An Act To Create a National Housing Corporation for Low-Cost Housing Construction in the United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CARROLL D. KEARNS
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 6, 1948

NATIONAL HOUSING CORPORATION

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Speaker, in order to meet the housing emergency, it is suggested that the special session of the Eightieth Congress create a National Housing Corporation with the authority to issue $5,000,000,000 worth of bonds to carry out the purposes of this act.

These funds to be received from the Treasury Department against bonds maturing in 25 years, issued by the National Housing Corporation, hereafter referred to as NHC. The NHC would pay a rate of interest to the Treasury equal to but not in excess of the average interest cost to the Treasury of the national debt.

NHC would have a small staff, perhaps not in excess of 200 employees. The Corporation would deal entirely with the State governments. Each State would create a similar corporation, hereafter referred to as SHC, for the purpose of borrowing from the NHC. The States could borrow from the NHC at a rate of interest of one-fourth of 1 percent in excess of the amount which the NHC pays to the Treasury. For example, if the NHC borrows from the Treasury at the rate of 2 percent, it would charge the States 2¼ percent.

The NHC, as well as the States, would issue bonds with a 25-year maturity. When a State borrows from the NHC it would turn over to the NHC special revenue bonds in the amount of the loan. The NHC would reserve the right to hold the bonds to maturity or until they are redeemed, or sell them to the public, as the agency might determine best.

The State would make available to cities, counties, towns, and municipalities funds for building low-cost housing. The municipality would create a local housing corporation and would issue 25-year special revenue bonds with interest at a rate of one-fourth of 1 percent in excess of the amount paid by the State. These bonds would be turned over to the State housing corporation as security for a loan; the SHC reserving the right to hold or sell the bonds as the SHC might determine best.

In practice it would work as follows:

The State of Pennsylvania might borrow $100,000,000 from the NHC at 2¼ percent interest. The State would then loan, say, $5,000,000 to Erie, Pa., at a rate of 2½ percent. Erie would acquire the necessary land and issue contracts to private construction companies, on competitive bidding, for the construction of a given number of low-cost houses. It is suggested that in no case should a municipality attempt to build less than 100 low-cost houses at a time, in order to secure the best prices on materials.

When the houses are completed, the Erie Housing Corp. would sell them to individuals in that area who are in desperate need of adequate housing.

It is suggested that the Congress direct and limit the cost of these houses to a $5,000, $7,500, or $10,000 range, with 75 percent of all houses to be in the $5,000 class. The Erie Housing Corp. would sell the houses without profit. The mortgages would be placed through local financial institutions, and, as far as possible, on equal basis. These institutions would be responsible for appraisal, and so forth.

The Erie Housing Corp. would require a down payment of 10 per cent. The mortgages would be issued up to 90 percent of purchase price. The mortgage would be amortized over a 20-year period and carry interest at 4 percent.

By buying these houses at cost, the individual would be able to purchase a home without the normal profit mark-up of 20 to 30 percent made by private contractors. On a $5,000 house this mark-up amounts to $1,000 to $1,500. Since the individual buys at cost, he should not be allowed to sell for a period of 5 years. Should he be forced to dispose of his house because of an emergency, arrangements could be made through the Erie Housing Corp. to take over his obligation on a reasonable basis. This would prevent individuals from trying to profit at the expense of the Government.

It is suggested that when the mortgage is placed on the house by the bank or other financial institution the institution have the right to retain that mortgage, guaranteed by the Erie Housing Corp., or of turning that mortgage over to the Erie Housing Corp. and receiving full payment, plus a fee of one-half of 1 percent of the amount involved for services rendered.

It is further suggested that two special provisions be incorporated into the mortgage contract:

First. A sum sufficient to cover a blanket group-insurance policy be added to the monthly payment. The insurance to be placed with a private insurance company—under no circumstances Government.

Second. A sum of $5 a month would be added to monthly payments. This is to be held in reserve against unforeseen emergencies which might arise in any family, such as prolonged sickness or prolonged unemployment. This reserve fund would be held by the Erie Housing Corp. and could be applied against payments only if the corporation was satisfied that a real emergency existed.

The set-up would be something like this:

Monthly payment, including interest, amortization, and fire insurance	$30.00
Death-benefit insurance	2.50
Reserve against emergencies	5.00
Total monthly payment	37.50

The group insurance policy would be drawn in such a manner that if either husband or wife died—and both would have to be in good health at the time the policy was taken out—the survivor would receive the home free and clear, with the insurance company paying the proceeds to the Erie Housing Corp.

As the Erie Housing Corp. received monthly payments or lump sum, they are required to retire bonds held by the State, and the State, in turn, required to retire those held by the NHC, and the NHC required to retire those held by the Treasury. This could be mandatory by law. This operation would not cost the taxpayers one penny. In time it would be a self-liquidating operation.

Each housing corporation could retire their securities at 1 percent premium, even though those securities might be sold to the public. The NHC or a State housing corporation would have the right to sell to the public bonds received by them.

This program would accomplish several things:

First. It would remove housing from Washington domination, and would return it to the local community.

Second. It would remove thousands of employees from the Federal pay roll.

Third. It would take housing out of national politics.

Fourth. The individual who had purchased a house from the municipality in which he lived would feel a greater obligation to maintain the property and to make the monthly payments than he would to an unknown Government in Washington.

Fifth. The municipality would see that the property was maintained at a satisfactory level.

Sixth. Local officials would seek to help the taxpayer home owner in the event he was out of a job. This is a direct blow at communism, totalitarianism, bureaucracy, and inflation.

DIFFICULTIES

First. The principal difficulty in connection with this plan is the same any housing authority would face; the shortage of material and shortage of labor. Building crafts and supply companies must help in the success of the act to ward off controls.

Second. The Congress might suggest that insofar as possible local municipalities use home talent in their own construction to avoid national conflict. This would prevent one community bidding against another for labor.

Third. Local politicians, contractors, building supply houses, and others, in many cases, would seek cuts. The law should be strong enough to prevent this. Anyone guilty of receiving such cuts should be punished by the Federal Government. The punishment should call for a minimum of 5 years in prison or a $25,000 fine, or both.

To meet the housing emergency in larger cities, the State Housing Corporation could make loans to the city for the purpose of remodeling outdated slum buildings, putting in new bathroom facilities, proper ventilation, etc. The municipality could make a grant or a loan to the local landlord for this purpose.

The Eightieth Congress authorizes, without spending a dime, $5,000,000,000 for low-cost housing.

One million houses for the United States of America.

No taxing group's responsibility.

A cushion against a recession.

An act of deflation.

A deficiency bill for amount needed—never in excess of $5,000,000,000.

Price Controls

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. CHARLES A. HALLECK

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 6, 1948

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am inserting in the RECORD an excellent editorial, entitled "Price Controls," which appeared in the Lafayette (Ind.) Journal and Courier.

I earnestly recommend a careful reading of this particular editorial by every Member of Congress and by every citizen. In clear and concise logic it demonstrates the complete unworkability of a system of selective price control that President Truman has recommended.

PRICE CONTROLS

It should be understood that fixing price controls as a means of holding or reducing prices is not the simple matter it may seem to be on the surface. The President, it will be recalled, has asked Congress to give him authority to fix prices as a means of reducing the high cost of living.

It has been officially suggested that should such authority be given, which seems unlikely, petroleum and petroleum products would be among the first to receive consideration. Our economy is so complicated, however, that it would be unfair and improper, probably even unworkable, to limit the price on petroleum and its products. What about all the factors which go into the production of these commodities, all of which influence prices? If a price limit is to be placed on petroleum and its products limits must also be placed upon all wages paid in the industry; upon transportation costs—rail, truck, and pipe line. The cost of steel and other material used in the industry must also be fixed. If prices are fixed without controlling the influencing factors, producers, refiners, and distributors stand to get caught in a squeeze which will force them out of business, eliminating our vital petroleum supplies.

Again, as an example, the price of meat could not be fixed without going all the way down the line to control the price of things that help establish meat prices. In brief, if meat prices are fixed, prices on feed must also be controlled. Too, prices on steel and coal could hardly be fixed without controlling the wages of those employed in these industries. Something would have to crack, for instance, if steel workers got a raise while steel prices were held under tight Government control.

Experience has proved that price control cannot be a half-way measure. It must take in everything or nothing if it is to work at all. And if there are to be controls, there must be some sort of special agency to enforce it. That means snoopers, probers, enforcers, and other payrollers interfering with our private affairs, and at a cost of millions of dollars.

No, other and better ways must be found to solve our price problem.

Federal Aid to Education

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MELVIN C. SNYDER
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 6, 1948

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, one of the bills which should be passed at this special session is Federal aid to education. During the regular session, the aid bill was passed by the Senate and now only needs the approval of the House. If the committee in charge of this bill would report it out, it would receive House approval.

I recognize the reluctance to report out this bill is not based on any objection to Federal aid to education, but because of the warning of the Secretary of the Treasury that the Government will probably have an unbalanced budget at the end of this next fiscal year due to large commitments for military purposes and foreign relief, consequently it was considered unwise to pass the legislation at this time but rather wait until next year when present commitments will be reduced.

I know that there has also been reluctance on the part of some Members to approve this legislation with the present set-up in the Office of Education under the Federal Security Agency. Recent investigations have disclosed an unhealthy condition in that Agency.

Looking at the situation realistically, the measure giving Federal aid to education will be passed by either the Eightieth Congress at this special session or by the Eighty-first Congress next spring. I believe our next President will be Governor Dewey and my information is that he is favorable to the proposed Federal aid bill. I urge the people who now control this matter to bring it out on the floor of the House, let it be passed, and include a provision that it will not become effective until July 1, 1949. This proviso will eliminate any budgetary difficulty. Passing the bill at this time will eliminate the necessity of the bill being processed through committees at the next session and being again considered by the Senate.

Today our Nation is fighting communism. The fight is more serious than people generally believe. The struggle will be persistent and long. The best place to fight alien doctrines and philosophies is in our schools. In the end, the battle will be won or lost in our school system. We can depend upon our teachers to do a good job. Their past record entitles them to that confidence.

High Prices Not Due to Wage Rises Alone

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 6, 1948

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an editorial from the Brooklyn (N. Y.) Eagle of Thursday, August 5, 1948:

HIGH PRICES NOT DUE TO WAGE RISES ALONE

A radio report tells us that the oil industry for the first half of 1948 has a billion dollars in profits. This is the highest in the history of the industry.

News releases this week list dozens of corporations with profits double what they were at this time last year. Some few show a slight decline.

We will not go into a statistical breakdown on the subject. We would like to point out one observation on the facts. The propagandists are constantly dinning into the ears of the public that the total cause of high prices is due to wage increases.

The publicity contradicts a simple fact. The increase in profits of the various concerns mentioned in the news releases, and others unnamed, are estimated after taxes and after wage increases have been deducted.

We are not arguing for any share-the-wealth plan. It is quite true that if we were to spread the resources of the wealth around the country and give every one a little it would soon mean sharing poverty rather than wealth. It would not form a solid base for a better distribution of resources.

Nor do we question the legitimacy of the profits that are shooting skyward. A case could be made out against many on the point, no doubt.

The purpose of this piece is to spike the evident untruth that wage increases are the single and universal cause of price increases.

The truth of the matter is that in very few industries have the wage increases allowed the workers to catch up with the cost of living. In many industries over and above the cost of the wage increases a disproportionate increase in profits is shown.

We would like to know how the propagandists explain the gap between the two items.

Inflation: Talk or Cure

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK BUCHANAN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 6, 1948

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Peter Edson, from the Washington Daily News of August 3, 1948:

INFLATION: TALK OR CURE?

(By Peter Edson)

From the standpoint of straight logic, the Republican case against doing anything about inflation leaves something to be desired. There is too much tendency to talk about causes, rather than cures. Principal arguments advanced by GOP Congressmen are these three:

1. Primary cause of inflation is the large volume of exports and Marshall plan aid, shipping out of this country goods which, if left at home, would increase domestic supplies and so cut prices.

2. A secondary factor is too high Government spending, which increases the supply of money in circulation and so drives prices up.

3. Democratic administration fiscal policies are inflationary.

The President's mid-year economic report to the Congress sheds a little light on all three of these Republican points.

1. The total volume of foreign aid for the year ending June 30, 1949, is $7,000,000,000. This represents less than 3 percent of America's gross national production of goods and service.

About half of this first year's foreign aid consists of goods to be procured outside the United States. This "offshore procurement" constitutes the bulk of commodities in tight supply in the United States, such as petroleum, nonferrous metals, meats, fats and oils, fertilizer, newsprint, and lumber. Finally, the total amount spent for foreign aid this year will be less than was spent in 1947.

These facts should put the inflationary impact of the foreign-aid program in proper perspective.

2. Biggest item of Government spending is for national defense. Last January, budget estimates for the armed services were put at $10,900,000,000. The last Congress, with Republican majorities, mind you, jumped this figure by $3,500,000,000 to $14,400,000,000.

The President's economic report admits that over the next 3 years this stepping up of Government stock piling and procurement programs for the armed services—particularly the Air Force—will put greater strains on short supplies of raw materials.

3. On the matter of Government fiscal policies, Republican spokesmen in Congress have made quite a point about how the GOP has been responsible for balancing the budget for the first time in years, and that this has had an anti-inflationary effect. When all the figures are in, the exact opposite may be proved.

During the first half of the calendar year 1948, the Treasury piled up an $8,000,000,000 surplus. The Republican tax-cut bill, according to present estimates, will cut Government revenues by nearly $5,000,000,000 in the fiscal year ending next July 1. Increased defense expenditures authorized by the last Congress plus the tax cut may therefore put the Treasury back in the red. This would mean nothing would be paid on the national debt. Instead it would get bigger.

The effect of the tax cut, furthermore, is to put more spending money in the hands of the people. This increases the inflationary forces, instead of diminishing them.

In spite of all the logic that can thus be put behind the President's anti-inflationary program, it must be admitted that the program isn't going over. The Congress would rather investigate spy scares than do anything about cutting the cost of living.

Address of India Edwards, Executive Director, Women's Division, Democratic National Convention, Philadelphia, Pa.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. HELEN GAHAGAN DOUGLAS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 6, 1948

Mrs. DOUGLAS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by Mrs. India Edwards, executive director, women's division, Democratic National Committee, at the Democratic National Convention, Philadelphia, July 12, 1948:

Fellow Democrats, you've just heard the eloquent, moving keynote adress of that great staesman, Senator BARKLEY. He has told you of the state of the Union and of the world. Now I want to tell you of the state of the American pocketbook. Let's get right down to cases.

During the war and after the war, the Democrats kept prices under control. Of course, they went up somewhat—that was inevitable. But prices were kept at levels that were fair. They were high enough to allow a fair profit to business. And low enough so we could buy the things we needed.

Here in front of me I have a large box. The lid on this box is like the lid the Democrats kept on prices. We knew then that it was dangerous to remove the lid and we refused to tamper with it. We knew the evils of inflation, and we refused to take a chance. We held prices down under this lid.

But the Republicans were the henchmen of big business—they became the willing accomplices of the lobbyists who swarmed over Washington throwing big expensive parties.

So the Republicans loosened price controls, just as I'm loosening the strings on this box. They lifted the lid, just as I'm lifting this lid. You see what happened when the lid on prices was lifted, prices flew up, sky high.

From here, it looks as though my big balloon, representing prices, is not only out of reach, but out of control. However, that is not true. The balloon is on a long string, securely fastened to the inside of the box. That string was here all the time. When prices started getting out of hand 2 years ago, the Republicans could have pulled prices back into line.

They had the means right in their hands but they would not use them.

They could have taken action to prevent prices from continuing up. But the Republicans refused to act. For 2 years they had the strings in their hands with which to pull prices back into line but they would not pull them. They would not act.

Finally, last year, President Truman called an emergency session of Congress to pass legislation on European Recovery and to pass legislation against inflation.

But the Republicans still refused to act. The cost of living has gone up 28 percent in the last 2 years. Food has zoomed 45 percent and it will continue even higher unless we sweep out the Republicans and elect a Democratic President and a Democratic Congress.

Clothing has gone up 26 percent.

Prices are already out of reach for millions of good American families.

In 1945, under a Democratic administration many families were able to save. Fifteen percent of the total national savings was held by families earning $3,000 and less a year.

But just 1 year later, families earning $3,000 or less were able to save only 3 percent of the Nation's savings.

The reason is obvious—prices were high. People in the lower income group could not save.

This year, according to the Federal Reserve Board, one out of every four families will sepnd more than it earns.

In 1945, people making from $7,500 to $5,000,000 a year—yes, there are individuals in this country who have incomes of $5,000,000 a year—well, those people making $7,500 to $5,000,000 a year held 25 percent of the Nation's savings.

But 1 year later, the savings of this group jumped to 48 percent of the total.

Remember, in that same year, families making only $3,000 or less were able to save only 3 percent of the Nation's savings.

What this means is that under Democratic President Truman and under a Democratic Congress a man could support his family and save something, but under a Democratic President and a Republican Congress, the poor are getting poorer, the rich are getting richer.

I've been talking in percentages about the cost of food and other items going up. Percentages are abstract, and while they are scientific and accurate, they don't tell the story in terms of bread and butter.

I've been checking prices right here in Philadelphia. I wanted to bring you some last-minute news on actual food prices.

I've brought my shopping bag with me tonight and here are some of the things I bought.

I have a piece of round steak. It weighs 1 pound and I paid $1.10 for it.

In June 1946, just 2 years ago, 1 pound of round stead cost 46 cents right here in Philadelphia. The price of round steak has almost tripled in 2 years.

I'd like to ask Senator WHERRY of Nebraska a question. He's a leading Republican. Senator WHERRY, are you listening?

Do you remember what you said in the fall of 1946? I remember perfectly and I'm going to repeat it word for word so that all of America will know what you said, Senator WHERRY.

You said—and I'm quoting: "TAFT! TAFT! Everybody's talking about what TAFT has done to the OPA. I'm the fellow that knocked out meat control, and I've done more to that bill than anybody else."

You, Senator WHERRY, and the Republican Party sold the American people down the river. We're paying more than we can afford for food and we know whom to blame. The Republican Party.

I used round steak as typical of meat. I could just as well have used hot dogs or pork chops or hamburger or chuck roast. The story is the same, the price of meat is sky high.

Now—for something else that's typical: I have here in my shopping bag a pound of oleomargarine. I paid 48 cents a pound for this oleo this morning. Two years ago, when we had effective price control, it would have cost only 24 cents. The price doubled—and I'm talking about oleo not butter.

And now I'd like to ask a question of another leading Republican—Representative TABER of New York. Mr. TABER, do you remember what you said about prices? You said, in 1946, and I'm quoting: "OPA is, at the present time, the promoter of inflation." Then you went to work with your hatchet, which you use so constantly, and helped kill price control. Under price control we paid 52 cents for butter. Now we pay 95 cents. We can thank you, Mr. TABER, and the Republican Party that backs you, for the increases.

This November, you'll be running for reelection. I hope the housewives in your district in New York State will remember how you helped jack up the cost of living. They can vote you out of office, Mr. TABER, and I hope they do.

There are a million and a half more women than men who will be eligible to vote this November. We women can use our votes to fight inflation if we vote Republicans out and Democrats in.

I bought a bottle of milk on my shopping trip today, because milk is a perfect food and a necessity. I paid 23 cents a quart for grade A milk. In 1946, when the Democrats were the majority in Congress, this bottle of milk cost only 15 cents.

Now I'd like to talk to Senator TAFT for a minute. Senator TAFT was the head of the Republican Policy Committee. He was the spokesman for his party.

Senator TAFT, I hope you and your constituents are listening.

Do you remember, Senator TAFT, what you said on July 24, 1946? You said—and I'm quoting from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD: "If they (meaning consumers) think the price is too high today, they will wait until the price is lower."

I'd like to ask you another question, Senator TAFT. "How long do you think American mothers should wait to give their children milk?" You've raised prices and refused to take action to lower them. And when I say you, I don't mean you alone, Senator TAFT. We know there are many Republicans who, last month in this very convention hall, refused to support you personally. In fact they repudiated the Eightieth Congress by naming two men to head their ticket who had no connection with that Congress. But two years ago, when it came to killing price control, the Republican fraternity lined up right behind you, Senator TAFT.

The families that have been forced to cut their milk order can thank the entire Republican Party, not you alone, Senator TAFT.

I have some other things in my market bag but the story is the same: Food prices going up, up, up, ever since Republicans took over the Congress.

I'd like to talk about something that's as important as food—clothing.

I have a little girl here tonight. Her name is Sally Zimmerman. She lives in Philadelphia. Her name could very easily be Mary Jones of Springfield; Barbara Smith of Montgomery; Henrietta, Grace, Ruth, Marylou, Alice—from anywhere in the U. S. A.

Most families don't spend as much on clothing as on food; but clothing does take a big chunk of everyone's income. Statisticians say that in ordinary times we spend one-fifth of our income for clothing.

Shoes are an important item of clothing. I'd like to tell you what Sally's shoes cost. They are ordinary brown leather oxfords and are a well-known national brand. They're sturdy—the kind of shoes kids need for school. Today, these shoes cost $6. Two years ago, when we had price control, the same shoes cost $4.75.

Have you ever heard of Herbert U. Nelson? Well, if you haven't, he's one of the big lobbyists in Washington. He said, on March 3, 1946—and I quote: "We've got a gang in power who thinks solely of the consumer, and usually in terms of 'protecting' him." You're right, lobbyist Nelson, the Democratic gang did think in terms of protecting the consumer * * * and particularly such consumers as little Sally and her mother and father. You're right, Mr. Nelson, the Democratic Party still is thinking in terms of protecting the consumer.

Unfortunately, the Republicans listened to you, Mr. Nelson, and to the other lobbyists.

The only way that consumers can expect protection is if they elect a majority from the Democratic gang—as you call it—this November.

The little cotton percale dress that Sally is wearing came from one of Philadelphia's department stores. It cost $4.98. The buyer in that store told us that a similar dress, one that contains an equal amount of material and workmanship, and from the same manufacturer, would have cost only $3.98 2 years ago when we Democrats were in the majority.

I've talked about the price of Sally's dress and her shoes. It's the same with everything. Today the slip that Sally is wearing cost $1.69 cents; in 1946 it would have cost $1. Her little panties now cost 69 cents; 2 years ago it would have cost 59 cents. On July 9, 1946, Robert R. Wason, president of the National Association of Manufacturers, one of the organizations that worked hardest and spent fabulous sums to kill OPA, said—and I quote—"If OPA is finally dead, women will use the other goods they have on their shelves."

Mr. Wason, were you thinking of food or clothing when you said that? How long do you think Sally can wear the clothes she has on tonight? Maybe you don't know it, Mr. Wason, but children grow, and even if their clothes withstand wear they need new ones for size.

Oh, yes, Mr. Wason, when you were successfully high-pressuring the Republicans, you also said, on July 9, 1946, and I again quote, "If OPA is eliminated entirely, prices of automobiles may be expected to reach normal within 6 months."

What is normal, Mr. Wason? That's a question I'd like to ask you and all the other lobbyists who high-pressured the Congress. It's a question I'd like to ask all Republican leaders. I'd also like to ask a question of all American voters—they've heard it before—Had enough? Sure, we've had enough of Republican high prices.

Our President Truman has clearly shown where he stands on the important issue of inflation. He has asked not once but many times for stand-by price controls with which to bring down the cost of living. In November, we must elect a Democratic President and a Democratic Congress.

The Democratic Party is the friend of millions—not of millionaires.

When the Democrats once more are in the majority in the Congress, they will take action.

Just as I am pulling the cord that is at the end of the price balloon, so the Democrats will pull the cards of legislation to halt inflation.

We can pull the price balloon within reach. We can force it back into the box. And, finally, we can put the lid back on prices.

As the director of the women's division of the Democratic National Committee, I represent all Democratic women.

As a housewife and mother, I appeal to all American women to join together to bring down the cost of living. You can do it. Register. Vote. Elect Democrats.

Communists in Government and Who Is Responsible

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRED E. BUSBEY

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 6, 1948

Mr. BUSBEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a portion of my testimony given as a witness on Thursday, August 5, 1948, before a hearing of the Committee on Un-American Activities of the House of Representatives:

The people of the United States are wondering just how far the Communists have infiltrated into highly confidential Government positions. For the past several days we have listened to and read with amazement the stories related by former Communist functionaries. One in particular spent the war years in getting secret information to be sent to a foreign government. While we are at a loss to understand why an American would furnish military or otherwise confidential information to the agent of a foreign government we should be more concerned as to how persons of such weak character were placed in Government positions.

I have given considerable thought and study to this question and the only conclusion I have been able to reach is that the fault lies squarely on the shoulders of the Civil Service Commission. What caused me to reach such a conclusion?

To begin with the Civil Service Commission is the employing agency for the Federal Government. One of its duties is to determine the fitness and suitability of those persons seeking Government employment. Loyalty to our form of government was generally presumed, but in the early days of the "preparedness" program the Civil Service Commission no longer presumed applicants for Government positions to be loyal. On May 29, 1940, the Commission issued the following press release:

"The United States Civil Service Commission has decided officially that as a matter of policy it will not certify to any department or agency the name of any person when it has been established that he is a member of the Communist Party, German bund, or any other Communist or Nazi organization."

A restatement of this policy was made by Arthur Flemming, a member of the Civil Service Commission, on December 12, 1940, when he testified before the sucommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, House of Representatives, Seventy-seventh Congress. Mr. Flemming said:

"In connection with all our investigations we are keeping this policy in mind: If we find anybody has had any associations with the Communists or the German Bund, or any other foreign organization of that kind, that person is disqualified immediately. All doubts are being resolved in favor of the Government."

On September 7, 1941, Hon. Martin Dies, chairman of the Committee on Un-American Activities, House of Representatives, charged that Leon Henderson, Price Administrator, had employed at least 50 persons with records of affiliations with Communist-front organizations. Specifically, Mr. Dies named:

Tom Tippett, Assistant Chief, Rent Section, $5,600 per annum.

E. J. Lever, principal field representative, $5,600 per annum.

Mildred Brady, principal specialist, $5,600 per annum.

Robert A. Brady, head consultant, $7,500 per annum.

Dewey H. Palmer, consultant, $20 per day.

I do not intend to enter into a discussion of the Communist-front affiliation of these five persons but I do want to mention something about Mr. Tippett. The record shows Mr. Tippett was a member of the national executive committee of the Conference for Progressive Labor Action. The letterhead of this organization carries the following statement of purpose:

"It aims to inspire the workers to take control of government and industry, to abolish capitalism, and to build a workers' republic."

In addition, Tippett was among the sponsors of a banquet given Ella Reeve Bloor, affectionately referred to by Communists as "Mother Bloor." He was a member of the American Committee for the Defense of Leon Trotsky. He was a staff writer for the Communist Daily Worker. Together with Earl Browder and William Z. Foster, he was a speaker at a meeting of the Workers Party, in Chicago, in 1923. He was a speaker at a meeting of the Communist Trade Union Educational League where he was introduced by Foster. If not an actual Communist, Mr. Tibbett certainly could be classified as having had association with Communists, who, according to Commissioner Flemming, were disqualified immediately. Mr. Tippett was disqualified by the Commission. But Mr. Leon Henderson interceded on behalf of Mr. Tippett and the Civil Service Commission, utterly disregarding their statement of policy to Congress, rated Mr. Tippett eligible. The Commission said that Mr. Tippett had been indiscreet and sometimes unwise in his associations and utterances.

From there on the record of similar actions by the Civil Service Commission in permitting Communists and their fellow-travelers to obtain important Government positions is almost endless and continues to the present day.

I want to submit proof of how the Communists and Communist sympathizers obtain important and confidential positions. On January 6, 1947, I wrote Mr. Arthur S. Flemming, of the Civil Service Commission, asking for information on two persons then employed in the Government service. They were Carl Aldo Marzani and Nathan Gregory Silvermaster. On January 8, 1947, I received the following reply:

UNITED STATES CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., January 8, 1947.

Hon. FRED E. BUSBEY,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN BUSBEY: Reference is made to your letter of January 6, 1947, regarding the recommendations and final action taken by the Commission in the cases of Carl A. Marzani and Nathan Gregory Silvermaster.

In the case of Carl A. Marzani, ineligibility was recommended by the rating examiner of the Investigations Division, which recommendation was concurred in by the reviewer and the Chief of the Investigations Division. His case was reviewed by two staff members and the executive director and chief examiner, all of whom recommended ineligibility. The Commission rated Mr. Marzani ineligible, and from this rating, Mr. Marzani appealed and was given a hearing before the Board of Appeals and Review, at which time Messrs. H. C. Barton, Chief of the Presentation Division, Emil Despres of the Board of Analysis, Prof. Edward S. Mason, of the Board of Analysis, and Major D. Thompson of the Army Service Forces, all of whom were fellow employees, with the exception of Mr. H. C. Barton, who was the supervisor under whom Mr. Marzani was employed, and all of whom were with the Office of Strategic Services, testified emphatically regarding Mr. Marzani's loyalty. Thereafter, the Board of Appeals and Review recommended eligibility, and the case was again reviewed by two staff members, one of whom recommended ineligibility and the other eligibility, the eligible rating being concurred in by the executive director and chief examiner. The Commission then rated Mr. Marzani eligible.

Additional information regarding Mr. Marzani has recently come to light, and the entire file regarding Mr. Marzani was referred to the Department of Justice for their consideration. Subsequent to the receipt of your letter of January 6, 1947, a conference was held with the Department of Justice regarding Mr. Marzani's case, at which time the Department of Justice expressed the desire that any information whatsoever regarding him be held in strict confidence.

With regard to the case of Nathan Gregory Silvermaster, this case first came to the attention of the Commission when the Board of Economic Warfare requested his transfer from the Department of Agriculture. While Mr. Silvermaster had been in the Federal service since 1935, he held excepted positions and was not under the Commission's jurisdiction. The rating examiner of the Investigations Division recommended ineligibility, which recommendation was concurred in by the reviewer and the Chief of the Investigations Division. Two staff members reviewed the file and concurred in the recommendation of ineligibility. The Executive Director and Chief Examiner likewise recommended ineligibility. At this point, further investigation was decided upon. Before this was completed, the Board of Economic Warfare advised the Commission that they were no longer interested in Mr. Silvermaster, and the investigation was discontinued because we no longer had jurisdiction.

Mr. Silvermaster's case again came to the attention of the Commission when the Procurement Division of the Treasury Department requested his transfer from the Department of Agriculture. The case was referred to the Loyalty Rating Board for consideration. The Loyalty Rating Board requested further investigation. Upon review of this case, the Loyalty Rating Board examiner recommended ineligibility, and the Loyalty Rating Board concurred in the recommendation of ineligibility.

The Commission, in reviewing this case, relied chiefly upon the testimony contained in the files of the Military Intelligence Division, which revealed that the then Under Secretary of War, Judge Robert P. Patterson, on July 3, 1942, wrote to the Honorable Milo Perkins, Board of Economic Warfare, Washington, D. C., to the effect that "I have personally made an examination of the case and have discussed it with Maj. Gen. G. V. Strong, G–2. I am fully satisfied that the facts do not show anything derogatory to Mr. Silvermaster's character or loyalty to the United States, and that the charges in the report of June 3 are unfounded."

The Commission relied on the further fact that on July 1, 1944, the President's Interdepartmental Committee advised the Department of Agriculture as follows:

"It is the opinion of the committee that the record as submitted does not contain sufficient information to warrant charges pursuant to the statutes which prohibit the retention in government service of a person who is a member of an organization which advocates the overthrow of the government of the United States by force or violence, or who personally so advocates."

The Commission rated Mr. Silvermaster eligible for transfer to the Treasury Department.

Prior to the date of your letter of January 6, 1947, the Commission authorized the review of borderline cases in order that they may be reviewed in the light of present-day standards. The Silvermaster case was included among those to be reviewed. Upon review, the Commission will inform you of any action it may decide to take.

Very sincerely yours,

ARTHUR S. FLEMMING,
Commissioner.

Later I received a letter dated February 24, 1947, in which Mr. Flemming stated:

UNITED STATES CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., February 24, 1947.

Hon. FRED E. BUSBEY,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BUSBEY: In a previous communication addressed to you, I indicated that the Commission was reviewing the case of Nathan Gregory Silvermaster and that I would provide you with a report of the action taken as a result of this review.

A majority of the Commission has decided that, inasmuch as Mr. Silvermaster is no longer in the Government service, it is not now necessary for the Commission to reconsider its previous action, but that his name should be flagged so that if he does come into the Government service again the question of his suitability can be given further consideration.

The minutes of the Commission will show that I dissent from this action on the ground that he should, in my judgment, be barred at this time for an indefinite period from Federal employment.

Very sincerely yours,

ARTHUR S. FLEMMING,
Commissioner.

I want to call attention to one especially significant part of Mr. Flemming's letter of January 8, 1947. He said that the Examiner on the Loyalty Rating Board and the Loyalty Rating Board itself recommended ineligibility but that the Civil Service Commission in holding that Silvermaster was qualified for Government employment on the question of loyalty relied chiefly on the recommendation of the Under Secretary of War, Robert P. Patterson, and further relied on the opinion of the interdepartmental committee. Mr. Flemming did not advise me that he knew the basis for Secretary Patterson's recommendation or the opinion of the interdepartmental committee. Therefore, I am bound to conclude that he did not know why such favorable recommendations were made. This case is proof of the fact that the Civil Service Commission ignored the recommendations of its qualified personnel and succumbed to the whims and wishes of those of higher authority.

Before I leave Mr. Flemming's letter of January 8, 1947, I want to call attention to one thing that seems to me is the key to the question as to how persons of questionable loyalty secured Government positions. Mr. Flemming says that the Commission authorized the review of border-line cases in the light of present-day standards.

As I stated earlier, Mr. Flemming told Congress on December 12, 1940, that the policy of the Civil Service Commission was to resolve all doubts in favor of the Government. Several years later when questioned before the same subcommittee as to this statement of policy, Mr. Flemming stated that it was still in effect. If the rule in 1940 and 1943 was to immediately disqualify all persons who had any association with Communists or the German Bund, Mr. Flemming should be called upon to say when the rule was changed and why.

Referring now to Mr. Flemming's letter of February 24, 1947. It is most interesting. He says that inasmuch as Mr. Silvermaster is no longer in the Government service it would not be necessary for the Commission to reconsider its previous action but a majority of the commissioners agreed to flag Mr. Silvermaster. In the event he does enter the Government service again his case will be given further consideration.

Mr. Flemming called my attention to the fact that he dissented with the majority as he thought Mr. Silvermaster should be barred from further Government employment for an indefinite period.

What I would like to know is when Mr. Flemming changed his mind. He should be called before this committee and asked to explain why he agreed that Silvermaster was suitable for Government employment one day and of the opinion he should be barred indefinitely another day, all on the same record. Is not this ample evidence of the inconsistency of the actions of the Civil Service Commission and does it not show that the Civil Service Commission is not the proper Government agency to administer a loyalty program?

If the records of the Civil Service Commission were made available to a committee of Congress we would learn how the Tippetts, the Thomas I. Emersons, the Nathan Gregory Silvermasters, the Josephine Herbsts, the Donald Wheelers, the Carl Marzanis, the Michael Greenbergs, and hundreds of such ilk were approved for Government employment.

Why are we denied access to such information? The Civil Service Commission does not want such record exposed to the light of publicity. They do not want it to become known how totally unqualified they were to administer an adequate loyalty program. One of the most outstanding examples of the ability of the Communists to ensconce themselves in highly confidential Government positions is the case of Carl Aldo Marzani. The Civil Service Commission knew that Marzani had been an organizer for the Communist Party on New York City's East Side; they knew he had signed and circulated Communist Party nominating petitions and in fact they had all the information that was later introduced in the trial of Marzani. Yet the Civil Service Commission put its stamp of approval on Marzani. This, in my opinion, is the grossest kind of malfeasance and the persons who ignored the evidence and recommended and rated Marzani eligible should be indicted.

The record of the Civil Service Commission reveals all too plainly that they placed incompetent and unqualified persons in positions that enabled them to nullify the outstanding work of a corps of able investigators.

On November 29, 1943, from the floor of the House I revealed the instructions issued by the Civil Service Commission to its investigators. Those instructions had the effect of hamstringing the loyalty inquiries. I later learned that these instructions were prepared by Alfred Klein, the chief attorney for the Civil Service Commission. These instructions, evidently concurred in by the Commission, went a long way, in my opinion, toward sabotaging the loyalty investigation program and played a very important part in letting hundreds upon hundreds of Communists into our Federal Government. These instructions that did so much harm to our security program are as follows:

UNITED STATES
CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., November 3, 1943.

Regional Directors:

The Manual of Instructions on Loyalty Investigations, which was fully discussed with regional directors and a copy of which was placed in the hands of every regional director and investigator in charge for the guidance of investigators, contained detailed information regarding methods of investigation and questions to be avoided. Previously definite instructions had been issued that no questions should be asked regarding union membership or activities. It has recently come to the attention of the Commission that investigators have been asking persons under investigation, and witnesses, questions which the Commission had specifically directed should not be asked. In order that such offenses be not repeated there is set forth below a list of the things investigators should continually have in mind. Copies of these instructions should be immediately placed in the hands of every investigator.

1. Under no circumstances should any question be asked of an applicant or a witness involving union membership, union associations, or union activities. Not only should the applicant not be asked about membership in a union but any question should be avoided which might elicit from the applicant or from a witness union membership or activities.

2. If in the course of the investigation witnesses say that a certain person is a Communist because he has associated with certain persons in a union known or said to be Communists, the investigator should not ask the applicant about his association with these particular individuals, since the asking of such questions would expose the Commission to the charge that this is an indirect way of connecting the applicant with union activities. In other words, the question of unionism should not be brought up in any way in an investigation, either directly or indirectly.

3. Do not ask any question whatever involving the applicant's sympathy with Loyalists in Spain. This means that the investigator should avoid not only asking about the applicant's sympathy in the Spanish war but no reference should be made to any such organizations as the Abraham Lincoln Brigade or any other of the many Spanish relief groups. The whole matter of the war in Spain should be scrupulously avoided by the investigator as having any bearing on procommunism.

4. Do not ask any question about membership in the Washington Book Shop or any book shop in any city similar to the Washington Bookshop.

5. In asking an applicant whether he knows a certain individual, that individual should not be characterized in any way so as to show the individual's views or leanings. For illustration, an applicant should not be asked: "Do you know John Jones, reputed to be a Communist?" The question if at all necessary, should be: "Do you know John Jones, and what has been the nature of your association with him?"

6. Do not ask a husband, who is an applicant, questions about his wife and do not ask a wife, who is an applicant, questions about her husband. Ask the applicant only as to matters having to do with himself but not with members of his family or others.

7. During the special interview never argue with the applicant or indicate that you think he is evasive. Simply ask the question and record the answer. If it is your opinion that the applicant is evasive or untruthful you may say so in your report and give the basis for your statement.

8. In speaking to the applicant or to a witness do not characterize an organization as communistic or Fascist. Do not characterize it at all. Do not say: "We have information that you have been active in the International Labor Defense, a Communist organization." Say, rather: "We have information that you have been connected with the International Labor Defense. Have you been associated with this organization and what has been the nature of such association?"

9. Do not ask a witness any question in such form that the witness may derive information regarding the applicant which he otherwise would not have. Remember that your task is to obtain information and not give information. Do not ask a witness whether John Jones, the applicant, is a Communist unless you immediately follow with the question whether John Jones is a Fascist or pro-Nazi. The same applies with respect to the questioning of the applicant.

10. Under no circumstances ask any question or make any statement to the applicant or to a witness relating directly or indirectly to the color, race, creed, or religion of an applicant or witness.

11. Obtain all available information from witnesses which will help establish whether the applicant was a Communist Party line conformist. Do not discuss the Party line with the applicant or with witnesses. Familiarize yourself thoroughly with the Party line test and ask questions which will specifically bring out whether the applicant changed his views at certain periods but do not mention Party line unless the witness offers the information that the applicant did follow the Communist Party line. In that event ask the witness specifically what statement or actions on the part of the applicant he has in mind or knows about which leads him to the conclusion that the applicant was a Party line follower Again, have in mind it is not your function to argue or give information but merely to elicit information. Attached hereto you will find a statement which will help you to understand what is meant by the Communist Party line.

12. Do not ask any question regarding the type of reading matter read by the applicant. This includes especially the Daily Worker and all radical and liberal publications. Remember that the mere fact that a person reads a certain publication is no indication that he believes in the principles advocated by such publication. Citizens are free to read anything they like.

13. Do not ask any question as to so-called mixed parties, that is to say, whether the applicant associates with Negroes or has had Negroes in his home.

14. Do not ask regarding membership or interest in the Lawyers Guild, the American Civil Liberties Union, the Socialist Party, the League of Women Shoppers or the Harry Bridges Defense Committee. This is not a complete list of organizations about which no questions should be asked, but investigators should avoid asking any questions regarding any organization unless it has been authoritatively designated as subversive. If the investigator is in doubt the best policy is not to ask the question.

15. Do not ask general questions regarding the political philosophy of the applicant, such as, whether he believes in capitalism or what his opinion is regarding certain events of a current or historical nature.

16. Do not ask intimate personal questions. Do not ask such questions as come under the category of "snooping."

17. Exercise intelligence. Keep in mind what you are looking for. Remember that you are investigating the loyalty of the applicant to the United States. You are not investigating whether his views are unorthodox or do not conform with those of the majority of the people. What you are looking for is to determine whether there is evidence that the applicant's interest in the welfare of another country transcends his interest in the welfare of the United States. Remember that a question of an improper nature will result in criticism of, and embarrassment to, the Commission. Do not ask any question which is immaterial and has no bearing on the ultimate issue involved.

18. The investigator conducting a loyalty investigation should also conduct any special hearing which may be required. However, newly employed investigators or investigators without experience in loyalty cases should discuss the questions to be asked during the special hearing with their supervisors. Where feasible an investigator thoroughly experienced in loyalty matters should sit in on all special hearings in which derogatory information relative to loyalty is to be discussed.

From time to time you will receive additional instructions as to what to do and what not to do in the course of investigation of loyalty cases. The foregoing instructions are to be rigidly observed and any deviation therefrom will be cause for disciplinary action.

L. A. MOYER,
Executive Director and Chief Examiner.

The Alfred Klein who wrote these instructions is the same Klein whose decision in one case has been so widely quoted. Mr. Klein said: "If I had to express an opinion as to whether the applicant is a Communist, my reply would be in the affirmative. However, I am constrained to recommend that the applicant be rated eligible."

Mr. Klein should be called upon to tell who or what constrained him to recommend eligibility for a person he believed to be a Communist. However, Mr. Klein is one of the men whose opinions on loyalty cases the Civil Service Commission considered essential. Such infantile remarks amply demonstrate the unfitness of this Commission official to judge any case involving loyalty. It is my opinion that it is safe to say that the records of the Civil Service Commission contain many such idiotic remarks by Mr. Klein. Call it malfeasance, misfeasance, nonfeasance, or what you will, it supports my contention that the Civil Service Commission bungled the job of keeping undesirables from the Government service.

Now that these disloyal and potentially disloyal persons did succeed in getting into Government positions, the question arose after VJ-day of how to get them out.

On March 21, 1947, the President issued an Executive order prescribing procedures for the administration of an employees' loyalty program in the executive branch of the Government. This order placed the responsibility on the Federal Bureau of Investigation for conducting all loyalty investigations. It placed the responsibility on the Civil Service Commission to see that disloyal persons were not permitted to obtain Government positions and it placed the responsibility on the head of each department and agency to see that disloyal employees are not retained.

The Executive order also established within the Civil Service Commission a Loyalty Review Board of not less than three impartial persons.

Congress was then asked to appropriate funds to carry out the provisions of this Executive order. To date Congress has appropriated $7,000,000 to the Civil Service Commission to be used exclusively on the loyalty program as enunciated in the President's Executive order. Half of this amount was appropriated for the fiscal year 1948 and the other half for the fiscal year of 1949. Thus we know that the Civil Service Commission has spent at least $3,500,000 during the fiscal year of 1948 in ridding the Government service of persons of questionable loyalty.

Now let's look at the effectiveness of the manner in which this loyalty program has been administered. I'll give but two examples, one case under the jurisdiction of the Civil Service Commission and the other case under the jurisdiction of the head of an agency.

The first case is that of William Remington. This man was permitted to transfer from one Government agency to another without any clearance from the FBI. According to the recent testimony of Miss Elizabeth Bentley she informed the FBI in 1945 of her association and the activities of Remington. Now one of two things occurred—either the Civil Service Commission permitted the transfer of Remington without benefit of a report from the FBI or they permitted the transfer without regard to the information from the FBI. In either case the Civil Service Commission erred.

The other case is that of Jesse Epstein, employed by the Federal Public Housing Committee. Mr. Epstein was identified as a member of the professional unit of the Communist Party in Seattle, Wash. The loyalty board of the Federal Public Housing Authority, acting under the Presidential directive of March 21, 1947, cleared Mr. Epstein and the Loyalty Review Board of the Civil Service Commission approved it.

These two cases, standing alone, show the ineffectiveness of the Civil Service Commission and the Executive order. Further proof is the statement of the chairman of the Loyalty Review Board made several days ago that no Government employee had been removed from the service under the provisions of the Executive order.

The Federal Bureau of Investigation is spending the funds Congress appropriated in the manner contemplated. They have conducted thousands of investigations as provided by the Executive order and they are still making investigations. In view of the recent disclosures before two congressional committees no one can be heard to say that the FBI is without information about the questionable activities of Government employees. But what good has it done?

The Civil Service Commission has failed miserably in its duty and the Executive order has proven to be worthless as an instrument to rid the Government of employees of questionable loyalty.

The Civil Service Commission cannot be heard to say that they did not have sufficient funds to carry out the part assigned to them by the Executive order.

Mr Chairman, I am leading up to simply this: On March 22, 1947, President Truman issued an Executive Order 9835 ostensibly for the purpose of ridding the Federal Government of Communists, Communist sympathizers, fellow-travelers, and anyone considered disloyal or subversive. The following day, Sunday, March 23, 1947, papers were carrying big headlines to the effect that they would be removed and I quote from the Washington Post: "Truman wants disloyal employees fired;" the Times-Herald carried a big headline on the same date, "Truman wants Reds fired from U. S. jobs." In the Washington Star of the same date appeared the headline, "Truman wants FBI to weed out all disloyal Federal workers."

The people of the United States were exceedingly happy over this turn of events and thought the President sincere in his announcement. Under Executive Order 9835 a Loyalty Review Board was set up in the United States Civil Service Commission to handle these cases, but notwithstanding the fact that Congress to date has appropriated over $17,000,000 for this specific purpose in cooperation with the President in the hope that he was sincere in his statement, the results so far are zero. It is my personal opinion that outside of the work done by the FBI and the records they have compiled from the amount that was allotted to them, the money has been squandered and absolutely no results obtained.

It is not surprising to me that this Loyalty Review Board has done nothing because if you will look over the 23 names originally appointed to this Board you will readily come to the conclusion that not a single one of them is qualified to pass on cases of loyalty or security risk. It is my belief that if the President of the United States had been sincere in wanting to rid the Federal Government of the hundreds of undesirables he would have insisted that a board of competent and experienced men in the field of communism be appointed.

It was shameful and disgraceful to have misled the American people into thinking that something was going to be done by the present administration to clean out all of these undesirables in order to detract their minds from the fact that the Civil Service Commission had not performed its duty in declaring these people ineligible and removing them from the pay roll.

I am well aware of the terrific smear campaign carried on against this committee and its members by the Communists of this country in order to discredit the work you have been doing to see that only people whose loyalty cannot be questioned remain on the pay roll. The people of this country owe undying gratitude to this committee for the wonderful work being done at the present time.

It is my further opinion that if President Truman was sincere in his desire to rid our Federal Government of employees from high places in important key positions who are definitely a security risk to the future welfare and security of our Government, in light of present-day conditions, he would want all departments of Government to make available immediately all information in the files of the various departments, the FBI, and the Civil Service Commission, to all proper congressional investigating committees. The fact that he has thrown every possible obstacle in the way of this committee, as well as other committees, from obtaining information that is rightly due them can only lead to one conclusion in my mind and that is that he does not want the truth to come out because it would be embarrassing to the present administration and reflect on the heads of the various departments who, notwithstanding the fact that they have had information given them which is in their files at the present time, have not had the courage to take the necessary steps to sever these individuals from the pay roll or have willfully neglected to do so for political reasons. The investigation your committee is now conducting is far above any partisan consideration. Loyalty to one's country comes ahead of any political party.

One more suggestion and I am through. I think this Committee to Investigate Un-American Activities should constantly appeal to the conscience of other people like Miss Bentley, Professor Budenz, and Mr. Whitaker Chambers to repudiate their Communist comrades and come forward to give testimony in behalf of our country.

In view of the little we have learned of the activities of the Civil Service Commission in placing or allowing to be placed Communists and Communist sympathizers in important Government positions, I am firmly convinced that if President Truman were sincere in his desire to remove from the Government service all persons of questionable loyalty, he would not have delegated any authority under his Executive order to the Civil Service Commission.

Plot Against Frank Buchanan Shows Stripe of Progressives

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK BUCHANAN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 6, 1948

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include an article appearing in the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette of Monday, August 2, 1948, written by John E. Jones, a staff writer on the paper, entitled "Pennsylvania Politics—Plot Against FRANK BUCHANAN Shows Stripe of Progressives":

PENNSYLVANIA POLITICS—PLOT AGAINST FRANK BUCHANAN SHOWS STRIPE OF PROGRESSIVES

(By John E. Jones)

WASHINGTON, August 1.—The fortunes of politics will present a challenge this fall to Representative FRANK BUCHANAN, of McKeesport, and to voters of the Thirty-third Congressional District which he represents.

A Congressman with a reputation for progressive action and voting, Mr. BUCHANAN now finds himself the target of the new fangled political attack designed by followers of Henry A. Wallace.

The McKeesport Representative becomes the focus of a political paradox. So acceptable has his record been to progressives within his own—the Democratic Party—that the Progressive (Wallace) Party of Pennsylvania will try to unseat him in November.

The party which offers peace, abundance, and freedom to voters will enter a congressional candidate in the Thirty-third District to foment political warfare and to endeavor to elect a Republican, hence, conservative, in Mr. BUCHANAN'S place.

Thomas J. Fitzpatrick, president of local 601 of the United Electrical Workers and a notorious leftwinger who doesn't live in the district, will oppose Mr. BUCHANAN. He will try to split the Democratic vote and thus assure a Buchanan defeat.

Allowing that the Wallace party has a right to enter its own candidate in the race, the obvious question remains:

"What does a progressive have to do to win the support of self-styled progressives?"

Mr. BUCHANAN'S voting record in the Eightieth Congress—his first full term—placed him high on the list of Representatives who acted and voted for housing legislation and for the extension of price controls—while they still existed.

He has been one of the foremost Democratic supporters of bills aimed at checking upward price spirals and at alleviating the housing shortage. He has obtained a high rating from Americans for Democratic Action and from the CIO alike on their estimates of Members of this Congress.

He opposed income-tax reductions in the face of postwar profit reserves. He opposed the repeal of regulation W—the Federal Reserve Board's old rule to limit installment buying.

He supported bills in 1947 to extend price controls and sugar rationing. He opposed legislation to permit local authorities to decontrol rents.

On the labor front, he opposed the Taft-Hartley bill and he opposed the Bulwinkle bill that exempts railroad rates from provisions of the antitrust laws.

In foreign affairs, Mr. BUCHANAN'S score was proadministration. He supported ERP; aid to Greece, Turkey and China and he supported the Fellows bill to admit 200,000 displaced persons to this country. Later he supported a move to recommit the Senate bill which contained discriminatory features against Jewish DP's and Poles.

The scope of the McKeesport Congressman's activity does not rest with his voting record. He is regarded in Washington as one of the most effective, although minority, members of the House Banking and Currency Committee which is concerned at this extra session with consumer credit and bank reserve controls.

Mr. BUCHANAN has demonstrated to most observers of the committee a first-hand knowledge of banking practices which has enabled him to check some of the ultraconservative tastes of the Republican leadership.

The committee is now considering a restoration of consumer credit controls which Mr. BUCHANAN wanted Congress to maintain last year.

Why, then, progressive opposition to this progressive-recorded Congressman?

The Progressive Party move to unseat Mr. BUCHANAN is part and parcel of the Communist Party line to split progressive or liberal forces in America; elect a conservative or reactionary Congress; and hasten the day when a new depression, or something, strikes.

Mr. BUCHANAN has become the target of the plot because he has symbolized, to great extent, the efforts of liberal Congressmen in Washington to hold the line against inflation. He is one of three Pennsylvania Congressmen who have been marked for defeat by the Progressives.

In a two-party contest in the Thirty-third District, Mr. BUCHANAN could protect himself. Even if defeated by a Republican opponent, the defeat would at least represent a clear-cut decision along major party lines and preferences.

But in a dog fight with Progressives, Mr. BUCHANAN will need new sources of support next November. Neither he nor the Democrats are sure at this time where that support can be found.

It appears, however, that the Eighty-first Congress, whether it be Republican or Democratic controlled, could use the experience and judgment of FRANK BUCHANAN.

Address of Hon. Frances Perkins, Member of the Civil Service Commission, Democratic National Convention, Philadelphia, Pa.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HELEN GAHAGAN DOUGLAS
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 6, 1948

Mrs. DOUGLAS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by Hon. Frances Perkins, member of the Civil Service Commission, formerly Secretary of Labor, made at the Democratic National Convention, Philadelphia, Pa., July 12, 1948:

I am appreciative of the considerable honor which your committee has done me, in asking me to speak briefly before this great and important convention, and I am both grateful to them and full of humility in my attempt to describe some of the underlying principles which I believe are involved in political policy and in political action, not only throughout all time, but in particular, in this year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and forty-eight.

There has been a tendency in recent times to think of politics as a low pursuit and of politicians as self-serving, but these ideas spring from a dark cynicism, a wholly materialistic philosophy, and a lack of comprehension of the nature of man in his relation to his Creator. Politics fulfills man's essential and permanent function as a social being, as a part of God's creation. Each man is an individual and has his individual life of great importance, but he is also a social being. He strives constantly to build an order of society, a state as we often call it, a nation in which the individual can live secure and in which truth and justice as man is able to perceive them can prevail.

Our forefathers, who founded this great Nation, having thought a great deal about politics and about the function of organized society, and having had the benefit of the knowledge of the long processes of civilization, put it pretty well in the preamble of the Constitution—stating it as their purpose to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for common defense, promote the welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, to ordain and establish the Constitution for the United States of America.

Their politics was no light and cheap function of men. The state is arrived at by political action and it is the organization of government and order which is an essential function of man.

These are not original ideas of mine. They were pronounced by Plato, Aristotle, and St. Thomas Aquinas, and in more modern times by many thoughtful philosophers.

Politics is patriotism, and political conventions, such as this, and such as the one held in this city 3 weeks ago, are patriotic rallies quite as much as they are deliberative bodies, and it is a part of the patriotic duty of all people to take part in the political life of the community in good conscience and with enthusiasm to contribute of the best that they have in themselves.

The political conventions of America seem to puzzle many foreign observers and even in recent months American-born writers who ought to be able to perceive their immense significance themselves. In a sense, although each convention is held under the auspices of a particular party, the whole people of the United States participate in all of them. I certainly participated, and I think most of you did, 3 weeks ago and millions all over the country are participating in this convention. Most people in a free democratic society, such as we live in, and with a constitutional, representative government, rarely think of politics or political principles except in periods of elections when these principles are called sharply to their attention.

This is what a convention does: It brings those who have declared for themselves some political purpose together, to canvass once more those purposes once in each 4 years, associated with each other in friendship, in fun, and by serious conversation and public oratory to explore some of the political ideas and political principles which they hold in common. For politics must be practical, and political activity is a practice in which all men in a democracy must participate. Out of political activity sprang this state, and came the stature of a political nation in a particular time and place. By these laws and statutes men will bring to life a state for a particular period and time.

The state is a dynamic society and this is particularly true of the United States, a dynamic community of human beings joined together in establishing a common purpose. But what is that common purpose?

Yes, freedom and liberty, justice and virtue, peace and order, these are permanent goals. But within short periods of time many other elements of the common purpose change. To find these changing elements which must meet the needs of a particular time and place or to solve a special problem of a special set of circumstances is to describe the meaning of the particular activity of political conventions.

To explore and criticize in the light of modern knowledge and experience, and to insist upon decisions made therefrom being carried out in public office, this is the sum of the purposes arrived at in conventions.

The analysis of modern social and economic problems and their relation to a sound and humane philosophy, these are the problems of a convention.

Conventions are made up, on the whole, of delegates fairly representative of a cross section of American life. No man holds convictions about his principles by a process of reason and logic alone. None of us can reach the courage to take action effectively on matters of which we know only through the operation of reason alone.

The convention, even with its excess of exuberance, and partly because of those excesses, exposes political ideas, brings political ideas into the field of the emotions; then, the emotions, playing over those ideas, bring further conviction and loyalty and the capacity to sacrifice personal and minority views clearly and tolerantly.

To the common purpose, which is arrived at partly by reason and logic, and partly by emotional reaction and conviction, we then bring renewed faith in the democratic process; we express again our belief in the common people, in their genius for decision on these matters and we rededicate ourselves in these conventions to the carrying out of the fundamental purpose of a free society and to the defense of our liberty in this free society, a liberty brought hither by many peoples. We renew our principles. We renew our aims to develop our liberties and to extend them to men of good will. We renew, and we restate our profound knowledge that only men of good will can achieve liberty and hold it.

The convention then is a time when those who are consistently concerned about politics, and not just in campaign years, make estimates of the situation, as the military say. An examination really, of themselves, as individuals, and of special affairs, an examination by the rule of conscience, and having made that estimate, they gather up their group to take a calculated risk and to offer to the people of the United States as a whole a program, a platform, and candidates, which those who were assembled will recommend with their sacred honor as being a right step, a practical step, in improving the lives of our fellow men within this Nation. And also, in these days, when America steps out almost anew into the affairs of the world, a step toward the right and humane solution of the problems of all of the people of the world.

Men owe to one another, since they are social beings, that without which human society could not be preserved. Men could not live together in the same country unless they respect each other, and believe in one another as mutually manifesting truth.

And so in the midst of our political campaigns it is important for us to recognize that each party must examine its own conscience and each party must regard the members of the other parties as also manifesting truth and a desire for service. Whispering campaigns, cynicism about public activities, about political action, abuse, and false accusation have no place in a true political campaign and particularly at this time when political affairs have assumed a world importance never before known in American life. I wish that the Democratic Party might take the lead in inaugurating a vigorous campaign without mud slinging.

This party has held, under public direction, our form of government for 16 years. We hold therefore, many advantages for voters. This party has managed many affairs of the Nation. Surely this party should be the first party, advantaged by its creditable record, by the widespread acceptance of its generous social objectives, and by the customs, and the habits of thinking of the American people. It should be the first party because the names of its leaders are household words, and do not need to be sold by the cheaper forms of advertising.

This party should be the first party because it has taken the leadership, and, therefore, will always have the credit for developing a bipartisan foreign policy which gives assurance to the world of the main outline of the American will to generosity and kindliness. Because of all these things, surely the Democratic Party can admit such human virtues and decent aspirations as its opponents have, and can invite them to a campaign on the issues before the American people without mud slinging, for campaigns are periods of great ideas for all the people as they participate in the thinking and feeling of the occasions.

I spent the Fourth of July close by a small New England town which is celebrating the one hundredth anniversary of its incorporation as a village in 1848. As a part of that celebration the windows of the shops, the libraries, and the church vestibules have all set up exhibits of the life of that community near the time of its founding and throughout the 100 years—most interesting exhibits. I paused long and intently before one window in a quaint old-fashioned brick building, where the local telephone company does business. Some worthy citizen had on display items that he had brought down from his garret, of mementos of the political campaign in which James G. Polk was the candidate. Handbills and posters urging the citizens to vote for Polk, with candle and kerosene torches used in the processions, with excellent portraits and engravings of Polk. What caught my eye and started my meditation on political affairs throughout a hundred years was the slogan printed on the top of every handbill—printed over the pictures of Polk—printed even on the signs which said only "Vote for Polk," a scroll held in the middle of the mouth of a dove and on the slogan the words, "Liberty, virtue, and justice."

Liberty and justice we are still familiar with in political campaigns, but it's been a long time since anyone has said that virtue, which is a large and inclusive word, was a part of the platform and a part of the promise of any party. Perhaps, we need to revive it in its larger sense for this is what the people of the United States want. They want goodness and they want decency; they want self-respect and the respect of all men for each man and of each man for all the others. They want humaneness—kindness—we call it, mercy.

I was struck by a recent publication of the Gallup poll in which the usual sample of citizens had been asked some questions about what they want in a President. What kind of a man he should be as a man, what kind of an attitude he should have. The opinion of those in this poll was that he should be humane—this is a part of the virtue of modern times—humane and merciful, truthful and upright, honorable and unselfish, patient, able to take it, unpretentious, associating himself humbly but not meekly, humbly in the sense of virtue, with all the people of his country. And this, if I may say so, although I belong to the older generation, is what the young people of this country want.

They want their leaders and those to whom they entrust the sacred order of their Government to be not only men of probity and intelligence; they want them to be men of mercy and generosity, of simplicity, and of humility, and any party which can produce consistently people of that sort will be trusted by the common people to protect their liberty; to follow constitutional processes, to reform that which needs correction in our public life; and to meet the new problems which arise from day to day and from month to month in domestic affairs, and particularly, in these critical days in world affairs, with constructive and creative conscience.

There has never been a time when the principles and the politics of a party, as expressed in its platforms and in its oratory, and demonstrated in the character of its candidates was so important to the people.

This party will inevitably call to the attention of the people its record and what it has done in the 16 years in which it has held the authority of Government. It is due to the people to make a report of what has been done with this public trust, but it is due to the people also to approach them in humility, recognizing that however successful some of its policies have been, that its performance has not been complete. It has had its full complement of error and confusion but many objectives have been achieved. Some objectives have been only partly attained. Some mistakes have been made, some shortcomings demonstrated. Many of these mistakes have been corrected or forgotten, and the people of this country stand in a situation of social progress, of material prosperity, of intellectual and moral integrity and of spiritual security, which is hardly equalled in any nation of the world and hardly known in historic times. All this and freedom, too.

There are many in this convention and there will be thousands of voters who cannot remember because they weren't adult, the confusion, despair, and lack of common moral political purpose of 1931 and 1932. Unemployment and business depression stalked the land when men were afraid to think about their economic and political problems; when they were tempted to call wrong right and evil good; when they doubted the capacity of man to save himself by the grace of God; but the Democratic Party has the right to remind the people that in these 16 years we have gone through that depression and unemployment period; we have gone through the honorably conceived and very difficult recovery period. We have seen the emergence of a world form of moral horror and have combatted its hideous implications for ourselves; we have gone through a modern war made necessary to combat and overcome the moral evil that threatened to engulf the civilized world, and even threatened to touch us, and we have entered into the postwar period in which distress and shattered people, intellectual and political confusions, and political moral problems unknown to our ancestors, have faced us at every turn. This has not been an easy period of 16 years, for those who led this great party and those who operated the Government in the care of all the people. Seldom have those in public life been so tested, so tried, or faced with such supreme difficulties. The American people know this and have in their hearts a true and understanding sympathy for those who operated the Government in their behalf and stood firmly and tried to do the right thing in each new emergency as God gave them to see it.

The American people have risen nobly and courageously and unitedly to meet every one of these problems during this period without partisan bickering. They have shown themselves capable of throwing off the fear which depressed us; of piecing out a new economy when the old seemed destroyed or in decline, by patchwork processes perhaps and by lifting themselves by their bootstraps, but still by finding a way of making things go.

With courage and tenacity the young people of this country entered a war they had never dreamed of being called upon to fight and comported themselves not only with bravery and with intelligence but with a kindliness toward all mankind. When once the fighting quieted down, even momentarily, they had won a new affection for the United States, which the rest of us must live up to in our public affairs.

American business, industry, labor stepped forward to meet the needs of a war economy, giving up profits and opportunities which they never expected to be called upon to give up. We are a world power today because of all these things.

We do believe in our ability under God to maintain a good community. We have progressed from the days when there was mass unemployment—14,000,000 unemployed—to a period in 1948 when last month 61,000,000 people were in work for wages, and better wages, both in the higher and lower levels of remuneration for services rendered, than they have ever known.

We have moved into a period when social justice in the United States in the form of unemployment insurance, old-age security, social provision for the handicapped, good working conditions for the wage earner, with opportunity for leisure and a floor set up against the fall of wages below subsistence level, which promises a continuing improvement in the standards of living—a period of social justice in which the needs and necessities of human beings have been first on the agenda and when the hope of material prosperity has been based upon one concept that it is the people who matter.

There is a crisis, a world crisis, today and it behooves those here to be sober in their analysis of the problem, in their promises and their programs. There is a deep crisis; it is fundamentally a moral crisis, and the influence and force of the United States must be directed to the maintenance of the primary human concepts of truth and honor among individuals within a society and among nations; of cooperation and good will as a solvent of many conflicts; of the example of clean and decent behavior on the part of all the citizens in government in dealings with other nations; and in a firm, unflinching adherence to the principles of justice and right to all people. It is a part of our security, as a people, that we want no power for its own sake, and this must ever be an American slogan.

An American item of creed, if you will, the power to defend that which is right, not only for ourselves, but for all mankind. A power which is tolerant, which is humane, which allows all men and each man to develop his God-given powers under the guidance of his own judgment, and to be free from tyranny and oppression. We will generate that power by our own internal domestic unity, cooperation and good will, and by God's help attempt to use it for the good of all mankind and particularly for that portion of mankind which historical incident brings within our sphere of responsibility.

Those who are to ask others to trust them with the authority of government or with great responsibilities must first know where they are going. They must know their aim, purpose, and objective, and this convention is an admirable time to find and state that problem.

Second, they must know themselves by the analysis of their nature and their own actions, and this in comparison with the highest and most decent standards they are able to conceive. They must know, and our leaders must know, and estimate their own weaknesses as well as their strength.

They must examine the same standards by which they examine their own conscience, and they must know and at least glimpse their destiny of the mankind whom they serve and so strive to take action which will lead toward a future of generosity and mutual service, of intellectual and spiritual development and welfare, and have the knowledge of our country's welfare at heart. They must understand that the people of this Nation can go forward with that integrity which makes it possible for them to trust their political leaders. This is a serious convention. The laws of right and wrong must govern our political actions.

No one in this room tonight can forget, or wants to forget, a great and beloved man whose smiling face, whose nerve in the face of disaster gave hope and encouragement, first to a prostrate nation and later to a harassed and terrified world.

He will long be an unseen, yet apprehended guest, not only at Democratic Party meetings, but in every patriotic gathering of our country. And we here will hold him and what he did in grateful memory—grateful that this party was able to produce and give to the Nation and to the world, the man who was needed, at the time when he was needed.

There are thousands of people all over the country who would like to duplicate the candidate of 1932, but we have to face life as it is. There is no duplicate in this, or any other party.

But there are men and women who have felt the influence of the aspiration and hope of the life which he brought to function so freely in human society. They will strive in the same spirit, strive in the same direction, and aspire as truly to serve the people of this country and of the world.

Two of these men will be nominated in this convention.

I thank you.

Should We Wait to Serve?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ED GOSSETT

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 6, 1948

Mr. GOSSETT. Mr. Speaker, Mr. John Ben Shepperd, of Gladewater, Tex., president of the United States Junior Chamber of Commerce, delivered a very fine address on public service to the recent meeting of the East Texas Chamber of Commerce, at Temple, Tex.

At the request of my friend, Mr. Melvin Evans, president of the Texas Junior Chamber of Commerce, and because this speech is a national appeal to a greater interest in good government, I am asking the privilege of inserting it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Indifference and sordid selfishness are constant threats to our national well-being.

The young men of this country should be encouraged in every effort to stimulate civic righteousness and a greater devotion to the public good.

The splendid address of Mr. Shepperd follows:

SHOULD WE WAIT TO SERVE?

As the president of the United States Junior Chamber of Commerce, I am grateful for the opportunity to tell you about a subject which is very close to my heart. That is, my personal crusade to encourage—on the part of our young men—more responsibility and a healthier and more intelligent participation in public affairs as a means of preserving our American way of life.

For that reason, I have labeled this talk, "Should we wait to serve?" I have put it in the form of a question to you who are acknowledged leaders in the fields of business, industry, and finance.

One of the Nation's greatest assets is its manpower. It has been estimated that there are about 17,000,000 adults from 21 to 36 years of age. Approximately 1,500,000 of these young men and women live in Texas.

The importance of this particular asset is high-lighted in times of crisis such as the recent war. Then we suddenly wake up to the fact that we have been too busy to pay much attention to our young men until they are called upon to defend us.

The rest of the time, we are too prone to take them for granted and fail to recognize what a vast reservoir of aggressive, intelligent, and unprejudiced young manpower that is available to fight the battle for freedom 365 days a year.

These are veritable rivers of energy and enthusiasm which can be directed toward improving our communities and our State provided we give them proper counsel and advice.

In all probability, when most young cave men grew strong enough to swing their own axes, they grumbled about the way their elders were running tribal affairs. Down through the ages, the discontent of young men and women has played a dominant role in the changing course of history.

Revolutions aren't stirred up by those in command, those who have land and prosperous businesses. They are the ones most interested in maintaining the status quo. It's the younger members of society—those who aren't satisfied, who want a chance to express themselves more in community and business affairs.

The youth of America are not thinking of revolution. Far from it. Any veteran who served overseas and had a chance to see how other peoples live came home a supersalesman for the American way of life. But make no mistake about it: There are groups in this country today trying to undermine our Government through appeals to our young men and women.

Should they lose faith or become discouraged because they are not given the opportunity to participate in community or public affairs, they might tend to sell America short. Sometimes I get worried about all of us doing that. We go out of our way to be critical. We are too partisan.

To combat this, we must speak up for democracy and let the eagle scream. To protect our democratic system and free enterprise, we must take stock of our heritage. To perfect it, the approach to our problems must be positive. To promote it calls for public education. We must educate our people to think, to take stock, to study—a thorough knowledge of American history is the best manner of promoting a love for its advantages.

The necessity of educating the public was brought forcibly to my attention while on a recent tour of Europe, where I observed the spirit of young men sinking into discouragement and chaos due to lack of security and opportunity for advancement. They had lost hope, ambition, the incentive to produce.

Talking to them about their form of government or the ever-present threat of communism, they would reply, "What can we do about it? Today we may be working on our job—tomorrow our government may move us across the country to an entirely different kind of work. We do not have the opportunity to utilize our training or the experience gained in the war by entering a new business because our government has closed these fields of endeavor to us."

On the way home, the thought occurred to me that our country would be in a tragic state and would be easy prey to communism if our young men—who have their lives before them and have the most to lose if our free-enterprise system were lost—should lose their hope, their ambition, the incentive to produce.

In 1944, the United States Junior Chamber of Commerce passed a resolution asking that a fifth freedom be added to the then recently announced four freedoms and that this freedom be the freedom of opportunity of enterprise.

With this in mind, I launched a campaign which began October 1, known as the fifth freedom tour, which has carried me through all of the 48 States and into 27 foreign countries, this being the two hundred and ninety-seventh speech in an effort to mobilize, not only our 250,000 members, but all young men toward a keener appreciation of the American way of life.

There is no reason why our young men should not be taught from their earliest days to assume and discharge their obligations to the community and to those around them. I say "from their earliest days," for we have learned a lesson during the last war when we suddenly dumped responsibility on young men who had never before been called on to think for themselves and for others. Training for responsibility takes time.

I have advocated adding a fourth "R" to the traditional three "R's." The fourth "R" would be responsibility. The grade schools are the places to start training our youngsters for their future obligations. If we could inculcate our millions of school boys and girls with this fourth "R" we would be building a mighty bulwark against subversive activities in this country.

While the schooling of youngsters must be left to our educators, the training of our young businessmen is your responsibility. The place to start is in your own business. Looking at it from the dollars-and-cents business viewpoint, you stand to gain tremendously from having your young men take a more active interest in the affairs of your business and your community. You must instill the idea of service in your young men. Every time you make a better American out of a young man you strike a definite and tangible blow at subversive forces in America.

Particularly in the field of good government is there a need for active interest on the part of your young men. Shouldn't we do something about our present system which permits a young man to reach voting age without ever giving a thought as to how and why he should exercise his voting privilege? And after many of our young men and women pass their twenty-first birthday they still give little thought or no thought to this important obligation of voting and taking an active role in their government.

Did you ever stop to realize the significance of this lack of interest on the part of so many of our young men and women? You work with these young people every day and take it for granted that because they were born into a democratic society—just as you were—they will automatically learn about and come to appreciate the advantages of that system.

But, as is often the case, when individuals are born to advantages, they are apt to accept them casually and place little value on them. Too often we find our young people apathetic toward the American system of government with the result that they are more interested in Lana Turner's latest romance than in making an intelligent choice of the public officials who will govern them.

I would like to include here a little story which shows how some of our youngsters feel about the free-enterprise system in America. A young student, competing in the finals of the Jaycee-sponsored contest, I Speak for Democracy, recently expressed this in a clear-cut, refreshing way.

She started out her talk by saying, "Did you ever consider that 'American' ends in the words 'I can'?" I can worship where I please, work where I please, say what I please. Why? I am an American. Be sure that no employee of yours ever fails to realize what it means to be an American.

Make capitalism and the American system work and you will prevent communism and every other "ism" from creeping into our Government. But to make it work, you must encourage your young men to say, with sincerity, "I can." Give them the opportunity and they will accept the responsibility for they want to be able to say, "I can."

It isn't only verbal encouragement that those 17,000,000 young people in America between the ages of 21 and 36 need from you business and professional and industrial leaders.

This is not a question of "Do as I say, not as I do." No, that won't work with these young people. As a business leader, you should take your obligation of citizenship as seriously as you take your business obligation. Set an example of good citizenship for your employees and young men. For example, did you know that in the 1946 gubernatorial election in Texas only 32 percent of the eligible voters paid their poll taxes and, of that small number, only 74 percent actually voted?

When we fail to vote, we are permitting well-organized minority groups to gain control of our Government. We are defeating majority rule. Business men too often have adopted the attitude that politics and politicians are crooked and refuse to take an interest in elections. As a result, people who had little, if any, conception of the problems of business are running our politics, put in office by business men who didn't vote or were too busy to devote time to public affairs.

I have great faith in the American people—they can be trusted to do what is right—but they just aren't interested enough in the business of government. You must, in some way, expand this interest. It's good business for you to have as many people as possible take an active interest in good government.

If the free-enterprise system is to survive, then it will survive only because public opinion is in favor of a free-enterprise system over a controlled economy. Therefore, it is high time that you, as business leaders, speak up for our democratic system, that the positive aspects of our economy and our own governmental system be accentuated—rather than pointing out the negative side of foreign "isms."

You must do some deep objective thinking about the advantages of the American system. You must dramatize the fundamentals of that system so that everyone in America will understand what makes us strong. Sell America to yourself—then go out and sell it to the rest of the people.

Start with your own organizations. Bring home to your employees the reasons why Americans enjoy the highest standard of living in the world. Dramatize it—make it live for them.

Point out that America differs from other countries in that its great so-called middle classes are the ones who enjoy that high standard. Let them know that in other nations there are great gulfs between the high- and the low-income groups. Let the American people know that they enjoy their high standards because of the remarkable system under which they live.

I have urged you to take an active interest in your government and that you encourage your young employees to do the same. Let me urge you do something more. You can make a real contribution to our democratic form of government by applying some modern business methods to make that government work.

I am advocating that you business leaders, in the interest of better government, join with other public-spirited citizens in endowing a nonpartisan Better Government Foundation. The aim of the foundation would be to give us all better and more efficient leadership in public affairs and to encourage more active and intelligent participation in government on the part of more of our people.

The business of government—local, State and national—is the biggest in the world. No other business, directly or indirectly, affects so many persons every day of their lives. Yet we have been content to allow as few as 25 percent of our eligible voters in this State to direct the affairs of the remaining citizens. That's not good business procedure, is it?

Our leadership in the important business of government is too often selected in a random, hit-or-miss fashion by this minority of our citizens. Since the business of government is so important, why not set up an endowment foundation, financially independent and not subject to pressure, to study our problems of government as well as ways to broaden the base of participation and extend the privileges of franchise?

Funds for the support of this Better Government Foundation would be solicited from those willing and able to contribute to this cause without expecting any return other than the benefits of better government for all. You, as business leaders, readily can see the savings and general benefits resulting from a more efficient and able administration of government. These benefits would amply repay any investment in this program for better government. With increased participation in public affairs on the part of our citizens, we shall be helping to strengthen our American way of life by making democracy in action work.

Such a foundation not only would conduct campaigns to get more of our people to vote, but also crystallize the issues in order that they might do so intelligently. Special programs could be directed toward younger people, designed to prepare and equip them for the duties and responsibilities in business, in the community and in life.

I hope that you will feel a desire to help train your young men early to be your successors and the Nation's future leaders. By giving them the benefit of your knowledge and experience, you will help them to do better than you have—and in their time, I know they will pass on your knowledge so that their successors may do even better than they.

Here is a little bit of verse, entitled "Every Son Must Rise Above His Father," which aptly states our situation:

"No river ever rises
Higher than its source.
That the Old World "physics"
We break that law, of course.

"Our law is a new one;
Every father's son
Must rise above his father
Before his days are done.

"Must go up head and shoulders,
See more than he saw.
Be better than his father,
That's the unbreakable law.

"The plumber leads his little son
By his rough hand;
Proud to lead a lawyer
And governor of the land.

"The farmer trots a poet
On his big gnarled knee,
Glad to bear more living
Than the best can be

"The carpenter builds a dwelling,
His son plays in the chips;
But he knows his small one
Will build great boats or ships.

"We live in our children,
We train young feet to go
Up hills we dared not dream of,
So America will grow."

Fort Leonard Wood

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PARKE M. BANTA
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 6, 1948

Mr. BANTA. Mr. Speaker, Fort Leonard Wood is situated in my district. It is a military installation which during the war, at least, was splendidly equipped and of sufficient size to provide every necessary facility for making it one of the finest military training centers in the Nation. It has been deactivated since March 1946, and all of us in Missouri have been interested to know whether or not in the opinion of the Department of the Army, it is important to retain it for our future security and national defense. If it is, we want it to be retained, but not on a perpetual inactive basis at the expense of the American taxpayers. I have repeatedly urged that if it is necessary to retain it, that it should be promptly reactivated, and if it is not necessary to retain it, that it should be promptly returned to private ownership.

In this connection, I should like to call to the attention of the Congress an editorial which appeared in the Rolla Daily News, August 3, 1948, which, under leave granted me by the House, I am herewith inserting in the RECORD:

THE FORT WOOD DEBACLE

The Army, it seems, has turned thumbs down on Fort Leonard Wood as a training base for its peacetime soldiers.

Such action, taken by the high command in Washington, seems ridiculous to say the very least, and for a variety of reasons.

Most important reason is that high-ranking officers of World War II, men who knew how and where to train men to fight the greatest of all wars, time and again termed Fort Leonard Wood "the greatest training base in America."

Those officers, including an impressive list of generals who distinguished themselves in battle, all recognized the fact that Fort Wood was an ideal training center, suited to the training of men for combat.

At Fort Wood, these officers found every type of physical equipment, every type of terrain, modern buildings, more-than-adequate storage facilities, and every other type of facility, making it one of the finest such centers in the country.

Many thousands of men, trained at Fort Leonard Wood, fought successfully on every battlefield on earth during the recent conflict. They were well trained, ready for combat when they left the Ozarks training center.

And now, it seems, those identical facilities are "not good enough" for the training of peacetime soldiers.

The same facilities are there—the same buildings, the same training areas, the same varied terrain, the same quartermaster and transportation facilities.

But it isn't good enough for peacetime training.

In the meantime, a $50,000,000 military installation is growing up in weeds and beginning to rot for lack of proper care. Hundreds of thousands of dollars of tax money is being allowed to waste away because a military camp which was one of the best in the world during the recent war is now not good enough for peacetime training.

There is no estimate to the amount of money spent on Fort Leonard Wood during the past 9 years. Millions were poured into the camp to make it the best possible center for training troops.

Now it's not good enough for peacetime uses.

Perhaps other camps will be built, other military establishments constructed, with millions of dollars spent. Then, perhaps, in 9 or 10 years, the Army will decide that this new camp is not good enough, and it will be tossed in the ash pit.

We are solidly for military preparedness and all that goes with it, but we're beginning to see why many economy-minded Congressmen often slash military appropriations to the bone.

Such a debacle as the Fort Leonard Wood situation would make anyone wonder about the necessity of such vast funds.

Just how high is the high command?

Federal Paroles and Hon. Fred E. Busbey, of Illinois

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES W. VURSELL
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 6, 1948

Mr. VURSELL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from the Third Illinois District, Representative FRED BUSBEY, has done a great service to the entire country as well as to the people of Chicago, his home city, in his most courageous endeavor to get at the truth of how it was possible for the four Capone gangsters to secure paroles, and to have them recommitted to prison. He is deserving of an expression of appreciation from this Congress.

It is now a matter of history that Paul Ricca, alias DeLucia; Louis Campagna, Charles Gioe, and Phil D'Andrea, all of the malodorous Capone gang of Chicago, were paroled from Federal prisons on August 13, 1947. It is also a matter of history that, now, Gangsters Campagna and Gioe are back in prison and there is a warrant for Ricca's return to serve the balance of his 10-year sentence. The gentleman from the Third District of Illinois, Mr. BUSBEY, says the rearrest of D'Andrea is under consideration.

It is unfortunate that a committee of Congress has to take time away from legislative duties to correct the miscarriage of justice by officials of the Federal Parole Board. But it was unusual for the Federal Parole Board to open prison doors for such characters as were sent back to Chicago on August 13, 1947.

Representative BUSBEY had never been a law-enforcement officer and he had no previous experience in battling criminals. In his first term in the House of Representatives he used all his intelligence and energy in a great campaign against enemies of his country engaged in subversive activities. Last year he was assigned to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments and was given membership on a subcommittee assigned by Chairman CLARE HOFFMAN, of Michigan, to investigate the operations of the Department of Justice under which the Parole Board functions. The release of the gangsters in Mr. BUSBEY'S home city of Chicago was a challenge to him that he did not hesitate to answer.

The men paroled had been convicted of a huge extortion racket. They obtained more than $1,000,000 from reputable businessmen through threats of violence and business disaster. The judge and prosecutor said they were menaces to society and deserved long sentences. Because they had committed gross crimes against numerous labor unions, the court said they must be put away for a long period.

The past history of the men convicted showed they were confirmed criminals. It was an outrage to show them any leniency. It was an affront to the people of his city, Representative BUSBEY said, as well as to the law-abiding citizens of the country, to give paroles to such men as Ricca, Campagna, D'Andrea, and Gioe.

Mr. BUSBEY appealed to Chairman CLARE HOFFMAN, who called the subcommittee into session in Chicago to make inquiry. The revelations of the subcommittee have been startling. The country knows that a great miscarriage of justice was perpetrated when those men were released.

The subcommittee, without objections, held that the paroles should not have been granted and revocation was recommended. The evidence placed before the Congress was due largely to the initiative and intelligent work, as well as to the courage, integrity and good citizenship of Representative BUSBEY. Much credit is also due Chairman CLARE HOFFMAN and the entire subcommittee for the work they have done to date in this investigation.

It is no secret to his colleagues that Representative BUSBEY'S service was given with full knowledge of the risks he was taking. He fearlessly pitted himself against a powerful criminal organization. His conduct in this campaign was equally meritorious to that of his service to his country in the First World War. In the present instance he was pitted against an insidious enemy at home—criminals engaged in guerrilla warfare against the law-abiding element.

Representative BUSBEY'S constituents should be proud of him. Those of his colleagues who have been in touch with him in the past year know that he is deserving of the trust and continued confidence of his constituents. The Congress of the United States needs more Members like Representative BUSBEY.

Fact on Inflation: Federal Reserve Bank Gold Reserve Requirements

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 6, 1948

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, first, the President's proposal to increase reserve requirements of member banks of the Federal Reserve System by itself and alone would not be sufficient to curb inflation. However, it would be useful as one of the elements in the comprehensive inflation-control program as outlined in the eight points of the President's message.

Second, the increase in the gold-reserve requirements of the Federal Reserve banks as now proposed by the House Banking and Currency Committee would make no contribution whatsoever to the fight against inflation, but, if adopted, might be of disastrous consequences to the economy as a whole.

Although at the present time all Federal Reserve banks combined are holding gold-certificate reserves in excess of the proposed new requirements, these reserves are unevenly distributed among the 12 Federal Reserve banks, and the reserve of several banks would be insufficient to cover the new requirements.

According to the testimony presented by Marriner Eccles before the House Banking and Currency Committee, the new proposal might precipitate the kind of money panic which the Federal Reserve System was created to prevent.

Furthermore, the new requirements might jeopardize the ability of some Reserve banks to supply credit to their member banks and compel the Federal Reserve System to abandon support of the Government bond market.

The Republican bill passed yesterday, while completely ineffective in the fight against inflation, might precipitate a run on the currency and the collapse of the bond market.

Legislative Program of the Special Session

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 6, 1948

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a letter which I have received from the Reverend Leland B. Henry, chairman of the Inter-Diocesan Committee on Legislation. This committee represents the six Episcopal dioceses in the State of New York.

INTER-DIOCESAN COMMITTEE ON LEGISLATION,
New York, July 30, 1948.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: The Inter-Diocesan Committee on Legislation represents the six Episcopal dioceses in the State of New York. As chairman of the committee, I am writing you concerning the legislative program of the special session. I am keenly aware of the difficulty of your task in the combined heat of a Washington summer and of a political campaign, but there are three items before the Congress in which we have a definite interest and which we hope may receive favorable action.

1. Housing: the Taft-Ellender-Wagner bill is a carefully drawn, constructive measure, dealing with one of the great social problems of America. It is the result of detailed study over a period of more than 2 years. It has strong bipartisan support, as indicated by the names of its sponsors. We hope that you will use your influence to bring the bill out of the Rules Committee, and that you will support it when it reaches the floor.

2. The United Nations loan: The success of the UN in achieving a truce in Palestine gives new hope to its supporters. The tension in Berlin is a fresh demonstration of the need for a strong international organization to maintain the peace. There would seem to be every reason for passing the bill authorizing a loan of $65,000,000 for the construction of the UN headquarters in New York City. Here again is a measure with the strongest possible bipartisan support, which is merely awaiting favorable action by the House.

3. Displaced persons: After 3 years of study and debate a displaced-persons law was finally passed, which, while a step in the right direction, is discriminatory in its provisions. I hope that it may be possible to amend the law to make it more equitable. Incidentally, State Industrial Commissioner Edward Corsi was quoted in the New York Times July 29, 1948, as saying that "about 50,000 DP's, properly selected by occupation, could be absorbed by industry and agriculture in this State."

Respectfully yours,
LELAND B. HENRY,
Chairman.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to note that this House yesterday passed the legislation authorizing the loan to the United Nations.

I hope that this House will, before we adjourn, pass a public housing and slum-clearance bill, and an amendment to the discriminatory displaced-persons law which was so hastily and improvidently passed in the closing days of the last session.

Antidiscrimination Gets Results

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ARTHUR G. KLEIN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 6, 1948

Mr. KLEIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave I am inserting in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an article taken from the New York Herald Tribune of August 6 showing how successfully legal inhibitions against overt discrimination in employment have worked out in those States which have adopted fair employment practice laws.

I want to point out, of course, that the New York Herald Tribune is a conservative, fair-minded journal of great editorial influence, the mouthpiece of that portion of the Republican Party which is making a serious effort to live in the twentieth century. It is not a liberal or a socially conscious or a vanguard publication except in the most profound connotation of those words: The New York Herald Tribune, as successfully as any contemporary journal, reflects the fundamental libertarianism, the dedication to human freedom and dignity, on which this great Nation was founded.

When the Herald Tribune publishes an article like this it is not to prove a prejudged position but to examine and report upon a sociopolitical fact.

ANTIDISCRIMINATION GETS RESULTS—A STUDY OF NEW FAIR EMPLOYMENT LAWS' OPERATION IN FOUR EASTERN STATES

(By Kings Ransom)

(Mr. Ransom, a writer for the Des Moines Register and Tribune and the Economist, of London, England, recently passed two weeks in New York, New Jersey, Connecticut, and Massachusetts looking into the antidiscrimination laws.)

Four eastern States and the cities of Chicago, Minneapolis, Milwaukee, Cincinnati and Philadelphia have adopted laws against racial or religious discrimination in employment based on the New York Ives commission report of 1945. Last year twenty-eight other bills based on the New York law (not counting five toothless ones) were introduced in eighteen northern State legislatures. (It normally takes two or three sessions to pass such a law.)

New York's leadership is recognized almost blindly out over the country, where such slight deviations from the New York pattern as substituting a single administrator for a commission are taken by zealots as sabotage. Yet zealots in New York, equally blind, regard Governor Dewey as a late and unreliable convert because he postponed passage from 1944 to 1945 and strengthened the law in the process. He has since supported it with able appointments, substantial funds and full cooperation from other State departments.

How are the new laws working after three years' experience in New York and New Jersey, two years in Massachusetts, one year in Connecticut?

Negroes are the chief beneficiaries but by no means the only ones: Jews, foreign-born and Catholics are often discriminated against, for example.

Opponents of the law feared a deluge of complaints. So far that has not happened. Instead, it is often difficult for State agencies (and even minority pressure groups) to get informants to file formal complaints, and the worst violations of the spirit of the law occur in firms where minority members know the policy and avoid rebuffs by never applying.

Enforcement staffs are not the "hordes of bureaucrats" opponents predicted. There are fewer than 35 complaint investigators in all 4 States combined, and one-hundred-odd antidiscrimination employees of all kinds (roughly 70 of them in New York State), from switchboard operators to commissioners, in investigating, educational, and research subdivisions.

That is not enough to be a noticeable burden on taxpayers, nor to turn employment practices "fair" overnight. But it has been enough to reverse the ominous trend which had been squeezing Negroes out of skilled crafts, denying them entry into many of the newer industries and occupations, confining their leaders to serving "colored only."

The wartime labor shortage had reversed the trend momentarily. Since then, the fair employment practice States have been working out new methods for holding wartime gains and winning new ones—slowly and gently, with prospects for more permanence than those won by northern bayonets in the 1860's and '70's had.

New York State's is the largest operation in terms of budget, staff or number of cases handled, New York has the prestige of primacy and the national spotlight. But Connecticut has the latest and most sweeping law. It covers employees of nonprofit concerns as none of the other State laws do; and the Connecticut law specifically says that the word "discrimination" shall include segregation and separation. The Massachusetts and Connecticut laws permit the commission itself to initiate a complaint.

Connecticut excels in use of psychological research. Smallness of the State makes it possible also for its compact unit to settle a case in one week, where New York's may take 14. In proportion to population, however, Massachusetts and New Jersey have the largest staffs and settle the most complaints.

All four States do a great deal of social survey and educational work organizing unpaid local councils in New York, New Jersey, and Massachusetts to help with this and with getting the word around. In Connecticut they prefer not to start new organizations, but confine themselves to giving training courses to interested people from key existing organizations.

New Jersey and Connecticut have single administrators instead of the clumsy commission form of administration, which New York and Massachusetts took over from the Federal Fair Employment Practices Commission. It should be said that in New York the chairman of the commission, on the basis of a single phrase in the law, plus personal leadership, turns the headless monster of the commission into a working department. The size of the operation in New York makes division of labor between the staff field investigator (who probes the facts) and the investigating commissioner (who negotiates a settlement) a useful administrative device.

Nevertheless, there is a logical inconsistency in having the commissioners simultaneously be representative of the various racial and religious strains (as they have been in practice in all four States by appointing at least one Negro, one Jew, one son of the new immigration, etc.) and administrators representing the whole State. The New Jersey-Connecticut system of a part-time representative commission giving advice and making studies, and in Connecticut actually appointing the administrator and making policy for him, is better political science.

Commissions and staffs in the four States keep in close touch with one another, learning from one another and from the criticisms of the public. Social scientists of the universities and the voluntary associations have been following their work with critical sympathy and solid research of their own. The campaign against discrimination is being handled as a conscious adventure in social pioneering: Modestly, discreetly, yet with soaring hopes.

The nearest thing to a quantitative check on the results so far is an unpublished survey by the National Urban League, Negro social-service agency, which is critical of the administrators as too mild. The survey covers 25 American cities, mostly northern, where the league has executive secretaries equipped to do the field work. It sought to find out how many Negroes are employed in private enterprises for profit (stores, banks, insurance companies, law firms, manufacturing, etc.), in white-collar jobs, technical jobs, professional jobs, and not serving merely in Negro communities. (Negroes had found white-collar jobs in government and nonprofit social agencies long before they could in free enterprise.)

In the 25 cities the survey found 7,734 such Negro employees on January 1, almost all in positions closed to Negroes 6 or 8 years ago. More than half this number are in just four cities—the ones in anti-discrimination-law States:

New York	2,613
Boston	886
Newark	148
Hartford	106

Chicago, with 2,524 additional Negro white-collar, technical, and professional employees, seems at first glance to rival New York, and indeed it is one of the cities with a new fair-employment-practice ordinance. But so far almost all these Negro employees have been mail-order clerks in the large catalog firms out at the edge of town, where they do not meet the public. In all Chicago there were only 3 Negro department-store sales persons outside Negro areas to New York's 382 and little Hartford's 89.

Leave out Chicago as exceptional, and the advanced position of the anti-discrimination-law States is still more striking. In the remaining 24 cities 77 percent of 4,850 Negro white-collar-and-up employees are in the 4 cities of New York, Newark, Hartford, and Boston.

In company after company, in spite of theoretical willingness to employ Negroes, it took the law to get employers past the hump of dreading what customers and other employees might say. Those who are prejudiced are particularly likely to be deferential to authority. So the mere passage of a law with teeth, before any actual attempt to enforce it, brings some changes in employment practices in order to conform.

In all four States the anti-discrimination people are charged by law to try "conference, conciliation, and persuasion" before they turn to enforcement, and to engage in broad educational work to supplement their action on complaints. As the Ives commission put it, in this way most complaints can be settled "on the threshold."

The old Federal FEPC, by persuasion, plus threats to cut off employment service referrals and to cancel priorities or war contracts, used to settle about 1,000 cases a year in the whole country and pile up a backlog of 1,400 unsettled cases. The New York State War Council used to settle "about 95 percent" of more than 300 cases a year, also solely in war industry and Government service.

But the new State anti-discrimination agencies, on combined budgets 20 percent higher than the Federal FEPC had in its palmiest days, are settling 1,200 cases a year in the four States alone and do not give up a single meritorious case, though some drag on and on. They are convinced that powers of enforcement are necessary in the background, but not once so far have they used them. Not once have they gone so far as public administrative hearing on a complaint, which must precede any cease-and-desist order. These orders themselves are not law, but just preliminary to equity court action to enforce the law, with the court free to amend or reject the order.

Elmer Carter, of the New York commission, told of an employer who did not want to settle a complaint as Carter suggested:

"I could see that he was getting embarrassed. His face was red and he looked out of the window. When I assured him that he didn't have to follow this recommendation, that it was in no way compulsory, he asked what the next step would be. I said that I would then recommend it for a hearing, in which case the issue would be reviewed before three commissioners—going over the entire record * * * He asked whether the public would be at the meeting.

"'Yes,' I replied.

"To this he said: 'I don't want a hearing.'"

Embarrassment, not harassment or punishment, is the chief sanction—embarrassment over being caught not living up in deeds to American principles of fairness we all acknowledge in words.

Answer by Mr. Buchanan: "Good Riddance"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK BUCHANAN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 6, 1948

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter and portion of an article by George Dixon from the Washington Times-Herald of August 5, 1948:

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 5, 1948.
Hon. FRANK BUCHANAN,
New House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR FRANK: I hope by this time that you, in your eloquent way, have taken care of the infamous scoundrels who would defile, defame, and desecrate the beautiful metropolis of McKeesport.

Sincerely,
CHARLES PATRICK CLARK.

[From the Washington Times-Herald of August 5, 1948]

This almost killed Representative JOHN MCDOWELL, of Pennsylvania, No. 2 interrogator of the House Committee on Un-American Activities.

The committee, having commandeered blonde bombshell Bentley, did not wish to lose her. After the morning session it wanted to make sure she would be back in the afternoon to continue her testimony, so Mr. MCDOWELL volunteered to take her to lunch.

They repaired to the dining room at the Congressional Hotel, where Mr. MCDOWELL was his winning conversational self. Miss Bentley asked the solon what part of the country he hailed from and Mr. MCDOWELL said western Pennsylvania.

"Well, I declare," exclaimed the witness. "I used to live out there myself—in McKeesport."

"McKeesport," beamed Mr. MCDOWELL. "That used to be my old district."

It looked as if a beautiful bond had been established.

"Yes," continued Miss Bentley, "McKeesport. Do you know something? That's how I became a Communist."

"What?" gasped Mr. MCDOWELL. "What was there about my old district that could possibly lead you to become a Communist?"

"Oh," replied Miss Bentley, airily, "it was so dirty, so grimy. I don't see how you could stand it."

High Cost of Living

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUBERT S. ELLIS
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 6, 1948

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the high cost of living is the chief topic of interest these days, there are certain pertinent facts that cannot be overlooked.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics has stated categorically that food costs represent 40 percent of the average person's outlay and are therefore given a weight of the over-all cost-of-living index.

It is recognized that the most important items in the average person's diet is bread, meat, dairy products, eggs, and poultry. All of these commodities are sold in the free market, and the cost of grain as well as the cost of animals and poultry determines in most parts the ultimate cost to the consumer. With a great supply of grain and meat animals, the price of these basic commodities would go down. The cost and production of all meat animals is dependent largely on the cost and production of grain. With a greater supply of wheat and of beef cattle, the prices of bread and meat would go down. Yet what do we find the administration doing?

On July 24 the United States Department of Agriculture put out a release stating the national goals for 1949 production of several important farm commodities which were being recommended to the States by the Department of Agriculture. What are the recommendations with respect to wheat and with respect to beef cattle? On wheat the Department of Agriculture recommends that the acreage to be seeded in wheat for 1949 be decreased from the 1948 planting by 8 percent. With respect to beef cattle, the Department recommends that the farmers decrease their beef cattle breeding herds by about 517,000 head below the number on farms on January 1, 1948. In other words, our Government is officially trying to decrease production both of wheat and of beef cattle in the very moment when it is talking about excessive high food prices.

All these things point to the fact that the predicament we find ourselves in today both here and abroad is due to 15 years of mismanagement of our Federal affairs on the part of the New Deal administration.

Address by Hon. Raymond E. Baldwin, of Connecticut

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HORACE SEELY-BROWN, JR.
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 6, 1948

Mr. SEELY-BROWN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am pleased to include in the Appendix of the RECORD an excellent address made by the Honorable RAYMOND E. BALDWIN, Senator from the State of Connecticut, before the Republican National Convention on June 22, 1948:

We are met here not merely to name on behalf of the Republican Party a candidate for the Presidency, we are met here on behalf of the American people to name the next President of the United States. More than the vote of our party is at stake in our decision. What is at stake is nothing less that the fate of freedom.

If with mankind at the crossroads we aim to make ourselves and our party merely the instruments of political victory, then, history will record in blood and anguish that we have failed. In that case, we will deserve to fail. I do not believe we will fail. We will not fail because our party is now the custodian of the will and aspirations of 140,000,000 Americans. Failure is not part of the American tradition.

To succeed will require of us vision above the claims of petty self-interest. We have that kind of vision. It will require of us courage beyond the call of party duty. We have that kind of courage.

Above all, it will require of us faith in place of today's uncertainties and confusions. We have that kind of faith. If we give voice and leadership to such vision, such courage, and to such a faith, then we can be sure that history will record, "Well done," and America—an America prosperous and at peace—will rise up to call us blessed.

There is much in the world we face which merits condemnation. Abroad, totalitarianism, having been heroically beaten down on one front, has remobilized under new, more seductive banners. It is on the march on other fronts. The threat of that resurgence reaches to every fireside. Here at home, a national administration, tired and punch-drunk, waves and weaves and wobbles; often failing to make up its mind but never failing to change it; trying with pleasantries and wisecracks to match its little men against this big moment. The threat of that manifest mediocrity clouds the present and puts the future in jeopardy.

It is part of our duty, as representatives of a people who desire better and who deserve better, to condemn in language too clear and specific to be mistaken, these dangers abroad and these weaknesses at home.

But this convention will measure up to its historical opportunity less by what it condemns than by what it confirms. The American people are well versed in the dangers and weaknesses from which they seek to be delivered. What they seek of us is more than a rehash of warmed-over diatribe. Their first concern is not with the past. Their first concern is with the future. That must be our first concern. What have we to offer America?

We can offer, first of all, opportunity. America, as in the days of our pioneering forebears, is still an adventure. It is an unfinished adventure. The American people are not looking for leadership whose first commitment is to the status quo and which has nothing better to offer to Americans than a standstill, mark-time America.

For a decade and a half, opportunity—as America understands opportunity—has been stifled and hamstrung. For a decade and a half the productive know-how of the American people has been in leash to the Government. For a decade and a half we have had an administration in Washington which thought, and still thinks, chiefly in terms of restrictions, directions, and controls. The American people are straining on the leash. It is our responsibility to free them from it. Then America, this era of defeatism behind it, will be again—as it once was—a land of opportunity.

But the opportunity we are here to offer, which the American people expect us to offer, is more than material. It is also moral. As no place else in the world, as nowhere else in history, America has given content and meaning to freedom. But that adventure, the adventure of freedom, is likewise still unfinished. It is not enough that in terms of material blessings we shall be increasingly prosperous. In terms of freedom, and its practice, we must be increasingly right. This is our moral opportunity: To open doors that are shut because of creed, or race, or color; to wipe out the last vestige of underprivilege and the last vestige of special privilege; to war on poverty and sickness; in short, to dedicate ourselves to the Americanizing of every corner of America. Then we will be prepared to meet totalitarianism wherever its ugliness appears with the unanswerable answer. We will be embarked once more on the great American adventure.

What have we to offer America? We can offer, in the first place, opportunity, and in the second place, teamwork. For much too long, we have had leadership in Washington which made political capital out of disunity, which, aiming to rule, sought first to divide. An America arrayed against itself is not the America we believe in. That is not the America we propose to have. Here, in this convention, that is not the kind of America we represent. We are not here as the puppets of political bosses to vote our "Ja" as the bosses dictate. We are not here as the hated and hating agents of selfish blocs—ready to sacrifice the well-being of all America for the benefit of a few Americans. We are ready to offer a team that is all-American. With the backing of all the people, we are ready to support that team in order that above division, above class conflict, above the disunities which now afflict and hamper us, we can win together against whatever odds.

We can offer in the third place leadership. We do not seek in this convention to find a strong man who can rule America or rule the world. We seek, and we will find, a man who will return the rule of America to the people of America. That is what we mean by leadership, a leadership responsive to the people.

The world has had its fill of one-man rule and paid a disastrous price for it. The basic issue that confronts us here at home, the issue that confronts civilization the world over, is to unseat from places of authority those who presume to know what is best for the people and restore to the people authority to decide for themselves. They alone are fit to make the future. They alone can make a future worth having. We can give, to America, a leadership which will establish once more the people's leadership. We want no other. There can be no better leadership than that.

Finally, we can offer here a program—a program filled with practical hope—for this world in which freedom, the freedom for which we have so often and so lately fought, hangs in a precarious balance. There are four points in such a program.

First, it is a question of strengthening the United Nations. Since man has finally perfected the means of destroying himself, there can be no more urgent problem than to learn how to band together the powers of the world in an effective program for world harmony before we pass our last safe chance. Our task now is to cease to regard our membership in the United Nations as a mere expression of our conscience and begin to regard it as an expression of our will.

The second part of a coordinated national program is concerned with the use of the tremendous sums we have voted for the reconstruction of war-damaged nations. How much we have appropriated is of lesser importance than how we use that which we have agreed to provide. We cannot buy peace. We cannot vote peace. But we believe that we can, with such a program, help build peace.

The third part of a coordinated program is concerned with our own national defense. It is tragic that we must waste any part of our wealth or energies on military preparedness. Men die fast enough without destroying each other. The question for every American is not, "Do we want peace?" it is rather, "How do we get peace?" In that search we cannot leave our people inadequately defended, with the forlorn hope that others will recognize in our weakness the desire for peace and so follow our example.

The fourth, and in many ways the most important part of a coordinated program for peace and prosperity, is the strengthening of our own national economy. High prices and the threat of inflation are no less worrisome to our people today than they were a year ago. They have only been clouded over by other issues. We know that we cannot broaden our living by timidly or selfishly limiting our production or our work. If men do not produce, others cannot buy, and others cannot work.

We cannot have poverty here and defeat poverty abroad. We cannot see freedom lost in the world and keep our own.

This is no longer merely a land of opportunity. It is a world of opportunity. God has given us a great and free nation. He has entrusted us with the physical wealth and strength so we could exert a spiritual and moral leadership for all his people. This Republic will live so long as you give it life. We have in our hands the means to destroy or build the future of the world. The tools are all too alike. The choice—the opportunity—is ours.

We can restore to government the hard work, the moral standards, the tolerance, the freedom that lives in the American farmer and shopowner and housewife and clerk and factory worker. We can make our party the party of "Middle America"; and this Government, our Government.

We are not here seeking to provide for the American people the lesser of two evils. We are not here seeking 4 years of political happy hunting. We are gathered, here, hoping to rebuild a government "of the people, by the people, and for the people." We are here to rebuild a new revitalized, progressive party of youth—a party which the young people of our Nation will want to join to secure the strength and the protection of freedom for many years to come.

Inspired by the love of liberty and acknowledging the divine source of our convictions, our forbears came to this strange and then forbidding land. In the wilderness they cleared a place for a new altar of freedom. The faith that drove them, through peril, toil, and pain, to that achievement was an ancient faith. But they relighted it and gave it such new meaning that men everywhere, to the ends of the earth saw that light and caught that meaning and were gladdened in their hearts and lifted up. Now, around that altar a great and powerful nation has arisen. This Nation, our Nation, is what it is today because down through the long and trying years, devout, farseeing men and women have tended the fires of that faith and with their lives have stood guard at that altar. Their task, so nobly done, so nobly carried forward, now devolves on us. Let us here mightily resolve that their vision will be our vision in order that for ourselves and for the world our America can be what their America has been.

Statement of Illinois Bankers Association

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 6, 1948

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following release of Illinois Bankers Association, 105 West Monroe Street, Chicago, Ill.:

The declaration of policy adopted by the fifty-seventh convention of the Illinois Bankers Association, June 4, 1948, contained the following paragraph on credit control:

"In the effort to control the inflationary trend, certain agencies and personalities have magnified the influence of bank operation on the inflationary spiral. We endorse the plan of the American Bankers Association for voluntary credit controls exercised by individual banks, and oppose centralized Federal controls."

In keeping with this declared policy of Illinois bankers, Harry C. Hausman, secretary of the association, in an effort to forestall an apparent temporizing concession to the President's demand for "positive action" against inflation, directed the following letter air mail on August 2 to Messrs. STRATTON and MCMILLEN, Members from Illinois of the House Banking and Currency Committee:

"This morning I wired you as follows:

" 'Please oppose proposal to increase reserve requirements 10 percent. Am writing you at length air mail.'

"Radio and newspapers are rather insistent that the Congress will pass legislation on the President's recommendation to increase the reserve requirements of banks, including nonmember banks of the Federal Reserve System, by 10 percent and to provide for some controls over bank credit, including installment loans.

"In behalf of the banks in Illinois, we want to explain to you our opposition particularly to the proposal to increase the reserves. The general public is not any too well informed about this and it has been made to appear to them that the banks are in some way or other responsible for the inflationary effects that have been demonstrated during the past decade and will be responsible for any acceleration of the inflationary spiral in the future unless bank credits are curtailed and legal reserves increased. The general public is, too, confused as to just what this all means. It does not distinguish between legal reserves and the reserves shown on banks' statements of condition. If I may, I will put our objections in the form of questions which I would greatly appreciate your putting to any of those 'experts' or 'authorities' who come before your committee supporting this proposal.

"Hog prices are now around $31 per hundredweight. In what way are the legal reserves of banks responsible for this price?

"Prime steers are well above $31 as are all other live animals, proportionately, which are delivered to our stockyards. While these food animals are going up, each week grain futures, including all cereals, are going down. What effect, if any, has legal bank reserves either on the increases in animals or the decreases in grains? After all, what we are mostly interested in is how much it costs you and me to buy food and other necessities for our living.

"Recently several of the automobile manufacturers announced increases of 8 percent on the wholesale price of automobiles. Did or did not the present reserve requirements influence these increases?

"The steel companies have announced several increases in the prices of finished steel. What effect, if any, has the legal reserve of banks on these increases?

"The third round of wage increases is now in the process. Do bank reserves have anything to do with that?

"Building costs have gone up to the point where an ordinary house has practically outpriced its market. Did legal bank reserves cause this?

"I could go on and ask questions of this sort and fill several pages and I think that you could add to those that I would think of, but ask these questions of those who come to support this idea and see if they can give you any affirmative answers to them. Then ask them what effect, if any, have the operations of the Commodity Credit Corporation on prices of the things that we buy for our family and ourselves to eat. What effect, if any, has the Marshall Plan on the prices of not only the things that we eat but the clothes that we wear and the articles we use. Ask them if they are not treating legal bank reserves in the same way as we would have treated them back in the days of the call money market on the stock exchanges. Then they did have something to do with inflation as also did the rediscount rates, but in the meantime, call money doesn't amount to an ant hill. Margins for the purchase of securities have been increased to the point where speculation has been reduced to a minimum.

"Then ask them these questions: If legal reserves are increased, what would they do as responsible bank managers in the investment of bank funds. If Mr. Snyder or Mr. Eccles, for instance, were responsible for the operation of a bank and out of that operation had to meet the pay roll, the cost of supplies, and other operating expenses, including taxes and dividends and a reasonable reserve for losses, and were suddenly confronted with the necessity of reducing their loans and investments by 10 percent, would they not first sell their 'Governments' in order to effect that reduction? If they did sell their 'Governments,' who would buy them? Wouldn't the answer be the Federal Reserve banks? If the Federal Reserve banks bought these 'Governments' on the market, how would they pay for them? Would they not pay for them out of new money which they would print and would not that, therefore, inflate the currency outstanding and completely reverse the process of anti-inflation at which they are aiming? Would they not also be tempted to make speculative loans at a higher rate in order to compensate them for the loss of revenue resulting out of the idleness of 10 percent more of their deposits?

"I think that you will agree that these are not flippant questions, that we have been sold a bill of goods by fast-talking and loose-thinking people who set themselves up as authorities on economics and banking, and that they are hunting for a 'whipping boy' or 'scapegoat,' and that the banks seem to be to them the most likely ones to persecute and blame all of our difficulties on. I am sure that you will agree with me that the answers to these questions will definitely establish in your mind the undesirability and the unfairness of this proposal and will induce you in good conscience to vote against this proposal.

"It will be argued that by increasing the legal reserves the banks will have less funds to lend and thus the expansion of credit will be halted and by that action a phase of inflation will be halted. It is very, very doubtful if this would result. As I mentioned above, the tendency and temptation would be to sell 'Governments' and keep the loans up and particularly those loans which would bring a higher rate of interest and which would in themselves be inflationary. But the fact of the matter, as any of the bank-supervising authorities should know, is that the bankers are looking very carefully into all loan applications today, realizing that inventories and accounts receivable could take quite a tumble, particularly if the prices of farm products go off noticeably. Banks are quite wary today in extending credit and will be from now on until that 'bust,' which Marriner Eccles predicts is on the way and with which probably we will all agree, actually makes its appearance."

On August 3 Secretary Hausman sent the following telegram to Messrs. Stratton and McMillen and also to Jesse P. Wolcott, chairman of the House Banking and Currency Committee, Charles W. Tobey, chairman of the Senate Banking and Currency Committee, and to Harold Stonier, executive manager, American Bankers' Association:

"Illinois Bankers Association greatly concerned over item in this morning's newspapers and radio commentaries to the effect that proposal to increase reserves by 10 percent includes State nonmember banks. Illinois Bankers Association strongly opposed to increase regardless. However, to include State nonmember banks violates all principles of States' rights and is one step toward eliminating dual-banking system. The precedent can lead to most undesirable future results."

Secretary Hausman is also sending a letter to each bankers' association secretary quoting his telegram and urging them to take similar action.

ADA Public Opinion Poll on Special Session of Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD A. GARMATZ
OF MARYLAND
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 6, 1948

Mr. GARMATZ. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include in the Appendix of the RECORD, a letter I received from the Americans for Democratic Action, Baltimore branch, and the results of a survey conducted by them in Baltimore:

AMERICANS FOR DEMOCRATIC ACTION,
Baltimore, Md., August 3, 1948.

The Honorable EDWARD A. GARMATZ,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. GARMATZ: We are enclosing for your information the complete returns from ADA's public-opinion poll on the current special session of Congress. As you can see, the people of Baltimore have indicated their support of three of the President's recent recommendations. We feel that you would want to be informed of this poll and be assured that immediate and vigorous action by you in support of these measures will have strong public support.

We are also enclosing a statement issued by us today giving the position of ADA in respect to these results. The instruction sheets, work sheets, and questionnaire sheets are available in our office for your use if you so desire.

Very truly yours,
WILLIAM BOUCHER III,
President.

BALTIMORE ADA PUBLIC-OPINION POLL, TABULATED RESULTS AUGUST 2, 1948

Question A: Do you approve of the President's action in calling a special session of Congress?

		Percent
Yes	155	54
No	60	21
Don't know	74	25

Question B: Do you think the special session of Congress should take action on:

	Yes	Percent	No	Percent	Don't know	Percent	Total
Rising prices	259	85	26	8	20	7	305
High cost of housing	242	82	27	9	24	9	293
Federal aid to education	201	66	50	16	53	18	303
Civil-rights program	137	47	69	24	85	29	291

NOTE.—Only 16 complete refusals encountered (not interested; don't care to discuss, etc.); 2 refusals after first question.

The following statement was issued by Mr. William Boucher III, president of the Baltimore Chapter of Americans for Democratic Action:

"ADA public-opinion poll completed today shows the people of Baltimore to be vigorous in their approval of action by the present special session of Congress to halt rising prices and correct the present high cost of housing. Strong support for Federal aid to education, and immediate action on the President's civil-rights program was indicated in the same poll. We feel that the overwhelming public sentiment as expressed in the attached figures should be studied by the Maryland Representatives in Congress and should indicate to them the need for an end to political maneuvering and the demand for immediate congressional action. Certainly the Democratic Senators and Congressmen from Maryland can do no less than fight with all their talent and strength to support the President in his request and give life to their recently adopted platform. In view of their support of the President and the platform at the Philadelphia convention they are honor bound to act now. The two Republican Congressmen can be reassured that there is public sentiment to support opposition by them to adjournment of Congress without consideration of and action on the issues covered by this poll. We ask for an indication from our Senators and Congressmen of their stand on the important items supported so clearly by the people. We are confident that the figures represent a true picture of public opinion. The persons to be interviewed were chosen scientifically from all incomes and all sections of Baltimore. Our staff of interviewers were carefully instructed to insure impartiality. We were careful to guard against suggestive questions. We are convinced that the professional help we received plus the precautions to insure an impartial poll have given us an accurate guide of the public opinion in Baltimore."

Any Doubts About Whether the Republican Eightieth Congress Is the Worst in History Are Now Gone

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HERMAN P. EBERHARTER
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 6, 1948

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Washington Daily News of August 6, 1948, by Peter Edson:

THE "WORST CONGRESS"
(By Peter Edson)

If President Truman had any previous doubts about which was the worst Congress, they should all be gone by now.

For the brush-off which the Republican leadership has given to his anti-inflation proposals was really of hurricane proportions. It swept everything he laid on the table right into the wastebaskets.

If by so doing the Congressmen think they can go home leaving clean desks and clear consciences behind them, they may be headed for an unpleasant surprise. The facts and figures which administration leaders finally got together for presentation to Congress may rise like ghosts out of the scrapheaps into which they were swept, to haunt the homing Congressmen in the months and years ahead. In summary, Congress was warned that a business crash is inevitable unless something is done to prevent it.

Senator ROBERT A. TAFT'S Joint Committee on the Economic Report, which is supposed to be interested in such matters, did not even consider them. Last spring this committee investigated but did nothing about $5-a-ton steel price increases. The more recent $9-a-ton increases have been ignored completely.

President Truman pointed out in his press conference statement that Senate and House Agriculture committees never even met to see if there was anything they might do to increase food supplies or cut down prices to the consumers.

House Ways and Means and Senate Finance Committees, which handle tax matters, did not meet to consider President Truman's suggestion for the return of excess corporation profits taxes. The House Banking and Currency Committee only went through the motion of holding hearings on the proposed anti-inflation bill. Its credit-control bill eventually may do some good but don't expect it to give you more groceries for less money.

On the other side of the Capitol, Chairman CHARLES W. TOBEY'S Senate Banking and Currency Committee turned in the only praiseworthy record of the special session. It at least tried to get some facts on the anti-inflation case, though it did little enough about them.

Facts which officials presented should have been sufficiently alarming to pull any Congressman out of his political fog.

From Agriculture Department the Tobey Committee heard that further increases in food prices—particularly meat prices already have more than doubled in the last two years—are due this year. The time to have started holding meat prices in line was 6 months ago, he said.

From Commerce Department the committee heard that the problem confronting the country cannot be met by increased production, which is already at capacity levels.

From economic advisers the committee heard that inflation is now working hardship on millions of families. Industrial prices are being pushed to such heights that goods cannot be disposed of. There is danger of an economic explosion. The race upward between prices and wages is unsettling all business conditions. All such spiraling booms have in the past ended in busts.

Not Funny, Mr. President

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 6, 1948

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, the Washington Daily News of August 6, 1948, through its editorial column, under the heading "Not funny, Mr. President," discusses President Truman's charge that the activities of the Senate and House committees investigating Communist activities in this country, and in the Government agencies especially, were simply "red herrings" thrown across the legislative path and should be laughed off as Republican politics. The editorial is timely; it is very much to the point, and extends to the President some valuable advice. It is as follows:

NOT FUNNY, MR. PRESIDENT

President Truman charged congressional hearings on Soviet spy activities are a "red herring" to hide the Republican Congress' failure on other matters. In doing so, he very foolishly accepted a measure of responsibility for an ugly and dangerous situation which previously could not have been charged against him.

Not many people who have followed the testimony in the current hearings will agree with Mr. Truman that the Communist problem in Washington can be laughed off as "Republican politics," in our opinion.

Moreover, the President has further placed himself on the defensive on this issue by denying to the investigating committees information which is pertinent to their inquiries.

The failure of Congress to act upon the President's anti-inflationary program will not in any sense excuse him for his own refusal to cooperate in removing a very real threat to our national security. The issues are not in any way related. Today we are concerned with another problem.

Under Mr. Truman's own loyalty program, laid down by Executive order, it is the announced policy of the Government to bar from positions of trust in "sensitive" agencies any employee whose loyalty may be subject to question.

That policy broke down when William W. Remington was appointed chairman of the Commerce Department's export license committee although it was known he was under investigation for association with a confessed member of a Russian spy ring. That is not something existing only in the mind of Representative KARL E. MUNDT, as Mr. Truman would have us believe. It is an undisputed, unexplained fact. And if the President's loyalty test was not applied in Mr. Remington's case, what reason have we to believe that it has been applied in any other case?

The two congressional investigations, particularly the one being conducted by Senator FERGUSON, have been extremely useful. But neither has more than scratched the surface, in our judgment.

We need a careful, searching inquiry, that will give free access to all pertinent information, conducted by an agency with the ability and the power to purge the Government of all disloyal and unreliable elements. An unofficial civilian commission should be created for this purpose, as a safeguard against the subversion of the Government by enemy agents or dupes.

Such a commission, to command respect and confidence of the public and Congress, should be composed of persons of the caliber of Herbert Hoover, Bernard M. Baruch, Henry L. Stimson, Charles Evans Hughes, Owen D. Roberts, Robert M. La Follette, and James F. Byrnes—men who know government, who respect civil liberties, but who would resolve all doubts in favor of national security.

Let's forget politics when the issue is security.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MELVIN C. SNYDER
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 6, 1948

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the partisan flavor in the call of the Congress into special session, announced by the President at the Democratic National Convention, I believe this call of the President may render a real public service.

The number one problem confronting the American people is inflation, with its resulting high prices. If the attention of the public is focused on high prices and the real basic cause for them, the call of the special session will serve a useful purpose.

We must ever bear in mind that prices paid for goods are the prices received for goods, and the prices include wages, salaries, dividends, profits, and taxes. Wages cannot be increased from $29,000,000,000 a year to $128,000,000,000 a year; farm income from $2,500,000,000 to $18,000,000,000; Government expenditures from $9,000,000,000 to $40,000,000,000, without increasing prices.

The main contributing causes for high prices can be found in our European recovery program, large military expenditures, and the high cost of Government. In the European recovery program promulgated by the President and the State Department, we are sending immense quantites of items in short supply to the nations of western Europe. This creates a scarcity in our domestic market and consequently we have high prices.

In large appropriations for the military service, a demand is being placed upon steel and steel products for war equipment, and this inevitably leaves less for the manufacture of automobiles, refrigerators, and other items containing steel used in our domestic economy.

The high cost of government materially contributes to the high cost of living. During the month of June new civilian employees were hired in the executive branch of the Government at an average rate of 866 a day. When, as a matter of fact, the executive branch of the Government should have been releasing excess employees at that rate.

In the year 1947 the cost of all Government per individual was $371; the cost of food per individual in 1947 was $330. The cost of Government in 1947 was $41 higher per individual than the cost of food. At least 25 percent of the price of food is represented by indirect taxes; on nonfood items the percentage is even higher. If the cost of government was reduced, this reduction would be reflected in food prices.

One of the most realistic ways to reduce high prices is for the administration to cooperate with the Congress in reducing the high cost of government. If we were to enact the legislation requested by the President in calling the special session, it would mean a deficit or going into the red by several billions of dollars, or necessitate additional taxes, that ultimately would cause even higher prices.

This is not a partisan question, because it involves the stability of our economy. I want to do anything I can to bring down high prices and I believe all other Members of the House, regardless of party affiliation, are anxious and willing to take any and every action which will stabilize the value of the American dollar, to the end that prices may be adjusted. But, as stated by Mr. Eccles, former Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board and still a member, price controls and rationing of consumer goods is not the answer to high prices. Other members of the Federal Reserve Board and members of the executive branch of the Government are taking the same position, notwithstanding the request of the President for such controls. Experts who are qualified to speak on this matter state that the first step to take is to stabilize our currency, reduce the cost of government, and increase production.

I am persuaded that the present administration does not want lower prices. For years the President and the Federal Reserve Board have had the power to stabilize our money. Judicious use of these powers would have prevented the high prices we have today. Judicious use of these powers from now on can prevent high prices, and can and will result in economic and financial stability.

Only a few days ago, the Secretary of Agriculture advised farmers to hold back a substantial portion of the 1948 grain crop so that the enormous fall crops in this country and elsewhere would not drive food prices down. He further advised the wheat farmers to reduce the acreage for 1948 by 6,215,000 acres. That acreage in production would produce approximately 186,000,000 bushels of wheat. That amount of wheat would reduce the cost of wheat to the baker and, in turn, the cost of bread to the consumer.

With a larger production of grain, more livestock can be raised and marketed. Many food item prices are keyed to the price of grain. The more grain we produce, the more reasonable we can buy meat and other food items. It's time to ditch the philosophy which permitted the plowing under of cotton and the killing and destruction of hogs and other livestock for the purpose of making prices high.

At the present time, the Government is purchasing potatoes and spending $25,000,000 of the taxpayers' money every month to buy up potatoes for the purpose of keeping the price of potatoes high.

Let us stabilize our economy by stabilizing our currency; practice rigid economy in government; and encourage full production.

Truman's Political Session of Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. CHARLES W. VURSELL

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 6, 1948

Mr. VURSELL. Mr. Speaker, this is the first session of Congress in the history of the Nation when a President, in the midst of a national campaign, has called into special session the Congress of the United States solely for political purposes.

In the regular session the President requested $40,000,000,000, the greatest amount of money ever asked for to run the Government in times of peace. The Congress realized in its first session that this budget and the waste and extravagance of the present administration was one of the major causes of inflation and the present high cost of living.

The President put on the robes of Santa Claus and suggested legislation that would further increase the cost of government from six to nine billion dollars.

In addition he requested the repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act, which in 1 year has reduced work stoppages by 64 percent, and has allowed the laboring men of the Nation to take home $1,000,000,000 extra in wages because of less days lost in strikes. In other words, he would pour gasoline on the fires of inflation, and at the same time tell the people he sought to reduce the cost of government.

He wanted to put the Congress in the position of refusing him, Santa Claus, the right to hand out more presents to the people.

In 1945 instead of his following the advice of Bernard Baruch, adviser to Presidents, and his own Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, Marriner Eccles, to attempt to stop inflation and stabilize the purchasing power of the currency, he predicted 8,000,000 people would be out of work with a depression that would arrive in 1946, asked the Congress to increase unemployment pay, lifted the Little Steel formula to decontrol wages, recommended a 25-percent advance of wages, encouraged the General Motors strike, and waited for the depression and the unemployment that never came.

Mr. Speaker, in 1946 he vetoed a liberalized price-control bill which was designed to increase production, leaving the country without any controls for 30 days. Another bill on the same pattern was again passed by the Congress which he signed, giving him the right as President to lift control on prices when supply equaled demand.

Later on, when the campaign was going against his party in 1946, on the advice of Mayor Kelley, his Democratic floor leader, JOHN MCCORMACK, of Boston, and his national committeeman, Robert Hannigan, of St. Louis, who rushed down to Washington and urged him to remove all controls for fear his party would meet defeat, he lifted most of the controls before election day, lifted the remainder of them before Congress convened, making a public statement that "controls were no longer necessary, and to keep them on in peacetime was to create a police state." Now he wants to put them back on.

From that day to this he has encouraged inflation, and, in my opinion, deliberately built it up to the danger of the Nation, for the purpose of using it in this campaign, at the same time charging the Republican Congress, which came into power less than two years ago, of being responsible for the very inflation that he and his policies have brought about.

Mr. Speaker, every effort he has made in the last 3 years has resulted in greater inflation. This Congress in the short special session will go as far as it reasonably should go to put on the brakes. If we would go further and provide the controls he requested, we would slow down production on the farms and in every industry in the Nation. We would doubtless go back to OPA controls and rationing, meatless counters throughout the land, less production, general chaos, and black markets.

President Truman has not once told the American people that the exportation of billions of dollars worth of steel, automobiles, tractors, farm machinery, and 600,000,000 bushels of wheat and bread grains given away and shipped to Europe under the Marshall plan during the past year is the real cause of the high cost of living at the present time.

He has not told the people that all the time he has had the power to control, reduce or stop exports to foreign countries. That since the war he has sponsored the giving away of $20,000,000,000 in relief of which over a billion and a half has gone to Russia and her satellite nations. He prefers, for political purposes, to try to make the people believe that a Republican Congress in 18 months time has been responsible for inflation and the high cost of living.

He has not told the people that under the first year of the Marshall plan he has guaranteed to give to the European countries $100,000,000 worth of merchandise including electrical equipment, farm machinery and food, and grains of every kind every week of the 52 weeks of this year, 1948. Think of it, $100,000,000 a week.

It is amazing, under the President's policies of waste and spending and his encouragement of inflation, that it is not worse than it is today.

Recently when the Congress was doing its best in the closing days of the regular session, the President went to the west coast in an 18-car train at the expense of the taxpayers on a political barnstorming trip for the very purpose of trying to destroy the confidence of the people in their elected representatives. On this trip he branded this Congress as the "worst in the history of the nation." He attempted to deceive and destroy the people's confidence in their representatives in the hope of gaining political advantage. He realized he had lost the confidence of the people and his party as later demonstrated at the National Convention, and took this desperate means in an attempt to recoup his lost prestige. It was a measure of his incompetence and lack of stature.

Mr. Speaker, today I want to discuss the record of the Republican Eightieth Congress. Before I do so I want to compare promises made by his party in 1932, and let you decide which party best keeps its promises.

You will recall in 1932 when his party took over this country, in that campaign their leaders and platform promised to reduce the cost of government by 25 percent. They said they would stop the expansion of bureaus and bureaucracy. It then cost $5,000,000,000 to run the Government one year. There were 600,000 people on the Federal pay roll. They increased the bureaus to over 1,200 in number, increased the Federal pay rolls and bureaucracy to the unthinkable number of about 3,500,000 people. They increased the cost of Government 800 percent and President Truman's peacetime budget this year is 8 times $5,000,000,000 or a budget of $40,000,000,000.

They increased the Federal debt to $65,000,000,000 before we entered World War II and that was in peacetime. Under the policy of "tax and tax, spend and spend, elect and elect," they have not kept a promise made to the people in the 1932 platform.

Mr. Speaker, I want to briefly point out to you the promises we made and prove that we have kept every promise.

First. We promised to reduce the cost of Government.

We cut the President's budget in the first session in 1947 by $5,000,000,000 against the opposition of the President and his leaders in the House and Senate. We cut his budget in 1948 by $2,751,000,000, rescinded other billions and plugged other wastes to a total of $12,400,000,000.

Second. We promised to balance the budget.

By the economies referred to above we balanced the budget and now have in the Treasury a surplus of $8,416,500,000.

Third. We promised to reduce income taxes.

We reduced income taxes $4,800,000,000 of which 71 percent of it went to the little people paying on incomes of less than $5,000. We relieved 7,400,000 from paying any taxes and gave those over 65 years an additional exemption of $500. So much needed to meet the high cost of living in their old age. President Truman said both times that we could not and should not cut the budget and through his influence and his leaders in the House and Senate, they made a desperate fight against the reduction of the cost of Government and we had to pass the tax-reduction bill over his veto.

Fourth. We promised to pass legislation seeking to bring about greater harmony between capital and labor.

This we did as you well know and passed the bill over his veto by approximately 4 to 1 in both the Senate and House. The result has been that labor has written the best contracts for the past year under the Taft-Hartley Act it has ever had. Strikes have been reduced 50 percent, work stoppages by reason of less strikes have been reduced 64 percent, labor has prospered as never before and has taken home approximately $1,000,000,000 more in cash at the end of the first year by reason of less work stoppages.

Fifth. We promised to reduce Federal pay rolls.

Since VJ-day we have reduced Federal pay rolls from over 3,300,000 to a little over 2,000,000. When a Republican President is elected it will be further reduced during the next session.

Sixth. We passed a resolution to prevent any President in the future from serving more than two full terms.

That resolution was passed and is now before the 48 States for ratification.

Seventh. Farm legislation.

We passed a long range farm bill for agriculture which was supported by the Illinois Agriculture Association and the American Federation of Farm Bureaus.

We appropriated $400,000,000 in loans to REA in 1947 and again loans in the amount of $400,000,000 in 1948, in an effort to speed up the extension of REA to the farmers of America. This is more money than was appropriated when the President's party was in control during the past 7 years.

We passed a sound crop-insurance bill; amended the Federal Highway Act to speed up the construction of farm-to-market roads; and appropriated $500,000,000 for soil conservation.

This Congress realizes that agriculture must be kept in a sound and prosperous condition in the interest of the entire Nation.

Eighth. We increased the appropriation for national defense by $3,500,000,000 with which to build the strongest air force in the world.

Ninth. We promised to continue our fight against the spread of communism in America.

If you have listened to the radio and read the papers you know how well we have kept that promise. We investigated "Red Hollywood" in order to stop the poisonous flow of communism throughout the picture shows of the Nation designed to warp the ideals of millions of children and grown-ups.

We have driven 136 people out of the State Department, many others out of other departments and over 500 have resigned to escape the investigation we brought about through the FBI.

We have had no help during the past 6 years in this long fight from the executive department. During the past few weeks we have uncovered a spy ring in Washington that has shaken this administration to its foundation. They have become so concerned that the President has again made a statemnt "that no files touching the loyalty of any employee in the executive department will be given to the committee on Un-American Activities of the House or Senate." Hence, the American people are denied this information about their Government.

Two former Communists who saw the error of their ways and who repented, went to the Government many months ago and told of this spy ring and offered to uncover it, have just been brought to light by the activities of the Republican Congress. Both of these people have named many men high in the Government who cooperated with them before, during, and after the war in giving out dangerous and secret information that was passed on to Russia.

This administration has clamped down censorship on John W. Studebaker, the Federal Commissioner of Education here in Washington, and has prohibited him from openly asking the educators and school teachers of the Nation to instruct their students against the danger of communism in this country. Mr. Studebaker, who for years has done a great job as Federal Commissioner of Education, recently made this open charge and resigned his position. An investigation of this will soon be in progress and all the facts brought to light.

Mr. Speaker, I have named nine of the major promises we made to the people two short years ago. We have kept every promise. From 6 years of hard work and close observation, as a Member of Congress, it is my candid opinion that the administration in power must be driven out of office this November if we are to keep the country sound financially, and if we are to preserve representative, constitutional government, and the freedom it guarantees to every man, woman, and child in America.

I believe on Governor Dewey's record as Governor of New York, we are justified in the belief that when he is elected President of the United States, we will have elected the most competent administrator of the affairs of Government that has probably ever been elected President. With such an administrator and a Congress determined to follow sound policies and efficiency and economy in Government we can save this Nation. This is the most important reason why the Republican Party should and will be swept into power with a landslide come next November.

During these chaotic times the American people must stand together in a mighty effort to reduce our national debt, and put our Government again in a sound financial position—yes, to save representative government and the freedom and liberty of the people of this Nation. That is the goal the people desire to reach, that is the platform, the aim and policy of the Republican Party.

Mr. Speaker, I have given a very brief record of what has happened on the home front affecting the domestic policy and economy of our Nation. For a moment I should like to make brief reference to the mishandling and bungling of our foreign policy which is largely responsible for the threat of war today and the chaotic conditions in Europe and the world.

It would require much time to give a complete picture of how the administration has failed since the close of the war in its foreign policy. I shall make reference to only one general failure to win the peace.

OUR FOREIGN POLICY

This administration has not only failed utterly on the domestic front. It has failed utterly in its foreign policies. At the close of the war through the Chief Executive and the State Department, at Yalta and Potsdam, Russia was in fact placed in the driver's seat in Europe and we builded her up to where she has been able to thwart the peace of Europe and the world.

When we got into the war starting with Pearl Harbor, two things had to be done. First, we had to win the war. Second, we had to win the peace at the close of the war. Through the loss of 400,000 soldiers killed and 1,000,000 wounded and by the struggle and sacrifice of the soldiers who wrote the most courageous pages of valor and heroism history has ever recorded, and through the sacrifice of the men and women on the home front in furnishing the supplies and the money through taxation, at a cost of $300,000,000,000, the soldiers and the plain people of America won the war. The soldiers kept faith with the Nation and did their job. They won the war.

On the other hand, by the incompetence, blundering, and appeasement of Russia at the close of the war, the Chief Executive and the Department of State lost the peace. If we are to be plunged into a war soon or within a few years to come, it must be charged to the blundering incompetency of the administration in power who had peace for the world within its grasp, but lost it at Yalta and Potsdam.

Did Killing the OPA Increase the Cost of Living?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD O. McCOWEN
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 6, 1948

Mr. McCOWEN. Mr. Speaker, the question, Did killing the OPA increase the cost of living? has for its answer a thunderous "No."

Those of us who stood for the repeal of the OPA said at the time that if it were repealed the production increase would soon equal and go beyond the demand and then prices would gradually come down. It was only another way of saying, Take off controls, let the law of supply and demand work and prices will become gradually lower because of greatly increased production. Controls were off and the law of supply and demand did work, all right. But no one expected the New Deal administration to unduly increase demand by its control over exports, beyond production. In other words the New Deal said repeal OPA and prices will go up. Prices would have gone down but the New Deal was determined to make its prediction good and did so by seeing to it that exports were greatly increased, thereby increasing the demand and forcing the law of supply and demand to increase prices.

If OPA should have been kept on, why did the President remove it (controls) just before last election? If the New Deal contends that the removal of OPA controls is the cause of the high prices then the New Deal caused those high prices by the President's removal of OPA just before last election. In either way you take it the New Deal is responsible for the high prices, not the Republicans. Take wheat as one example. The administration, by its control of exports, went into the open market in the United States, bought wheat in competition, and sent the wheat to Europe. This caused a much less quantity of wheat to be in the United States and raised the price of wheat here. That increase raised the cost of bread in the United States.

Since farmers will sell wheat when the price gives them more money than to feed it to stock that caused them to sell the stock before they ordinarily would have done so. This caused a shortage in meat and the price went up and up. There you have a concrete example of the situation. What is true in the case of wheat and meat can be shown also to be true in the case of many other things.

Controls will not correct the conditions. They would only cause a black market for chiselers and penalize honest dealers who could not buy enough products to supply the demand. Who wants bare shelves again? Who wants a black market again? What housewife wants to be bothered with ration cards again in time of peace?

Quit giving so much away to Europe; let production here supply American reasonable demands first and prices will go down. Increased production is the only answer.

Old-Age Pensions

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK B. KEEFE
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 6, 1948

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Speaker, no one can deny that there are hundreds of thousands of people in America who are suffering as a result of high prices. The people who are suffering most are those who are compelled to live on old-age assistance pensions, people with fixed incomes, and certain salaried groups whose monthly wages have not kept pace with the increased cost of living. I think it may safely be said that the thousands of elder citizens who are forced to exist upon so-called old-age pensions are as hard hit by the force of inflation as any group of our people. Because there appears to be some lack of understanding with respect to the present program of old-age assistance, I believe it is of some interest to record clearly just what is being done for our aged people under the Social Security Act.

On June 14, 1948, the Congress enacted Public Law 642, which does not become effective until October 1, 1948. What, then, is the position of the recipients of old-age assistance under existing law? At the present time, the Federal law provides Federal contributions toward the payment of a maximum pension of $45 per month for the aged. The law provides that the Federal Government will pay two-thirds of the first $15 of pension paid to an old-age recipient. This, of course, amounts to $10. The law further provides that of the balance of $30, the Federal Government will provide matching funds amounting to $15, provided that the State and local communities raise and pay the other $15. This means, therefore, that under existing law which limits the amount of pension that can be paid toward which the Federal Government will contribute to $45, the Federal Government will provide $25 of matching funds, and the States and local communities must pay $20. Thus, if the States and local communities meet their responsibility by providing sufficient matching funds, it would be possible to pay each aged recipient of old-age assistance $45 per month.

The difficulty has been that few of the States have provided sufficient matching funds to enable payment of such a pension. There is nothing to prevent the States and local communities from paying any amount above $45 if they so desire. I have before me the statistics showing the amount of old-age assistance payments for the month of May 1948. The average paid in the State of Wisconsin in that month was $37.63. Thus it will be seen that the State of Wisconsin and the counties have not raised sufficient funds to match the available Federal funds under existing law so as to permit the payment of a $45 per month pension to each needy recipient.

Under the law passed June 14, 1948, hereinbefore referred to, the Federal contribution is further liberalized. Effective October 1, 1948, the Federal Government will pay three-fourths of the first $20 of old-age assistance paid to a needy recipient. In order to get this $15, the States and counties have to provide matching funds to the extent of $5. The law increases the maximum that can be paid under the Federal act to $50. The excess of $30 may be paid on a 50–50 matching basis. In other words, it will be possible to pay each old-age assistance recipient a pension of $50 per month, beginning October 1, 1948, provided that the States and counties put up $20 of this amount. If they do, then the Federal Government will contribute $30. It should be clear, therefore, that if the present matching program of the social-security law is continued in effect that the respective States and counties must meet their obligation in order that a $50 pension may be paid. It is of no benefit to the old-age pensioner to have the Federal Government provide additional matching funds if the States and counties fail to provide at the State level their share of matching funds.

There can be no question but that the older citizens of this country are suffering terribly during this period of inflation. And it can readily be seen that the Federal Government is gradually extending its responsibility in this field. I have long contended that the beneficiaries of this program across the country are entitled to receive an old-age assistance allowance paid direct by the Federal Government in an amount that will enable them to live in decency and free from fears of malnutrition and illness. I have repeatedly and consistently condemned this iniquitous matching-fund provision of the Social Security Act, which is so discriminatory in its effects upon the aged people of the country. The average monthly pension in May 1948 in the State of Alabama was $19.41; in Delaware, $25.77; in Kentucky, $16.50; in North Carolina, $18.11; in South Carolina, $19.85; in Virginia, $18.53; from these low pensions, the amount paid range upward to a high of $63.54 in Colorado; $57.12 in California; $55.14 in Massachusetts; $49.49 in New York; and $56.94 in the State of Washington.

It will thus be seen that the character of the care provided for the aged people of the country varies throughout the States of the Union. This intolerable situation will never be corrected until the Federal Government assumes its full responsibility in seeing to it that an adequate system of Federal pensions is provided that will enable our elder citizens to live with some degree of decency.

The Eightieth Congress Did Not Take 750,000 Persons Off of the Social Security Rolls—It Did Not Take Any Off

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. THOMAS A. JENKINS
OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 6, 1948

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, a number of serious misrepresentations with reference to the work of the Eightieth Congress have been made recently. Some of these misrepresentations have been made purposely and some inadvisedly. Some of them have been made by persons high in public life and have, because of that fact, received wide circulation in the press and over the radio.

It shall be my purpose to discuss with you at this time only one of such several items.

President Truman said in his speech of acceptance at the Democratic National Convention at Philadelphia that Congress could not find time to increase or extend social-security benefits but it did find time to take social-security benefits away from 750,000 people.

This statement is very misleading and in effect simply is not true. Now, the facts are that the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives of the Eightieth Congress did find time to give exhaustive study to the matter of extending the coverage of the social-security laws to many thousands of people. That committee prepared and recommended legislation that would have added approximately 3,500,000 additional employees to the list of those now covered. This number would include State and local employees, certain persons engaged in the packing of fruits and vegetables and persons employed by nonprofit institutions, and a large list of other groups and classes. The House of Representatives passed that bill but the Senate was not able to reach it. The Senate did add an amendment to another social-security bill which had passed the House and which provided a Federal increase of $5 per month to those receiving old-age pensions and $5 a month to those receiving blind pensions. It also provided a substantial increase to dependent children. These increases amounted to approximately $184,000,000 per year. The President should have known about this legislation because he vetoed it and his veto was immediately overridden by both Houses of Congress.

The President's statement at the Philadelphia Convention has been misrepresented and expanded upon by the newspapers and commentators until it is commonly reported that the Eightieth Congress took 750,000 or 1,000,000 off of the social-security rolls. One commentator says boldly that the Congressmen did not know what they were doing when they voted to cut 1,000,000 off of the social security rolls.

The President with all of his many duties may not have known that he was giving circulation to a statement that was not justified by the facts but he made the statement purely for political purposes and for that reason he should have known what he was talking about. These news commentators can probably justify their statements by taking the President's statement as a basis for their statements.

The facts are that the Eightieth Congress did not take 750,000 nor 1,000,000 off of the social-security rolls. In fact it did not take anybody off of the rolls for it specifically provided that those who are now on the rolls illegally would be retained upon the theory that many of them were not personally responsible for being on the rolls and some had passed the age of 65. The Congress felt that these aged people should be protected and they are being paid although they did not contribute to the fund. The number that were on the rolls illegally was only a very small number. The figures of 500,000 and 750,000 were used as a guess as to the number that might have been affected if the law would be changed to include a number of groups not now included under social-security coverage and who are anxious to be covered. The figure 1,000,000 does not appear anywhere in the hearings or reports connected with the proposed legislation. This shows that a misrepresentation will by accretion enlarge itself as it goes along.

Let us get the genesis of this whole matter. A few historical facts will show the falsity of these statements against which I am complaining.

The social security law was passed in 1935. It provided in one of its titles that the employers and the employees of certain groups should each pay 1 percent of the pay roll into a fund out of which the employees would be paid social security benefits under certain conditions at a certain time. Congress considered at that time that the terms "employer" and "employee" were very well understood by American industry in all parts of the country. But in order to clarify the only situation that Congress felt might arise, it wrote the following sentence into the law: "The term 'employee' means an officer of a corporation." Congress evidently felt that, with this additional explanation, the common law definition of employer and empoyee would be followed. Congress intended that the employers and employees in all of the groups covered should pay 1 percent of the pay roll into a fund that would be used for the benefit of employees. At that time Congress specifically excluded a large number of employees. The two principal large groups that were excluded were domestic servants and farm laborers.

Since that time many additional groups have been asking to be brought under the protection of the social security law. The Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives in the Eightieth Congress prepared a bill which would have brought under the protection of this law 3,500,000 additional persons. The House of Representatives passed this bill and it is now pending in the Senate.

In the administration of the social-security laws, two agencies of the Government were assigned separate and very important tasks. The Treasury was given the task of collecting these payments of 1 percent from the employers and the employees. There are now about 33,000,000 employees who pay 1 percent of their earnings into the social-security fund. A separate agency known as the Social Security Board was set up and assigned the task of determining who are entitled to draw these social-security benefits. This Board was given the task of putting into effect the social-security law and providing the system by which the benefits would be paid to those entitled to them. This was a big task and the Social Security Board, now known as the Social Security Administration, employs a large number of persons in carrying out the purposes of the several sections of the social-security law.

The task of the Treasury was a more exacting one than that of the Board, for the Treasury collected an exact sum of money while the Board was an administrative agency with a number of duties to perform.

Some time after the social-security law went into effect, the Treasury, in order to more thoroughly define the terms employer and employee, promulgated a resolution which reads as follows:

WHO ARE EMPLOYEES

Every individual is an employee if the relationship between him and the person for whom he performs services is the legal relationship of employer and employee.

Generally such relationship exists when the person for whom services are performed has the right to control and direct the individual who performs the services, not only as to the result to be accomplished by the work, but also as to the details and means by which that result is accomplished. That is, an employee is subject to the will and control of the employer not only as to what shall be done but how it shall be done.

While the Treasury and the Congress apparently were satisfied with this regulation, the Social Security Board apparently was not satisfied because this Board assumed to assert itself and take unto itself more power than it was entitled to. Its efforts in this respect were typical of most bureaus except that it is probably the outstanding bureau in the whole Government in its persistence in assuming authority. The Board soon insisted on stressing its authority and paid benefits to many persons who had not contributed 1 cent to the Social Security fund and who under the law were not entitled to receive benefits.

When Congress set up the social-security system it intended that only certain groups should be included. Congress surely did not intend that any person should be paid social-security benefits if that person did not contribute toward the fund. But the Social Security Board with characteristic boldness, in effect, took the position that it had the authority to pay benefits if it felt that certain individuals were entitled to receive them, regardless of whether those individuals had contributed to the fund. This Board put a number of persons on the rolls that were not entitled under the law to participate. After this practice had continued for some time some of the employers from which the Treasury had sought to collect the 1-percent contribution refused to pay because these employers felt that the persons whom the Board had decided should receive coverage were not legal employees. Litigation ensued in many of the courts of the country. Three cases that proved to be decisive were carried to the Supreme Court. These were U. S. v. Silk (331 U. S. 704), Harrison v. Grayvan Lines (331 U. S. 704), Bartles v. Birmingham (332 U. S. 126).

Each of these cases held in effect that payments could not be made legally until it was shown that the relation of employer and employee was thoroughly established. These cases were all decided about the same time in 1947.

As I have already said it has always been the intention of Congress that the common-law rules governing relationship of employer and employee should obtain in the interpretation of the social security law. Immediately following these decisions, the Social Security Board thought that these decisions gave it a chance to expand its authority. Immediately the Board and the Treasury collaborated to the end that they issued another regulation by which they would be granted discretionary powers which would enable them to practically determine who should be covered and how much the coverage should be, and so forth. This Regulation was published in the Federal Register in the issue of Thursday, November 27, 1947, and was to become effective 30 days thereafter. This Regulation covered several pages of closely printed matter. This was a bold attempt at usurpation of power by the Social Security Board.

For some time there has been a growing public feeling that a great many more persons in several large groups should be included under the social security law. As I have already pointed out, the Ways and Means Committee and the House of Representatives in this, the Eightieth Congress, recommended the inclusion of 3,500,000 additional persons.

In order to prevent this regulation of the Treasury and the Social Security Board from going into effect, the Congress was forced to assert its authority which it did by passing House Joint Resolution 296. This was passed in the recent session of the Eightieth Congress. The action of the House and the Senate was vetoed by the President who seems to be willingly dominated by Mr. Altmeyer, Chairman of the Social Security Board. The President's veto was promptly overridden by both Houses of Congress by a large majority.

It is because the President was not able to impose his personal views upon the Congress that he has used such intemperate language with reference to this matter. By the passage of House Joint Resolution 296, the Congress has courageously maintained the same course that was set out by the Congress which passed the original social-security law and by every Congress that has dealt with the social-security law since that time.

House Joint Resolution 296 simply provides that the relationship of employer and employee under the social-security laws shall be the same relationship that has existed under the common law of our country. As I have already said, this resolution does not take any person off of the social-security roll, but it does prevent the Treasury from forcing collection out of employers who are not obligated and it prevents the Social Security Board from paying benefits to persons out of the fund into which such persons have not made any payments. Such payments by the Board must of necessity be made at the expense of those who have paid into the fund.

This resolution shows that the Congress has the power to say who shall be entitled to coverage. The employers and employees have both shown a splendid spirit in their willingness to pay the assessments levied against them. The employee has gladly paid his 1 percent for he felt he was paying for his own protection. It is only natural that he would resent any attempt to divert his payments to those who had not contributed to the fund.

House Joint Resolution 296 will be heartily approved by the employer and the employee. In fairness to those who are not yet under the protection of the social security laws, I think I can say that they do not want protection for which they do not contribute. They want to be brought legally under the protection of the law and there is no doubt in my mind that this will be done soon after the Eighty-first Congress convenes.

I close as I began by saying that the Eightieth Congress has not taken 750,000 off of the social security pay rolls. It has effectively prevented the Social Security Board from usurping authority to which it was not legally entitled. This furore has been created by the Social Security Board because of its failure to usurp authority.

Another Cold War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOMER D. ANGELL
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 6, 1948

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, the following article is an editorial from the Portland Oregonian of July 28, 1948. Pursuant to permission heretofore granted, I include it as part of my remarks:

ANOTHER COLD WAR

It was, to put it mildly, an intricate psychological problem when President Truman entered the House of Representatives yesterday and mounted the podium to face an irritated and watchful Congress.

He had been scolding this same Congress around the country—the subject having proved a popular one among some of his hearers, and less than 2 weeks ago he had accepted the nomination of the Democratic Party with a blistering talk centered on the legislative branch of the Government, and calling it back into session. In what mood, or pretense of mood, would he confront the body which he had been belaboring? How could he expect cooperation from a Republican Congress whose belittlement was his principal campaign issue, and of which, recently, he had been making the most of?

Besides, the Republicans were now the party of the majority of the people. The President who stood before the Congress, and had ordered the session, represented a program repudiated by the congressional elections. A minority leader thus confronted a majority group which he had been attacking.

The answer is apparent to those who read the talk, and particularly to those who listened to descriptions of the scene in the House Chamber. One never would have known that he announced this special session before a party convention and as an obvious political device; gone was the role of prosecutor played on the recent western tour. President Truman was suddenly a quiet and reasonable man making out the best possible case for his thesis that a national emergency exists requiring the majority party to follow the minority Executive's will.

And clearly there is plenty of embarrassment in the situation for the Republican command. The President and his advisers compiled a set of recommendations which contain appeals to virtually everyone not living in heaven—everyone save possibly the deepest residents of the deepest South. He rubbed the lamp for those who want lower prices and higher wages; those who want better houses at less cost; those who want more prosperity but with increased taxes for Federal spending; those who still think the commodity exchanges decide living costs; those who think there is an easy answer in government controls in general, and they are legion; those who are distressed by our national problems of health and education.

The list, in fact, runs on and on. The President was careful to assert and reassert that price controls and a housing act were the immediate occasion for the special session, but he divided and catalogued all the timeless problems of man—implying that they had to be solved before next January or the Republican Party would prove itself made up of a set of lugs. That the Democrats, just emerging from a long, long rule, didn't set all these matters aright when their power was absolute, does not appear to bother the President.

After all, what does he have to lose? When he took the stage at Philadelphia and announced the call for a special session, he was at the bottom of his political fortunes. He couldn't go anywhere but up if he moved at all. Now the session has put him, at least for the time, on the offensive. And there are items on the list, such as housing, which the Republicans cannot put off without injustice.

The Truth About the Taft-Hartley Law

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK B. KEEFE
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 6, 1948

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Speaker, one of the most important pieces of legislation passed by the Eightieth Congress was the new Labor-Management Relations Act, more familiarly known as the Taft-Hartley law.

Never, in my memory, has any legislation been subject to more misleading and in some cases deliberately untruthful propaganda.

During the deliberations in Congress this legislation was smeared by its opponents as a slave-labor bill and a death warrant for unionism. It was claimed, without any justification whatsoever, that this bill would deny labor the right to strike and would allow capitalists to crush the workingman beneath their heel.

Now what are the facts? Congress met in January of 1947 confronted with a vivid picture of a nation being torn asunder with industrial strife. The Nation had lost $6,000,000,000 in its standard of living in the year after VJ-day due to strikes. Jurisdictional disputes, secondary boycotts, and other union abuses had been brought forcibly to the attention of the public. Union members found that they were subject, in some cases, to the irresponsible power of dictatorial leaders who controlled completely their right to make a living. The American people had come to realize how a few racketeers, who had muscled into the high places of unionism, could paralyze the entire country by ordering a strike with the stroke of a pen.

THE PEOPLE DEMANDED RELIEF

The people demanded relief from this dangerous condition. The Congress was pressured for drastic action but thanks to the deliberative processes of our national legislative body the extremes were avoided and a middle ground was chosen. The Congress recognized the need for curbing some of the bad practices which were harming the union movement and the country, but felt it equally essential that the fundamental rights of labor—won with years of effort and sacrifice—also required protection.

In this atmosphere the Congress worked out a new labor-relations law that is proving beneficial to labor, management, and the public.

Congress passed the act in June of 1947 over President Truman's indefensible veto. Nearly four-fifths of all the Members of Congress joined in overriding the veto, whereas only a two-thirds majority was necessary to do so. In the final vote on the bill a majority of the participating Democrats joined the well-nigh unanimous Republican membership in support of the measure.

The House of Representatives overrode the President's veto, 331 to 83, only 1 short of 4 to 1. The Senate vote was 68 to 25, or 6 more than a two-thirds majority of the 93 Senators who voted.

DEMOCRATS JOIN REPUBLICANS

Voting in the House of Representatives to override the veto were 225 Republicans and 106 Democrats. Voting to sustain the veto were 11 Republicans, 71 Democrats, and 1 American-Laborite. In the Senate the division by parties was: Republicans for overriding the veto, 48; Democrats, 20. In favor of sustaining the veto were 3 Republicans and 22 Democrats.

For the story on how well the new labor law is operating, it seems well to cover the entire postwar period dating back to VJ-day, August 15, 1945, thereby obtaining a comparison before and after the new law became effective August 22, 1947. From the regular reports of the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics, it is evident that the new law is doing the job of improving labor-management relations as intended by Congress, and demanded by the people.

Since the Labor-Management Relations Act became effective strikes in manufacturing industries, bituminous coal mining, and the private building industry, have decreased substantially. Work stoppages under the old law averaged 395 a month. They have been cut to an average of 201 under the new law. This represents a reduction in strikes of 49 percent.

The number of workers involved in new strikes each month from VJ-day until the new Labor Act was 337,000 each month. The average number of workers so involved since the act is 131,000. This is a reduction of 61 percent under the new law.

From VJ-day until the new act the average number of man-days of idleness caused by work stoppages was 7,213,000 per month. Under the new law this figure has been cut to 2,613,000 per month.

LABOR MAKES GAINS

The record shows that under the new law wages have continued to rise, more leisure time has been made available through a shorter workweek, and average hourly earnings also have increased.

The vital point is that labor is making these gains under the new law through peaceful, collective bargaining, whereas before the new labor act gains were more frequently made through costly strikes. Wage increases through peaceful negotiation are vastly more important to all concerned than wage increases obtained at the expense of lost wages and lost production. Thus, the new labor act is providing a better annual wage for workers and a more constant and increasing supply of things urgently needed as a solvent for high prices.

During 1946, the blackest year in work stoppages, workers lost 116,000,000 man-days, while at present the annual rate is running about a fourth as much. On the basis of higher wage rates, the savings to workers would be in excess of a billion dollars a year.

Under the new labor act's sound principles our country is building a rule of reason for cooperation between employers and employees for their mutual benefit and for the good of all our people.

WORKER'S RIGHTS DEFINED

It preserves in the same language that appears in the Wagner Act, the rights of workers to organize and to bargain collectively, and just as the old act did, it forbids employers to interfere with the employees, or to threaten or coerce them when they exercise these rights.

It forbids unions to beat up workers, or to threaten or coerce workers to force them into a union, or force them to choose one union when they wish to choose another.

It guarantees free speech to both employers and union, allowing them to talk to workers as long as they do not threaten workers or try to bribe them to join or not to join a union.

It forbids employers and unions, by agreement between themselves, to force workers to join the union and to pay dues to it unless the majority of the workers by secret ballot, have voted in favor of the agreement, and even then it forbids depriving a man of his job by denying union membership to him as long as he is willing to pay initiation fees and dues.

It forbids employers to check off union dues unless the worker has voluntarily authorized the employer to do so.

UNION FUNDS PROTECTED

When employers and unions establish funds for the welfare of workers and their families, it requires them to do so under arrangements that will make certain that the money will be used for these purposes and not for other purposes of the union leaders.

It requires unions and employers, when labor contracts come to an end, to negotiate for 60 days before engaging in a strike or lock-out.

It forbids unions, by jurisdictional strikes and boycotts, to try to get control over employees who have not chosen the union as their bargaining agent, or who have chosen another union as their bargaining agent.

It requires unions, in order to be recognized as labor organizations under the Wagner Act, to tell their members how much money they take in, where they get it and what they spend it for, and to disclose what they pay their officers, how much they charge for dues, the grounds on which they suspend or expel members, and other matters that the members are entitled to know.

It exempts foremen and other supervisors from the provisions of the Wagner Act, requires the Board to regard them as employers, not as employees.

It forbids the Labor Board, which administers the Wagner Act, to compel skilled workers to bargain through an industrial union when they wish to bargain through a craft union.

It requires unions, in order to be recognized as labor organizations under the Wagner Act, to file affidavits of their officers saying the officers are not Communists or fellow travelers.

It forbids corporations to use stockholders' money for political purposes and forbids unions to use members' money for political purposes.

It makes unions subject to suits for damages, the same as corporations and other organizations, when they break their contracts or engage in unlawful activities.

PUBLIC SAFETY SAFEGUARDED

It enables the President again to delay for a time strikes that imperil the public health or safety, as he did in the great coal strike early this year.

It makes the Conciliation Service an independent agency, directs it to try to prevent strikes—it cannot forbid strikes—and authorizes it to take a secret ballot of employees before a strike if the union is willing.

It requires unions, as well as employers, to bargain in good faith when employees choose the union as their bargaining agent.

It requires the Labor Board to use fair procedures and to render fair decisions whether the cases involve charges against employers or charges against unions.

It sets up a joint committee of Congress to study labor-management relations. If defects in the law appear we will change the law. We will not stubbornly resist change as the New Dealers did for so long.

Now these are fair provisions. The law is a good law. This law will not prevent all strikes, but it has been proven to be fair and just, and with honest administration it will bring a greater measure of peace to the industrial scene than we have known for many years.

Needs of American Small Business

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 6, 1948

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter:

MIDWEST MANUFACTURERS ASSOCIATION,
Kansas City, Mo., August 3, 1948.
Hon. ADOLPH J. SABATH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SABATH: The urgent needs of American small business in the struggle to maintain their competitive position in industry are becoming increasingly serious day by day.

Recent action by the Congress and congressional small business committees has produced only negligible results for small business, the backbone and strength of our American economy.

During World War II, the Seventy-seventh Congress, without a single dissenting vote, provided protection and encouragement for small business by the enactment of bill 603 (S. 2250). This legislation directed Government agencies whenever and to the extent that such was necessary, as follows:

1. To inventory the productive facilities in the United States, which might be used for war production;

(2) To direct the officers of the Government having procurement powers to the potential productive capacity of small business plants;

3. To determine the extent of subcontracting by prime contractors with Government contracts, and to take appropriate action to bring about the letting by such prime contractors of subcontracts upon fair and equitable terms and in the greatest volume practicable;

4. To take such action as will result in the granting of such Government contracts to business concerns operating small plants;

5. To certify to Smaller War Plants Corporation and Reconstruction Finance Corporation the amount of funds necessary for conversion to war production of any small plant;

6. To certify to Government procurement officers with respect to (A) the competency, (B) the capacity, and (C) the credit of any small business concern or group of such concerns to perform a specific Government procurement contract;

7. To provide assistance by which small business concerns may be supplied with essential raw materials and receive fair and reasonable treatment from all Government agencies;

8. Empowered the Smaller War Plants Corporation to make loans to enable small business concerns to finance plant construction, conversion for expansion, or to finance the acquisition of equipment facilities, machinery, supplies, or material, or to supply such concerns with capital, to be used in the manufacture of articles, equipment, supplies, or materials for war or essential civilian purposes. Such loans in cooperation with lending institutions or otherwise direct;

9. Empowered Smaller War Plants Corporation to enter into contracts with the United States Government and any department, agency, or officer having procurement powers and to arrange for the performance of such contract by letting subcontracts to small business concerns.

Under Public Law 603 some 35,000 to 40,000 small plants registered and participated in securing war contracts, subcontracts, loans, machinery equipment, buildings, materials, engineering assistance, and technical advisory information.

Under Public Law 457 small business was rendered priority assistance in the acquisition of Government-owned surplus materials and machinery.

The expiration of public laws enacted to aid small business and subsequent legislation has virtually wiped out any semblance of help to small business that would aid them in maintaining their competitive position in industry and building of a stronger peacetime economy. Therefore, as president of the Midwest Manufacturers Association, on behalf of small business both in the Midwest and in the entire United States, I urge the following action in this special session of Congress:

1. Creation of a separate Government body or agency to survey the needs of small business and empowered to provide assistance in—

(A) Securing prime Government contracts for qualified small business;

(B) Bringing about the letting of subcontracts to small business by prime Government contractors upon fair and equitable terms and in the greatest volume practicable;

(C) Directing the attention of officers of the Government having procurement powers to the potential productive capacity of plants operated by small business concerns and direction to such officers to provide equal opportunity to qualified small business;

(D) Certifying to Government lending institutions the amount of funds required by small business for the purchase of machinery, equipment, facilities, supplies, and/or materials to compete Government prime contracts and/or performance of subcontracts from contractors with Government prime contracts.

2. The definite allocations of an equitable share of raw materials in short supply to aid in maintaining their productive capacity and maintaining their competitive position in industry.

3. Provide sufficient trained and qualified Government personnel to render engineering and production assistance to small business, both on civilian as well as Government contracts.

4. Provide sufficient personnel to inform and assist small business on technical problems.

5. Reinstate small business priority authority to purchase Government-owned surplus property.

Of all business in these United States, 90 percent is requested by small business.

Your small business constituents at home will look to you, their only source for direct help, to recognize their problems and set in motion at once the necessary action.

Respectfully,
MIDWEST MANUFACTURERS ASSOCIATION,
R. W. MONK, President.

P. S.—On behalf of all small business, we will look forward with interest to a reply to this letter and your support in this special session of Congress.

In Commemoration of William Crawford Gorgas

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAURIE C. BATTLE
OF ALABAMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 6, 1948

Mr. BATTLE. Mr. Speaker, there is great interest in my home State of Alabama in public health. A few days ago in my own district the joint health department of Birmingham and Jefferson County moved into its new $1,000,000 public health building in our medical center. But while Alabama is steadily going forward in public health, as in other matters, its citizens do not forget the great men and women of the past that made present accomplishments possible.

Recently there has been organized a Nation-wide committee for the purpose of presenting the achievements of Gen. William Crawford Gorgas of Alabama, for election in 1950 to the New York University Hall of Fame for Great Americans. Dr. O. C. Carmichael, president of the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching is chairman of this committee. Vice chairmen of the committee are Thomas W. Martin, president of the Alabama Power Co.; Dr. James M. McLester, of Birmingham, a former president of the American Medical Association; Dr. John M. Gallalee, president of the University of Alabama; Dr. Raymond Paty, chancelor of the University System of Georgia; Dr. Charles F. Kettering, General Motors Corp. of Detroit; Dr. Seal Harris, prominent author and physician of Birmingham; Dr. Lloyd Noland, of T. C. I. hospital of Fairfield, Ala.; and Gen. Robert E. Noble of Anniston, Ala. Dr. M. Y. Dabney of Birmingham, is serving as secretary-treasurer of this committee.

It is my belief that the United States Post Office Department as well as the New York University Hall of Fame should commemorate this great American. Therefore, I introduced in the House of Representatives on July 29, 1948, House Joint Resolution 439, to authorize the issuance of a stamp commemorative of Dr. William Gorgas of Alabama, who achieved international distinction by conquering yellow fever in the Canal Zone area, thus making possible the building of the Panama Canal. I believe everyone who reviews this great doctor's record will agree that his name deserves this recognition.

William Crawford Gorgas' record should be examined and reexamined today when there is such a great need in our America and all over the world for people who are lifters rather than leaners—people who can help carry the load rather than be carried. Everybody wants to have fundamental rights but all thinking people know that human rights are built upon human responsibilities. Any rights gained without a like amount of responsibility are gained through pure charity.

So, when so many people are clamoring only about their rights it is well for us to take a few minutes to think about a man who was not concerned with what he could get from mankind but rather with what he could give to mankind. Although this great man was born near Mobile, Ala., his contribution has been so wide-spread that he can rightly be claimed as a citizen of every county in Alabama, every state in the United States and every country in the world.

William Crawford Gorgas was born on October 3, 1854. His father was Gen. Josiah Gorgas, Chief of Ordnance of the Confederate Army and a president of the University of Alabama. His mother was Amelia Gayle, daughter of Judge John Gayle, who was a Governor of Alabama.

In Richmond, the last capital of the Confederacy, young William Gorgas spent the four stirring years of the Civil War. He saw, with his mother, the entrance of the Federal troops within that city. After the defeat of the Confederacy the family moved to Brierfield, Ala., in Bibb County, where his father was manager of a blast furnace for 4 years.

In 1869, when young William's father accepted a position as headmaster of the junior department of the University of the South at Sewanee, Tenn., the boy at the age of 15 began his formal education. The Civil War and the poverty of the South in the reconstruction days had kept the young boy from getting formal schooling previously. Six years after entering school, young Gorgas graduated from the university with a bachelor of arts degree.

His father's example and his experiences during the Civil War at Richmond caused Gorgas to desire a military career after his graduation. After trying his best to get into West Point and finding every door closed to him, he decided against his father's wishes, to enter the Army by way of a medical degree. After 3 years of financial difficulties at Bellevue Hospital Medical College in New York City he graduated in 1876 with a doctor of medicine degree.

Shortly after the beginning of his Army career, the new lieutenant was stricken with yellow fever. Upon recovery he at once sought to find the cause of the disease. But for a long time to Gorgas, as to others, the disease was a complete riddle. There was no understanding of the cause of its sudden appearance, its choice of victims and the complete ineffectiveness of the means of prevention used to control other diseases.

Following the occupation of Habana by American troops in the Spanish-American War, Gorgas was put in charge of a yellow-fever camp in that city. Within a few months he was appointed chief sanitary officer of Habana. The Cuban city was in a most unhealthful condition and yellow fever was the chief concern. Gorgas cleaned up Habana, applying to yellow-fever control the accepted methods of the time. While he was doing this work a medical board headed by Walter Reed was proving that the mosquito was the carrier of yellow fever.

This great Alabaman was a man who never feared new ideas. As soon as the board had made its report he changed from trying to control yellow fever by ordinary sanitation to eliminating the mosquito menace. The task was a most trying one and would have discouraged a man with less courage. But by depriving the insect of its breeding places, Gorgas permanently rid the city of yellow fever. His success in Habana gave him an international reputation as a sanitarian. In recognition of this great service Congress raised his rank to colonel in 1903.

When the plans were being developed for the digging of the Panama Canal it was apparent that there was need for a sanitary expert. William Crawford Gorgas was the natural selection for this job. After long months of planning, he and his assistants began their work in Panama when the work began at Isthmus in 1904. Although the principal reason that the French had failed in their previous attempts to build the canal was because of yellow fever, the short-sighted American authorities in charge of building the Canal did not want to spend money to rid the area of disease. They felt that money spent for this purpose was sheer extravagance. It required a visitation of yellow fever for them to realize that giving medical protection was an absolute necessity if they expected the work to be finished.

As soon as Gorgas was given authority to do so, he began to use the measures that were so successful in Havana. In Panama the problem would have been much more difficult even if he had been given complete cooperation by the authorities, which he was not given. But despite all difficulties within the problem itself and despite all the distractions caused by those who persisted in trying to discredit him, Gorgas stamped out yellow fever in the Canal Zone in 1905. While doing this great job he had the active support of President Theodore Roosevelt, who knew a good man when he saw one. Because of Gorgas' know-how and determination he not only rid the Canal Zone of yellow fever so that the construction of the Canal itself could go on to its successful completion, but he made the cities of Panama and Colon models of sanitation comparable in healthfulness to any city in the United States. At the same time the reputation of our great Alabama citizen had become so widely known that he was regarded as the foremost sanitary expert of the world. In 1914, he was appointed Surgeon General of the Army with the rank of Brigadier General.

It has been said that no soldier ever reached real success who put his own safety before the objectives of his Army. To the greatest possible degree General William Crawford Gorgas dared place his own welfare secondary to the building of the Panama Canal. May all of us be as courageous as this great Alabaman in putting our Nation's welfare before that of ourselves.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HERMAN P. EBERHARTER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 6, 1948

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Washington Daily News of August 5, 1948, by Thomas L. Stokes:

DANGER SIGNALS

(By Thomas L. Stokes)

This may be the time of decision to which we will point back at some future date, maybe sooner than we expect, and say:

"That was when something should have been done. That's when we missed the bus."

There was such a time once before in the memory of many of us, back in the flush days of 1928 and 1929, now a prophetic footnote in history of what was to come afterward in the depression of the thirties.

There were voices crying then that we had better take note of certain tendencies, among them that of the late Senator Carter Glass of Virginia who condemned the reckless speculative orgy of that era and criticized the attitude of some of our leading financiers. He spoke out then as Marriner S. Eccles is speaking out now.

Other voices were raised in that day before yesterday, too, about the failure during the seemingly prosperous twenties to repair certain weak places in our economy. The farm distress in the West preceded the ultimate collapse in the stock market. Low wages in much of our economy gave it a lack of base and threw it out of balance.

Now, aside from the immediate threat of inflation, other sources of tension have developed since the war—lack of sufficient decent housing, inadequate educational and medical facilities, low wages in the fringe of our economy not yet protected by labor unions, discrimination of various sorts because of race, creed, or color which naturally are magnified against the background of a very recent war to save and restore democracy in the world.

Now is the time when we could do something about them. Now is the time when we ought to do something about them.

It is that which makes of this special session of Congress such a disturbing spectacle when you take a look at its captious fiddling. It reflects a complete lack of leadership.

The recently chosen leader of the Republican Party, Governor Dewey, has chosen to sit cautiously on the sidelines, playing very safe. He is reported to be advising with his party leaders in Congress. His course would appear to be timid if the very thin program that the Republican leadership announced is any index of his own views.

It embraced only two major matters, a limited anti-inflation program and housing. While the anti-inflation program fortunately includes bank and consumer-credit control, both of which were urged upon Republican leaders months ago, it provides none of the other controls that may be badly needed before Congress reassembles in January.

The housing program omits any provision for slum clearance and public housing which is so necessary for those in low-income groups now so tightly strapped, and leaves the comprehensive Taft-Ellender-Wagner bill high and dry in its cubbyhole in the House Rules Committee.

The Civil-Rights Program Should Die

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. W. M. (DON) WHEELER

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 6, 1948

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Speaker, much has been said both pro and con about the so-called civil-rights program which is being currently used for political purposes. A great deal of demagoguery has been practiced in discussing this program. The whole problem has been minimized by treating it as if it were a problem involving merely the question of human rights and liberties under the law.

There is so very much more involved in the settlement of the racial problem in this country than merely the question as to whether segregation is allowed as such or whether a certain race of people appear to be discriminated against in our electoral system. The whole problem has its economic aspect in that the self-righteous do-gooders of the North have sold so many of our southern Negroes on the idea that they are being mistreated in the South that great numbers of them are moving to the North, East, and West. As they move into these areas they compete with the local whites on the labor market and create more serious problems in the communities where they settle than they had caused in the South where their white neighbors had come to know and understand them through the years of living side by side. The hypocrisy of the North is found in the fact that they don't want the Negroes to move into their midst so in an effort to keep them from doing so, attempt to pass Federal laws under which the Negroes can be told that there would be no point in moving from the South.

It is this self-righteous, holier-than-thou-art attitude on the part of the northerners that is so maddening to the southerner who knows from having lived with the problem that traditions of a people cannot be abolished by legislative decree nor can morals be legislated into a people. The very Northerners who so piously preach equality and berate the South for what they please themselves to call bigotry will never be heard to decry the ghettos of Harlem and other Negro communities in the North. They raise their voices in holy horror at the way they claim the South treats the Negro yet the very ones who yell the loudest live themselves within blocks of areas where Negroes by the hundreds are sleeping in the gutters and alleyways.

In spite of all the hypocritical statements to the contrary, there is no gainsaying the fact that the pushing of the civil rights program has and will continue to hurt the Negro in this country. The Negroes themselves do not want the civil-rights program. Being a part of the problem they realize that the customs and habits of a century and a half cannot be abolished overnight by the passage of one law or a hundred laws. If the proponents of the program would use their heads half as much as their mouths they would realize that the race problem is one that must be solved slowly and painstakingly and that it cannot be wished away by law. Many of the proponents already realize this but they see in the program a means of catering to the minority groups in such a way as to get their votes with false promises and are playing their game of hypocrisy for all it is worth.

The passage of the Trumbull laws right after the War Between the States did not destroy segregation in the South when they had all the force of the Union armies to back them up. By the same token the proposed civil-rights laws, if they are ever passed, will not destroy segregation with the backing of the Federal gestapo as proposed by Mr. Truman in his ill-fated and misguided speech of last February. The FBI can do, and is doing, a fair job of hounding to earth a great many criminals in this country, but if it were expanded five times it could never hound into submission the millions of white people in the Southland who cherish their traditions. If great trouble and another splitting asunder of this great country is to be avoided, then the FBI had better stick to its job of apprehending criminals and not be given the job of attempting to destroy the traditions of the great, noble, and proud people of the Southland.

While the hypocritical politicians concern themselves with the civil-rights program in an attempt to get the votes of minority groups in the large cities of the country, a far more serious problem should be receiving their attention. We have allowed the Communist Party to gain strength in this country by accepting it as just another political party, and our leaders in the executive department have tried to excuse them by saying that it is the constitutional right of any American to belong to any party. It is now clearly evident that those of us who have been opposed to the existence of the Communist Party in this country have been right. The disclosures of the last few days which have shown the existence of thousands of Communists in the executive department and the further complete disclosure of the fact that the Communist Party in this country is not in reality a political party but a fifth column of Russia, is complete justification of the stand I took nearly 2 years ago when I said that the Communist Party should be outlawed in this country so that the traitors would not have the cloak of a political party behind which they could hide to do their dirty work. I said then and I now repeat that a proven Communist in this country should be treated just like any other common traitor. Benedict Arnold was a piker compared to some of the traitors we are harboring in places of responsibility and trust in our Government.

In speaking of the Communist threat to this country it would be remiss of me if I were not to tell you that the whole civil-rights program which is now receiving so much attention is part and parcel of the Communist plan to stir up as much trouble and dissension in this country as possible. They know that the enactment of the civil-rights program would split this country asunder politically and socially in such a way as has not been done since the War Between the States. If they can divide us on social and political issues and then work in such a way as to cause another depression in this country they would be well on their way toward the destruction of the American way of life. This is the most important reason for the civil-rights program being dropped and allowed to die. To continue with the agitation of the race problem in this country would be to play right into the hand of the Communists.

Mr. Speaker, I sincerely hope that the Congress will not now or ever attempt to pass Federal legislation which is embodied in the civil-rights program. The whole program is unconstitutional in that it violates States' rights and destroys local self-government. I am inserting herewith two editorials which I think do a good job of expressing the thinking of an Englishman, Mr. Alistair Cooke, in the Manchester Guardian Weekly, under date of July 15, 1948, and the thinking of a Negro editor, Davis Lee, in the Newark Telegram:

[From the Manchester (England) Guardian Weekly of Thursday, July 15, 1948]

SOUTHERN DEMOCRATS IN REVOLT—CIVIL RIGHTS AND THE NEGRO

(By Alistair Cooke)

RICHMOND, VA., July 10.—A southern threat to bolt the party, when the platform committee stubs its toe on the plank of anti-lynch law, is the quadrennial wolf-cry of Democratic conventions. However, the Democratic revolt against President Truman's leadership that has rent the party and demoralized the South is a full-throated protest of the whole South, not alone of its reactionary wing, against one summary act of the Truman administration: the report of the President's Committee on Civil Rights and his February message to Congress, demanding that the report be enacted into Federal statutes.

The report asked for national laws to prohibit lynching, to end the poll tax everywhere, to set up a permanent Fair Employment Practices Commission, to create a civil-rights division in the Justice Department, and to do away with racial discrimination on trains and buses that cross the Mason and Dixon line.

A fine and upright code, surely. So it is, says a surprisingly large body of southern white citizens, who in the last decade have put up Negroes for places in city government, have supported equal rights of pay and promotion, who have started inter-racial councils on municipal housing and health and education, and who have succeeded in introducing Negro police into more than 40 southern cities; and who have done all this against the strong, unregenerate faith of their fathers. The goals of the President's committee are also the unchanging objectives of most progressive Southern leaders who are now frustrated and disheartened by the timing of the President's report and the method he chose to try to enact it.

THE CHANGES IN THE SOUTH

The time was the peak of a period of unprecedented economic and cultural change in the South. The method looks to them like the method of Federal coercion, which a Republican administration used in the civil-rights legislation it enacted in "the tragic era" of the decade immediately following the Civil War. The objections are the ones to consider. Nothing new can be said for the retrogressive doctrine of white supremacy, except perhaps that its fearful adherents do face, where often the southern liberal does not, the reality of miscegenation in the day when the Negro has equal access to housing, schools, and colleges, trades, professions, and community life. But it is the southern liberals who are the hope of the new South, the best hope probably in the long run for an independent and mature third party. For their liberalism is rooted in social participation, in being challenged to live out the attitudes they take up, often at great personal indignity, whereas the resounding liberals of the North are too often evangelists of the printed word, in big cities that excuse them from paying any practical price for their enjoyment of being holier than the neighbors they can comfortably ignore.

The South, then, say these southerners, has changel more in less time than any other region of the country in its standard of living, in the fight of its poor from farms to cities, in approaching a new balance between agriculture and industry, in outlays for public education and public works, and in applied technology and industrial research. It has raised wages higher, spent more of its public funds on education, than the rest of the Nation; and this year will spend more on Negro education alone than it did 20 years ago on all education.

These changes can be, and are being, featured in handsome chamber of commerce brochures as proof of achieved progress, inviting northern firms to locate their factories in the South. But the southern liberals do not claim so much. They see in them inevitable forces that will shape a new southern society. But in the potency of their thrust an elder South is reeling to find its new cultural and social balance. In such a time, say the southern liberals, it is psychologically fatal to southern society to associate these changes with a crusade for abrupt changes in the status of the Negro. The Negro will thus be forced into the role of destroyer and so of scapegoat. Certainly old-time southern politicians are now aroused to an almost pathological alarm at the death agony of the South, over which they exercised so much power, the South with three dependable classes: The landowning and merchant whites, the laboring rural Negro, and the industrial labor pool of the poor white. In the postwar South they see the mechanical cotton picker a reality, cotton fields being dusted by airplane, and 4,000,000 useful Negro hands decamped forever North and West. They see the towns flooding with poor whites and the new urban Negro in direct and bitter competition for skilled work and with a fair chance of beating the white man at his job. This, say the liberals, is the maddest time to sanctify by law the Negro's laboring advantage in a Federal Fair Employment Practices Commission that would declare the industrial revolution won—for the Negro. The effect of the President's report has been to arrest the liberal movement and put the mildest whites on the defensive. "The committee's report," said the sponsor of the most influential of southern interracial councils, "has set our work back 20 years."

DEEP RESENTMENT

The folly of enforcing equality by Federal fiat follows from these complaints. When the rest of the country tells the South how it must treat the Negro the South once again becomes a solid region, regressing into the barren unity of humiliation. The stricter body of Federal laws that the Republicans wrote in the Trumbull bill after the Civil War appear on paper as mutely splendid as those proposed in the President's Committee report. They threatened the use of land and naval forces to bring the South to heel, as the President's Committee proposes the use of Federal police and the withholding of grants-in-aid so that "the idealism and prestige of our whole people may check the wayward tendencies of a part of them." This sentence, when it is read here in the South, attributes the lot of the Negro to a specific perversion in the southern character and has the same effect on the South as vast American generalizations about the British and their cowering Empire have on a Lancashire millhand. The South had to live through the tragic decade of the Trumbull laws and knew them for what they were: A northern punitive campaign against the defeated Confederacy that exploited both the Negro's good faith and his sycophancy to exhibit the final degradation of his master.

The liberal South retains the acute memory of personal history to remind it how men can act when reform is forced by logic made into law. Their frustration today, which is hardly known to the North and West, springs from the dread of inviting another era of brutality, hypocrisy, and corruption at the very moment when it sees the reforms to which it has given its courage and energy ready to be accepted, if only the South is credited with the decency and wisdom to do the job its own way.

THE NEGRO—NORTH AND SOUTH

(By Davis Lee, publisher of the Newark Telegram, Newark, N. J., a weekly Negro newspaper)

I have just returned from an extensive tour of the South. In addition to meeting and talking with our agents and distributors who get our newspaper out to the more than 500,000 readers in the South, I met both Negroes and whites in the urban and rural centers.

Because of these personal observations, studies, and contacts, I feel that I can speak with some degree of authority. I am certainly in a better position to voice an opinion than the Negro leader who occupies a suite in downtown New York and bases his opinions on the South from the distorted stories he reads in the Negro Press and Daily Worker.

The racial lines in the South are so clearly drawn and defined there can be no confusion. When I am in Virginia or South Carolina I don't wonder if I will be served if I walk into a white restaurant. I know the score. However, I have walked into several right here in New Jersey where we have a civil-rights law, and have been refused service.

The whites in the South stay with their own and the Negroes do likewise. This one fact has been the economic salvation of the Negro in the South. Atlanta, Ga., compares favorably with Newark in size and population. Negroes there own and control millions of dollars worth of business. All the Negro business in New Jersey will not amount to as much as our race has in one city in Georgia. This is also true in South Carolina and Virginia.

New Jersey today boasts of more civil rights legislation than any other State in the Union, and State government itself practices more discrimination than Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, or Georgia. New Jersey employs one Negro in the motor vehicle department. All of the States above mentioned employ plenty.

No matter what a Negro wants to do, he can do it in the South. In Spartanburg, S. C., Ernest Collins, a young Negro, operates a large funeral home, a taxicab business, a filling station, grocery store, has several buses, runs a large farm and a night club.

Collins couldn't do all that in New Jersey or New York. The only bus lines operated by Negroes are in the South. The Safe Bus Co. in Winston-Salem, N. C., owns and operates over a hundred. If a Negro in New Jersey or New York had the money and attempted to obtain a franchise to operate a line he would not only be turned down, but he would be lucky if he didn't get a bullet in the back.

Negroes and whites get along much better together in the South than northern agitators would have you believe. Of course, I know that there are some sore spots down there, and we have them up here also. But it is not as bad as it is painted. The trouble in the South stems from dumb, ignorant whites and Negroes, not from the intelligent, better class elements of the two races.

The attitude of the southerners toward our race is a natural psychological reaction and aftermath of the War Between the States. Negroes were the properties of these people. They were not the peers, and were not even considered human in the true sense. The whole economy of the South was built around slavery. The South was forced by bloodshed and much harm to its pride to give up slavery. Overnight these slaves became full-fledged American citizens enjoying the same rights as their former owners.

Certainly you couldn't expect the South to forget this in 75 or even 150 years. That feeling has passed from one generation to another, but it is not one of hatred for the Negro. The South just doesn't believe that the Negro has grown up. No section of the country has made more progress in finding a workable solution to the Negro problem than the South. Naturally southerners are resentful when the North attempts to ram a civil rights program down their throats.

I have pointed out in dozens of editorials that the white people of this country are not only our friends, but they want to see us get ahead as a race. As a matter of fact, we are more prejudiced than those whom we accuse of being prejudiced.

The entire race problem in America is wrong. Our approach is wrong. We expend all our energies, and spend millions of dollars trying to convince white people that we are as good as they are, that we are an equal. Joe Louis is not looked upon as a Negro but the greatest fighter of all time, loved and admired by whites in South Carolina as much as by those in Michigan. He convinced the world, not by propaganda and agitation, but by demonstration.

Our fight for recognition, justice, civil rights and equality, should be carried on within the race. Let us demonstrate to the world by our living standards, our conduct, our ability and intelligence that we are the equal of any man, and when we shall have done this the entire world, including the South, will accept us on our terms. Our present program of threats and agitation makes enemies out of our friends.

A Message to My Constituents

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN R. MURDOCK

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 4, 1948

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, it is presumed that the people of Arizona, especially central Arizona, are more concerned about water than any other local question. I have given many years of study and effort to this problem. I know

Arizona's tragic need for water from the Colorado River, and I also know the justice as well as the legality of her claim upon a portion of that water out of the main stream of the Colorado River. At the moment I would like to discuss our present situation with regard to main-stream Colorado River water, and its prospects, immediate and long-range.

Since volumes have been spoken and written officially and unofficially on this subject, I can give only my personal view of the larger features of the present situation from this vantage point in Washington and in Congress. Of course, Arizona was getting some water from the main Colorado River prior to the signing of that all-important Colorado River compact by representatives of the 7 Basin States on November 24, 1922, at Santa Fe, N. Mex. The water which Arizona's thirsty land was receiving prior to that time was a small amount on Indian lands south of Parker and a larger amount on the Yuma Valley lands south of Yuma. There is no question about Arizona's rightful claim to that prior appropriation. Therefore, what I have to say here deals only with our call for main-stream water other than the two diversions just mentioned.

Not discussing what Arizona feels she ought to have as a proper proportion of the waters of the Colorado River, it now appears our present legal claim hinges upon the divisions made in the Colorado River compact, or as we usually call it, the Santa Fe compact, together with the Boulder Canyon Project Act of 1928 and the California Limitation Act of her legislature in 1929. What water have we received from the main stream of the Colorado River since the basic legislation just mentioned was adopted?

The Boulder Canyon Project Act is the congressional legislation designed to carry out the Santa Fe compact, the basic Seven-State Treaty, so far as the lower basin is concerned. A suggested division of the firm supply of water for the three States of the lower basin, 7,500,000 acre-feet as provided in the compact, was made by Congress in 1928 as follows: 2,800,000 acre-feet to Arizona, 4,400,000 acre-feet to California, and 300,000 acre-feet to Nevada, annually. In order that California, because of her wealth, power, and influence, might not get more than her share, the congressional act of 1928, conferring such great benefits upon California, required the California Legislature to pass an act of limitation before the congressional act should become effective. In other words, Congress required California to agree that the 4,400,000 acre-feet should be the limit of her "take" of the water out of the Colorado River, in firm supply, apportioned by the compact. And this was made a condition precedent before the Boulder Canyon Project Act should be effective.

To make doubly sure to protect the other States from California, the Congressional Act of 1928 not only required the legislature of California to recognize and accept, on behalf of the State of California, the 4,400,000 acre-feet annually, in firm supply, as the top limit of California's share of apportioned water, but in unmistakable language declared that that act was an irrevocable covenant between California on the one hand and on the other hand the United States Government and all the other six Basin States. The other six States were named, headed by Arizona. There can be no question about 4,400,000 acre-feet annually, in firm supply, of apportioned water, being the accepted limit of California's quota. But what about the other two quotas for Arizona and Nevada?

Nevada has contracted for 300,000 acre-feet—the total suggested by the Congressional Act of 1928—and Arizona has contracted with the Secretary of the Interior for the 2,800,000 acre-feet as suggested by the congressional act of 1928. To my mind there is not a shadow of a doubt but that Arizona is legally entitled by existing law to a firm supply of water out of the main stream of the Colorado River to the amount of 2,800,000 acre-feet annually, if it is physically available. Of course, this amount like all the other water contracts, may be pared down somewhat by certain other necessary considerations. Naturally, Arizona wants to get as much of that water as possible, and that has been the chief objective of our efforts here in Congress, assisted by various organizations at home. Of course, California has resisted us every step of the way. I am convinced that there are those in Southern California who would like to prevent Arizona from getting any of that main-stream water and who have designs and plans to use that water in a less vital way and for their own purposes.

In 1947 a measure was passed that recognizes Arizona's right to 600,000 acre-feet of water as a total for the Gila project in Yuma County. That legislation is on the statute books, and the project is well under way, although it will take some years to complete it. Legislation has also been introduced in both the House and the Senate by all the members of the Arizona delegation which would furnish something over 1,000,000 acre-feet of water annually to central Arizona. Although all four of your delegation have introduced identical measures, this bill is better known in Arizona as S. 1175, on which hearings have been held in the Senate, at which a large number of very competent witnesses from Arizona gave their testimony. What are the chances of passing such legislation?

I recognize that it is going to be a difficult battle, but I sincerely believe that the prospects are improving, and I have hope for the ultimate success for this project and victory for Arizona to that extent. The Senate hearings on S. 1175 contain testimony by witnesses from southern California indicating the extent and strength of their opposition, but in addition to that, these representatives of water agencies in southern California sought to throw the whole controversy into litigation. And Members of Congress from California introduced resolutions, both in the House and in the Senate, to require a Supreme Court decision as to how much water each State may have. A committee of the Senate and a subcommittee of the House Judiciary Committee each held extensive hearings on the resolutions calling for a Supreme Court case. However, no favorable action has been taken on those resolutions in the present Congress.

I have high regard for the Supreme Court, but this is not its job. As it seems now, Congress will not legislate this controversy into the courts. This seems to leave the way clear to press for congressional legislation which will carry out the terms of the compact and extend the provisions of the Boulder Canyon Project Act by subsequent congressional action as originally planned. That is the program on which I have given most of my energy as your Representative in Congress, and it is for favorable action in this legislative way that I shall continue to work while representing any part of Arizona in Congress.

President Truman Appeals to the Republican Leadership To Allow Congress To Consider Really Effective Measures To Stop High Prices

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HERMAN P. EBERHARTER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 6, 1948

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement by the President as reported in the Christian Science Monitor of August 5, 1948:

TRUMAN ASSAILS CONGRESS

WASHINGTON.—President Truman's statement on the extra session of Congress:

"It now appears that the Eightieth Congress is determined to take no effective action on the proposals which I have submitted to curb high prices and to protect the average American citizen against the certain prospect of increased living costs.

"I have been informed that the Republican leadership has decided that the Congress will not be allowed to consider really effective measures to stop high prices. Republican leaders reached this decision without obtaining the full information the administration was prepared to offer in connection with my recommendations. In fact, the chairman of the House Committee on Banking and Currency refused a request for three Cabinet members to be given an opportunity to testify before the committee.

"The Secretaries of Agriculture, Commerce, and Interior were and are now prepared to testify. The Secretary of Agriculture was prepared to offer a program directed to the problem of excessive food prices. The Secretary of Commerce was prepared to discuss with the committee the question of shortages of industrial materials and what could be done to correct the situation. The Secretary of the Interior was prepared to submit a program dealing with the proper distribution and prices of coal, heating oil, and other fuels. The committee of the House refused to receive the views of these members of my Cabinet. In the absence of such basic information, I do not see how the committee can make an intelligent decision on issues which so gravely affect the welfare of the American people and their standards of living.

"Following the same pattern, the Ways and Means Committee of the House refused to give any consideration to the recommendations for an excess-profits tax, which is necessary to offset the inflationary effects of the tax bill passed last spring. The chairman of this committee has not even called a meeting of the committee since the Congress reconvened.

"It would appear that the Republican leaders are unwilling to extend to the Congress an opportunity to vote on the issues of direct price control, the authority to impose allocations and priorities, and the other elements of a balanced program which I submitted to the Congress including provisions to strengthen and reinforce rent control.

"It now appears that so far the Congress has failed to discharge the tasks for which I called it into special session. It is my hope, therefore, that the Republican leadership will reconsider their present plans for quick adjournment and will take actions upon the recommendations I have submitted.

"There is still time for the Congress to fulfill its responsibilities to the American people. Our people will not be satisfied with the feeble compromises that apparently are being concocted."

Facts on Inflation: Are Selective Price Controls Effective?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 6, 1948

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, the Republican charge: The President's proposal to impose selective price controls on scarce commodities ineffective. Price controls must be imposed either on all commodities or on none at all.

Answer: The very opposite is true. The present situation is totally different from the situation which we had during the war. During the war, we had a terrific discrepancy between purchasing power and civilian supplies and consequently we needed all our controls. Today, production has caught up with demand in many areas and those areas do not require controls. However, in other fields scarcities are still acute, and in those fields we need controls.

That selective price controls can be highly effective is demonstrated by the experience of our neighbor, Canada. Canada has continued the system of selective price controls, and, as a result, Canada's cost of living increased by only 52 percent over that of 1935–39, while the American cost of living has increased 72 percent. Canadian food prices have increased 78 percent while American food prices have increased 114 percent. For every dollar an American spends today for food, clothing, or rent, a Canadian has to spend only 75 cents.

On the same day in June 1948, Canadians paid 53 cents for sirloin steak and Americans had to pay 85 cents; Canadians paid 69 cents for butter, Americans paid 90 cents; Canadians paid 29 cents for hamburger, Americans paid 55 cents.

The Friendship Fleet

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALEXANDER WILEY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, August 7 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I have previously referred in the Senate to the Wisconsin Centennial which is being celebrated this year and to the great centennial exposition in Milwaukee, Wis. I hope that many of my colleagues will be able to visit the Badger State this summer and rest up prior to the November elections. On previous occasions I have called attention to the great beauties and all the other tourist attractions of Wisconsin.

One of the novel features of the centennial celebrations has been the sailing of a centennial friendship fleet overseas carrying with it the warm contributions of the people of my State to the people of the lands from which they were descended.

At this time, I want to ask unanimous consent that there be printed at this point in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a letter which I have just sent to General Marshall describing this friendship fleet and urging that its example be followed in other States of the Union and other organizations.

I ask that following that letter there be printed a list of the officials and committees who have done magnificent work in planning for the centennial celebrations in my State. The fruits of their labors can be seen throughout Wisconsin in the magnificent series of celebrations and other observances already held, now being held and to be held.

There being no objection, the matters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
August 6, 1948.

Gen. GEORGE C. MARSHALL,
Secretary of State,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: My purpose in writing you is to inquire whether the State Department can take measures to encourage the shipment of relief parcels abroad voluntarily by American citizens and organizations in additional ways than have thus far been attempted. Already tremendous progress has been made along this line.

As I wrote to you the other day, I believe that if the postage-rate reduction on the gift parcels going to western European countries could be extended to countries behind the iron curtain, I believe tremendous good for United States public relations in the Soviet satellite lands could accrue.

Along this same line, you are, of course, familiar with the oustanding record of the Wisconsin Centennial Friendship Fleet sponsored by the Wisconsin Manufacturers Association, which has now sent two ships from the Badger State through the Lakes up the St. Lawrence to Norway and Denmark. The second ship left for Denmark with 700 food packages and 7,000 pounds of clothing for Danish families and institutions. I humbly believe that this record of my own State in sending these ships constituted an inspiring symbol to all the American people and could well be followed in other States.

A third two-way voyage of a Friendship Fleet boat will be made to Holland, Belgium, and Germany, starting from Milwaukee around September 11.

I feel that if the State Department could bring its influence to bear along the lines of encouragement of such voluntary contributions by American organizations and by individual States, that we would be able to better counter Russian propaganda against our country.

The State Department has carried on a vast public-relations program of its own acquainting leading American organizations, fraternal groups, church leaders, etc., with the importance of the Marshall plan and other foreign-relations issues and I feel that if it could devote similar energy to a voluntary contribution program that its efforts could bear much fruit. Never have the American people fallen down when a question of aid to stricken lands and peoples has been presented to them. Always the generous heart of America has responded spontaneously, promptly, adequately.

The record in sending of CARE packages attest to those facts.

But everywhere I hear from individuals and organizations: "What can I do or what can we do to aid United States public relations abroad and to relieve suffering and hardship? How can we go about it?" If your Department and the Department of Commerce could serve as clearing houses, suggesting alternative ways by which the generous heart of America could act, then I believe an even vaster trend of voluntary contributions would develop.

If, in summary, the example of the Wisconsin Centennial Friendship Fleet could serve as a model on which other similar efforts might be made through the cooperation of your Department, then perhaps many of your Department's problems overseas in our relations with foreign peoples and foreign countries would be that much eased.

Thanking you for your consideration of this suggestion and of my previous recommendation for extension of postage-rate reductions to iron-curtain lands, I am

Sincerely yours,

ALEXANDER WILEY.

Issues of Present Campaign

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. WILLIAM S. HILL

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I share with everyone the gloom over current foreign events, and I hope that the American people this fall will decide that they have gone far enough down the road of confusion and uncertainty under the leadership of the present administration.

And I am confident that they will give many more New Dealers plenty of leisurely time in which to write their memoirs of "why it happened" and "why we could not tell anybody about it at the time."

We know why much of it happened and how it happened for 15 long years and why everything possible has been done at every turn of events to prevent the American people from learning the truth.

Our political enemies are coming up with new tomes practically every day. And do they make some revealing reading.

They answer the twin questions: "Why are we where we are today?" and "Who put us here?"

During the war the American people made great sacrifices. They met crisis after crisis in true American spirit.

They surrendered to their Federal Government many of the rights so highly valued by every citizen.

They yielded gladly the rights which our forefathers, in writing the Constitution, zealously guarded.

To escape the tyranny of Europe's political dictators, they ran the risk of possible tyranny at home.

For 15 long years those rights have been pre-empted, the prerogatives of Congress have been challenged, and our Chief Executive has tried to do all our thinking.

Now we are told there is another aggressor loose in the world. He is more avaricious and bloodthirsty than Hitler; he is more brazen and contemptible than Mussolini; he is more cunning and cruel than Tojo.

This new threat to world peace, we are told, is the reincarnation of all evil.

Granted. But we Republicans do not have to be told these thing now. We have been screaming from the housetops about them for years.

We are in a grave situation, so the Democratic candidate for re-election to the presidency says. Then is it not logical to ask, "Who put us there?"

Isn't it germane to this whole thing to re-examine the character and abilities of these men who announce these "new" dangers?

Since they have been so long in control of our national and international destinies, are we not entitled to assess these new developments in the light of their mistakes, their errors in judgment, their deficiencies in capacity and stature?

Or are we to be once more juggled around on the brink of a purposeful precipice, confronted with another of their "crucial periods," locked in another condemned and haunted house to which they alone have the key?

God knows we Republicans are realists. We agree that as a Nation we must do whatever is necessary to stop the march of another Hitler.

We agree that we must do whatever is necessary to prevent the catastrophe of a third world war.

Mr. Truman and his advisers in Washington tell us that we must spend about $39,000,000,000 for the management of our National Government.

They also tell us that a special fund of some 20 billions will save the world from communism.

But it isn't the money alone they demand.

They must have back wartime powers.

In short, all over again, we must not only make some sacrifices in the form of heavy taxes and lowered standard of living, but we must forego guaranties of the Constitution, the same guaranties which have kept us from becoming a police state.

I think we are justified in saying, "Hold on a minute."

I think experience entitles us to wonder about their plan, to expose it to a little interrogation.

Has the Democratic candidate for President a true grasp of problems at home and abroad? Has he the ability to formulate our foreign policy or to carry it out?

We Republicans shout, "No."

We are in favor of giving help to those countries that are opposing communism, but we want the people to understand why it is necessary. We want them to know the truth and the whole truth.

We don't want the American people to stagger around in the dark, to wait a few years and then have to pay $3.50 for a book to find out what the State Department was really doing while the public was told a cock-and-bull story.

It is about time that people started to realize that the same group in Washington today that is demanding our money to fight communism helped to build up communism here and everywhere.

The Red revolution in Russia took place in 1917. For 12 years, three successive Republican Presidents refused to recognize the little group who had taken over a whole nation.

In 1933, a Democratic administration extended recognition to the Russian Government—and against the advice of some of its own party stalwarts.

They permitted the spies and the propagandists of the Communists to overrun this country. Americans were denied freedom of movement in Russia, but the Democratic administration denied the Commies nothing over here—up to and including participation and employment in every department of our Federal Government.

A Republican minority fought every step of this devious infiltration by avowed enemies of our form of government.

We knew them for what they are and for what they have always been: Godless, atheistic malefactors of humanity, sworn foes of capitalism and the American way of life.

Remember our conviction that every Russian diplomat was a spy, that every spy was a saboteur?

What happened in those days?

The White House welcomed them to tea parties on the lawn. The Army commissioned Communists as officers in our national defense, gave them possession of our secret plans and our weapons.

Even President Harry Truman vetoed the first bill that gave American workmen the only chance they ever had to throw Communist leaders out of their unions.

In 1944, when a reporter at San Francisco asked Harry Truman, then candidate for Vice President, if he would refuse the support of Communists, he replied:

"We will not refuse the support of anyone who can help elect us."

Sounds a little like a former member of Mr. Truman's Cabinet who is now campaigning for President.

Who gave Russia $13,000,000,000 in lend-lease while American military planes were forbidden to land on Russian soil? Mind, you, our ally would not let us come down on her territory and any plane that did was confiscated.

Many American aviators were shot down over the Rumanian oil fields because they did not have gas enough to return to their bases.

Who agreed to give Russia one-third of Poland, the first country to be sacrificed against Hitler?

Who solemnly guaranteed free elections in the remnant of Poland and then never lifted a finger to prevent absorption of the whole country by Stalin's supporters?

Who gave Russia half of Korea and the Kurile Islands for a week end's participation in the Japanese war, after the fighting was over?

Who sent Marshall to China to try to influence the Chinese Government to take the Communists into their government?

We know the answer to each one of these questions and so do the American people.

Undoubtedly the New Deal made a dirty political agreement with the Communist Party in America. During the war the Commies went out of existence politically to go into partnership with them. That is history. That is not a partisan charge or accusation. That is the God's honest truth.

Earl Browder, that arch villain of bolshevik plotting, was freed from Federal prison where a United States jury sent him. He came out on a Presidential pardon, returned later to the Kremlin for new orders, and is back here now supposedly selling books.

And you can be sure that it is not copies of the United States Constitution he is peddling.

Mrs. Browder, quite a conspirator in her own right, was readmitted to this country from Canada. Harry Bridges was not deported.

If you did not have a taste for caviar and vodka in those days you were just too, too provincial.

Thank God, the Republicans had courage enough to remain "provincial."

The Democratic Party wants to forget all that now.

It is too late—much too late—for this Democratic administration to be discovering the menace of communism.

To paraphrase an old saying: "You can't lie down with a bear and get up without red lice."

What happened when the war ended and all of the thoughts of mankind centered on an organization to preserve the peace of the world?

Washington did a courtesy to Moscow, gave "Uncle Joe" three votes to our one in the United Nations, gave him veto power over every honest effort to maintain peace in the world.

Now they have in addition the votes of: Poland, Rumania, Yugoslavia, Hungary, and Czechoslovakia.

The most wonderful of all the Administration's "plans" is the payment of $6,000,000,000 to our enemies of the late war, so that they can pay reparations to Russia and replace the industrial plants that Stalin's locusts have dismantled and moved back into Russia.

It is Republican opposition to these dubious economic gestures that has "reined in" the "let's give it away" boys in Washington.

It is the Republican Party alone which will keep from our people the regimentation upon which communism thrives.

It is Republican leadership that has brought about the scrapping of this "appease Russia" policy of our State Department.

They're beginning to see the light in Washington and it's from a lantern we Republicans have been swinging in front of their eyes for years.

On domestic issues, our Chief Executive a few months ago said, "Price control is a method of the police state" or words to that effect—of course there is some merit to this statement—prices cannot be fully regulated except by a police state of inspection and direction.

This administration has violently opposed three fundamental conditions without which the spiral of high prices will continue: First, freedom of production from governmental or bureaucratic control and direction; second, a reduction of Federal expenditures; and third, sound tax reduction legislation. Of course, with an expenditure of foreign relief of more than $5,000,000,000 per year we may need some Federal allocation of scarce material such as steel, and so forth, but such control and direction must be used with care and caution.

On the reducing of Federal expenses I need to cite but one example—Federal civilian employees have been increasing at an average of nearly 500 per day since January 1948. In 1949—estimated—there will be on our pay rolls some 2,100,000 civilian employees, as contrasted to 1939—just previous to the war—929,000 civilian employees and the cost—estimated for 1948—$7,000,000,000, as for 1939, actual, $1,850,000,000.

On tax reduction I need only to call to your attention that all tax reducing legislative proposals have thus far received a Presidential veto.

Of veterans' legislation the Eightieth Congress has not been negligent. Congress passed 188 bills meeting needs of war veterans, increasing pensions and allowances and paying terminal-leave bonds in cash.

Congress freed the people and small business from 76,000 rules, regulations, directives and orders of the bureaucrats, with a resulting all-time high in employment, production, profits and wages, and a record $200,000,000,000 annual national income. The President claims credit for this change in conditions when he says he should be re-elected because of the prosperity—while at the same time he says Republicans should be defeated for not returning those controls which had prevented this prosperity until the Republican election victory of 1946.

Congress cut the national debt by $7,000,000,000, reduced the President's budget by $6,000,000,000, balanced the Federal budget for the first time in 16 years, amassed a surplus of $8,419,469,843, and stopped deficit financing.

You are being told by propagandists whose appreciation for the truth can be seriously doubted that a Republican Congress is starving and severely crippling our western irrigation projects by its "pinch-penny policy" of providing funds. Time does not permit me to consider other projects than our own Colorado Big Thompson construction. What are the facts?

Your Republican Congress has made only two annual appropriations for this project. What are the sums? For this year a total of $20,225,000. For last year a total of $16,650,000 or a total for the two Republican sessions of Congress: $36,875,000—more than half the estimated sum they told us would be required to build this project when we voted a first mortgage on all our homes in the northern Colorado Water Conservancy District to provide our share of the construction cost. Not too stingy would you say?

What did the Democratic-controlled Congresses grant from 1941 to 1947, inclusive? Here are the figures:

From 1941 to 1947, inclusive, they appropriated a total sum of $31,500,000. A Republican-controlled Congress in 2 years provided more than $36,875,000 for this same project.

The figures show that the first session of a Republican Congress more than doubled the amount provided by a previous Democratic-controlled session. And this last session of the Eightieth Congress provided a sum nearly three times the amounts provided by the last Democratic-controlled Congress.

On the Rural Electrification Administration programs we discover that a Republican-controlled Congress—the first session of the Eightieth—provided the sum of $400,000,000 for the fiscal year 1948; while the Democratic Congress for the fiscal year 1947 provided only $250,000,000. Four hundred million dollars was also provided for the fiscal year 1949. Colorado fared equally as well as the national program—receiving in the fiscal year 1948, $5,250,000—which was more than a million dollars above the sum allotted the previous year.

Let no Republican be carried away by propaganda, false statements, or wild prognostications of the dark future that awaits us if a Republican administration should take control of our Government. Let me add that we would have more for actual construction but much less for useless and false propaganda.

At this moment, America stands as the world's last real road block in the path of those who seek to shatter our free-enterprise system and substitute their own. Already, they have made stunning progress—not only abroad but in our own country. They confidently expect our road block will crumble and fall.

It is up to all of us not only to prevent that, but to make the road block even stronger.

That is a big order.

It calls for more brains, imagination, faith, and downright effort than we have ever mustered before—even during the war.

Cars for Amputee Veterans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, the furnishing of cars to amputee veterans has proved to be one of the finest rehabilitation steps yet taken. I am particularly happy that in the closing days of this session we have added an additional $5,000,000 for this purpose.

This sum will make possible the filling of some 3,100 applications for those who have lost the use of their legs. I have been bitterly disappointed not to secure the passage through the House of the bill to provide cars for the arm amputees and the blind. I shall fight for the passage of this bill immediately on the return of Congress.

I would now like to say a word about veterans' housing.

Everyone agrees that the Veterans' Homestead Act of 1948 would really give veterans a break in housing. Everyone agrees that the provisions of the bill would enable veterans' homestead associations to build homes and apartments in their own communities at substantially lower prices and rentals than those which prevail in today's market.

The final cost to the Government is trivial in comparison with other expenditures for far less worthy purposes than the providing of homes for our young war veterans, but the total cash outlay is of manageable proportions. The total outlay involves an amount less than one-fifth of the current rate of new investment in residential building, and probably even less. If countersteps are taken to restrain a small part of the existing demand for nonveteran dwellings, or for nonresidential construction, then clearly no inflationary influences can be attributed to this important aid for veterans. Further, the important cost-saving devices available to the homestead associations, and the reasonable value protection provided as ceilings on loans to individual veterans, will have a salutary and profound influence in helping to bring stability to the entire home realty market at levels below those now prevailing.

It is a keen disappointment to me that the homestead bill was not enacted during the Eightieth Congress. It will be a keen disappointment to the thousands of veterans throughout the country who are in need of homes and who will not be substantially helped by the housing legislation which we have passed. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that when the Eighty-first Congress convenes that one of the first pieces of legislation to be considered will be the homestead bill, for our veterans need housing, and they are deserving of our best consideration. All groups interested in solving the housing problem should get together at the next session and exert every effort to aid our veterans in this field.

Increase of Automobile Prices

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HERBERT R. O'CONOR

OF MARYLAND

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, August 7 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. O'CONOR. Mr. President, previously I have spoken out to urge that definite action be taken at this special session of Congress to affect a reduction in living costs.

No better index to the rise of commodity costs could be cited than that of automobiles. Various commodity costs are reflected in the retail list prices of automobiles; and inasmuch as millions of our citizens require motor transportation daily, the sharp increases in the price of automobiles affect them vitally. In this week's issue of United States News and World Report there is to be found a table headed "Rise of Auto Prices Since 1939." I ask unanimous consent that this table be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD immediately following my remarks.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Principles of Arkansas Student Political League

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. E. C. GATHINGS

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. GATHINGS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following policies of Arkansas Student Political League which were sent me from the University of Arkansas. The principles of this organization are most laudable:

POLICIES OF ARKANSAS STUDENT POLITICAL LEAGUE

The Arkansas Student Political League referred to as the ASPL was organized at the University of Arkansas in January of 1948, by a group of students interested in better government for the State of Arkansas.

The purpose and principles of the ASPL as set out in the constitution are to strive for the betterment of the University of Arkansas, to foster and support legislation which will improve the standards of education in this State, to recruit young and intelligent leadership in governmental affairs, and to make constructive suggestions to responsible officeholders, to encourage all students of voting age to qualify as legal voters, to encourage intelligent and active participation in politics by all students, and to invite the candidates for public offices to address campus political rallies and to give their platforms and qualifications.

Since its organization the ASPL has sponsored several candidates for public office to speak at the University, and in addition has presented to the candidates for governor of the State a list of questions on controversial issues of primary importance to the citizens of this State for these candidates to answer, for the purpose of publishing these answers in the papers of the State and thus give the voters the opinions and stand on these vital questions of the various candidates thus enabling the people to more intelligently vote for the candidate of his or her choice and the one with the views that coincide most nearly with their own. A plan was carried out to secure absentee ballots for the summer students at the University of Arkansas at no cost to the student and with a minimum of trouble, all for the purpose of securing more active participation in the politics of the State. Over 350 absentee ballots were thus obtained. A radio forum has been sponsored by the ASPL over station KUOK, Siloam Springs, Ark., at which time the platforms of the various candidates for Governor were discussed, giving the voters a chance to fuller understand the issues that confront the State today. Both national political parties have been contacted requesting speakers for this fall, in order that the students may have the opportunity to know more about the candidates running for President. There is also a drive planned to encourage the students and citizens of Arkansas to qualify for voting for the coming year.

Plans are being made to organize new chapters at universities and colleges in Arkansas and the surrounding States. To date a chapter has been formed at Magnolia A. & M. College and definite action has been taken toward establishing a chapter at the Texarkana Division of the University of Texas. Contacts are being made with the campus leaders in other colleges within the State and it is the hope of the ASPL that within a very short time that chapters all over the State will be formed and functioning to bring about better government.

It is the aim of the ASPL to carry forward the principles of the organization and insure the people of the State the good government which they deserve. This can best be achieved by the combined efforts of all students of every college in the State, and the active participation of all people, in the most important of all the functions of a government founded on democratic principles—that of electing those who will serve them in the public offices in this State.

The ASPL is nonpartisan in that it supports no candidate for any office and in no way endorses one candidate over any other. The people simply hear through the ASPL the thoughts and views of the candidates who present themselves to the people for their approval or rejection in the election process.

Comments by Hon. H. Alexander Smith, of New Jersey, on President Truman's Message

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. H. ALEXANDER SMITH
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, August 7 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, when the Congress reconvened I made a brief statement which I released to the press in New Jersey with regard to the emergency session. Also, subsequently, on August 4, I sent to the editors of the various newspapers in my State of New Jersey a summary of the problems, as I saw them, involved in dealing with inflation. I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD the two statements referred to.

There being no objection, the statements were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SENATOR SMITH COMMENTS ON PRESIDENT TRUMAN'S MESSAGE

The President's message to the extra session of the Congress, in my judgment, does not present an extraordinary occasion, which under the Constitution is the justification for convening both Houses. Certainly there is no international crisis that requires the legislative attention of the Congress. Therefore, the question arises as to whether the measures advocated by the President require immediate legislative action.

It is my own considered judgment that, in the absence of some extraordinary emergency, which apparently is contemplated by the Constitution, it is not in the best interest of the American people to hold a session of the Congress between the time of the political conventions called to nominate for the high office of President, and the actual election. At such a time there is real danger that what should be a dignified session of the Congress may well deteriorate into an atmosphere of partisan political turmoil.

The fact remains, however, that the Congress is actually in session in response to the President's call. I feel, therefore, that it would be unwise to adjourn without giving attention to some of these matters, and I believe that a limited program of legislation should be promptly passed, and the Congress should then adjourn. Such a program of action would include:

1. The passage of the Taft-Ellender-Wagner housing bill, which has already passed the Senate and is now pending in the House;
2. The amendment of the cloture rules of the Senate to the end that the way may be cleared for sound civil-rights legislation;
3. The passage of the Federal aid to education bill, which has passed the Senate and is now pending in the House;
4. The amendment of the displaced persons bill to eliminate the discriminatory features;
5. The authorization of the United Nations loan of $65,000,000 to provide for the headquarters in the United States.

In my judgment, these matters could be taken care of within the next 2 weeks, or at the outside, in 3 weeks, and it would be contrary to the best interests of the American people to continue the Congress in session any longer than that.

THE INFLATION PROBLEM

In my brief press release, which I issued immediately after the convening of the Congress and the receiving of the President's message, I purposely left out the subject of inflation and possible cures for it, because of my desire to get at the facts and receive the best possible advice from economists in whom I have confidence.

After conferring with experts in the field, certain steps have been suggested which seem to be sound in their approach, and which I am glad to give publicity to for the benefit of my constituents in New Jersey. These steps are recommended as those which would be of most immediate practical value.

First. The Government, which has control of expenditures, should drastically reduce further construction activities at this time. The figures indicate that public construction for the country as a whole, including Federal, State, and local, has increased as follows since 1946:

Month of—
June 1946	$172,000,000
December 1946	194,000,000
June 1947	274,000,000
December 1947	223,000,000
May 1948	339,000,000

During this period there was no appreciable change in the volume of military and naval construction, so that has not affected the over-all policy. I can well understand why the administration does not want to apply this particular brake on the inflation spiral in light of the political implications—some of these construction projects affect vitally certain areas of the country where the effect on the pending elections may be important.

Second. It is recommended that the administration should refrain from supporting farm prices at levels above those established by present laws—if and as changing conditions result in extensive declines. Most of our inflation troubles are in the area of foodstuffs, and especially have to do with the meat situation. From studies made, the following facts are deduced.

The sharp rise in farm prices, which occurred in late 1946, was directly related to the failure of the corn crop and the European requirements for grain. The sharp rise in prices of feedstuffs was also reflected in the prices of livestock, poultry, and dairy products. The peak of the movement in grain prices was reached in midwinter and there has been a recession since that time. This is due in part to improved crop conditions in Europe, and recently to the evidence of a good wheat and a large corn crop for this country. Grain prices have been declining and it now appears practically certain that the price of feedstuffs this autumn will be very much below the levels of a year ago, possibly below the levels of 2 years ago.

In light of this condition, there is apt to be pressure to maintain or even raise the present Government price supports, which of course would put a brake on any tendency for prices to fall. Here again, the administration has control of the policy to be adopted, and of course is influenced by the politically important consideration of not antagonizing the farmers.

I am advised that, in spite of a possible easing of grain prices, the prices of livestock and meat will not show any corresponding reduction. Indeed, they may remain at or near present levels. Two factors account for this situation:

(1) The livestock population has been declining and the human population has been increasing, and

(2) The rise in real income among great sections of the population has sharply increased the consumption of meat products. Only a small proportion of the population foregoes meat consumption because of high prices.

As a matter of fact, the present administration has encouraged the decrease in the amount of livestock during the past few years because of the desire to maintain agricultural prices. Also, the high prices for meats have tempted livestock owners to market their products rather than to build up their herds.

Some classes of farm products, especially fruit and vegetables, have ceased to be scarce and pressures exist for Government support at prices above the legal floors. The administration can assist the hard-pressed consumer by resisting such pressures, but again political expediency has its place in the picture.

Third. In the industrial field, the greatest advances in prices have been in building materials and bituminous coal. In both cases, sharply rising costs have been a primary factor. In the case of building materials, the enormous volume of construction activity has resulted in bidding for scarce materials and consequent price advances. The rise has been particularly pronounced in the case of lumber.

In this connection, I quote a significant statement from the Midyear Economic Report of the President, which was released on Saturday last. Incidentally, this statement in the President's own report seems to negative to a large extent his charges that the Eightieth Congress has done nothing to ease the housing situation. His report says (p. 3):

"Residential construction is expected to increase the total supply of dwelling units by more than a million during 1948. This high output has been accompanied by an increase in costs that is outrunning consumers' ability to pay for the housing they need."

The report goes on to say, under the heading "Residential construction" (p. 14):

"About 450,000 new residential units in new buildings were started during the half year. Counting also conversions and alterations, more than a million units will probably be added to the residential supply during 1948."

And then note the following:

"This volume of residential construction is already straining the capacities of the construction industry in many areas and of producers of some construction materials, and is unquestionably competing with other primary national needs."

This raises the question whether any immediate additional housing legislation would be effective or more than a gesture.

Fourth. It is recommended that legislation be passed to restrict the volume of consumer credit. This is being considered now by committees of the Congress, and I expect some legislation along this line.

Fifth. It is further recommended that we increase reserve requirements at the banks, again with the purpose of reducing credits. Legislation may be passed along this line, although I anticipate opposition from the banks. Any such action would almost certainly curtail production, which in the last analysis is the answer to rising costs. Such action might also precipitate too rapid a deflation.

There are other areas in which the Government, by its own action, and without the necessity of legislation, can resist inflation. For example, in the housing field, much can be done by requiring sound appraisals of the real-estate values on guaranteed and insured loans. In the export field, the powers of the Department of Commerce to impose import restrictions can restrict our export of industrial and agricultural products to reasonable limitations. But, beyond this, the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System and the Treasury already have great powers, not fully used, over credit expansion and inflation, as for example:

(a) Control of the discount rate.

(b) Fixing of prices for Government securities.

(c) Open market operations to deflate.

(d) Sell securities from Government accounts.

It has further been suggested that to absorb the excess purchasing power of the people, a widespread campaign might be put on by the Treasury to sell Government bonds, with an attractive interest rate, payable over a period of years, which would induce people to get into the sound habit of saving at least a part of their present high incomes, the proceeds of which would be used to pay off Government short-term loans as they mature.

It is believed by those with whom I have been in conference that an over-all policy of this kind, with more attention by the administration itself to the controls within its power, should do much to ease the present tension.

PRICE CONTROLS

Obviously, however, the President and his advisers are intent on imposing on the people of the United States price controls and rationing. The best advice I can get points out that wartime experience in this and other countries has proved conclusively that a price-control program cannot be effective without wage controls. It seems perfectly obvious that a rising wage spiral must necessarily bring about higher prices, because the costs of the product must be covered in the price received. In peacetime, wage controls are impracticable and unenforceable; consequently, a general price-control program could, at best, merely retard price advances, but this would be almost certain, if we may judge from experience, to impede production, and let me repeat again, that production is the ultimate key to curbing inflation. Wartime experience also showed that a general price-control program had to be accompanied by rationing. A rationing system cannot be put into operation in any short period of time and is impossible of enforcement in many lines of activity. Wartime experience also proved that an attempt to roll back prices inevitably involves hardships for many companies who are behind the procession, and it thus necessitates subsidies if these companies are to survive. Without their survival, of course, production is again decreased.

Selective price controls, leveled at particular commodities in short supply cannot be effective. This obviously applies to the meat situation. An increase in wage costs or in the costs of raw materials would necessitate upward price adjustments. At best, such selective controls might serve as a restraining influence; at worst they would result inevitably in black markets and shifts to substitute commodities. Such controls could not be enforced in the case of meat, the high cost of which most concerns the American housewife. As a matter of fact, meat would again disappear from the market as it did when we tried imposing controls under the OPA.

In making this general statement, I have gone into some detail because I think it is very important for our people to know the complications that are involved when we attempt to deal with inflation. We are in the midst of an expanding economy, and inflation is part of the price we have been compelled to pay because of our policy of assisting the rehabilitation of the countries of Europe.

It is my own considered judgment that prompt courageous action by the administration, irrespective of political consequences, would be the best road toward curbing inflation, and the suggested methods of credit controls which our committees are now considering will be of assistance. We must realize, however, that we cannot have our cake and eat it. Let me add that I am not sympathetic with the "scare" talk that the President incorporated in his message, nor am I afraid of any such run-away inflation as appeared in some of the uneconomically sound countries of Europe immediately following the war. America can survive this crisis if we stop calling names, tighten our belts, and all work together to produce.

Miss Huenefeld's Winning Essay—Farming: a Way of Life

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. E. C. GATHINGS

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. GATHINGS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article:

FARMING: A WAY OF LIFE

(By Mary Huenefeld)

(Judged second best in Southern Agriculturist's rural life contest is this article written by Mary Huenefeld, of Gregory, Ark., She was awarded $50 and an expense-paid trip to New York and Washington, with Anita Bolinger, grand prize winner, accompanied by Milbrey Frazer Covert, editor of the Youth Department. Look for the story of their trip in the September issue of Southern Agriculturist.)

My mother has always said she had rather we would be "country gentlefolk" than cafe society people. She has done her best to rear us that way.

We know that we will never be rich, but we live happily and well.

There is satisfaction in growing cattle and crops that furnish food, clothing, and other necessities for mankind. Farming is a necessary and vital profession.

The farmer is, in a way, an adventurer. He is constantly gambling with the elements. Weather being the most important factor to the success or failure of a crop, he must understand and take advantage of any breaks he gets in the weather. The author of Wind, Sand, and Stars says that the farmer has more in common with an aviator than he has with a storekeeper or a bank clerk.

Last year, due to the fact that we had a bad drought, my father lost two-thirds of his income. Some years this is the case with floods. But in years when nature is cooperating with the farmer, there is a sense of partnership.

Probably the most satisfying thing to a farmer is his freedom of action. He can do what he wants to when he wants to. He is his own boss and makes his own decisions. He is also free to think as he likes. He has no boss or union leader to tell him for whom he must vote. My parents have always voted just as they thought best.

The farmer and his family always have security. Even in bad years, when droughts, floods, or storms cause his income to be lowered, he still has a home to live in and food to eat. This is true even for the sharecropper. He still has a free home, can raise his own food, and always has fuel (wood) if he is willing to cut and haul it in.

By having his own food, a farmer can maintain a higher nutritional standard than city people with the same income.

Farm homes now can have all the modern conveniences.

The country schools, as a rule, are very good. Ours prepared me adequately for the high school, besides it gave me a very democratic attitude.

Farm people not only have the advantages of country life, but can have the city advantages for the taking.

Country life is not stereotyped and need never be boring. In most farm work, because it is outdoors, the farmer gets many of the same advantages that city people get from planned and costly vacations. For example, I can get just as good a sun tan weeding a garden or herding cows on a horse as "Mrs. Gotrocks" gets lying on an expensive beach. Horseback riding, fishing, swimming, and hunting are just a natural part of farm life.

The friendliness of country people is another thing that makes farm life good.

I thank my lucky stars that I've been reared in the country.

Views on Current Conditions

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES W. TOBEY

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, August 7 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a recent press release expressing my views upon conditions prevailing during the special session of Congress.

There being no objection, the press release was ordered to be printed in the RECORD:

The burden of inflation has become unbearable for countless thousands of people in our country, particularly, those who must live on fixed incomes. The low-wage earners and the office workers are finding it more and more difficult to buy the bare necessities of life. The long-envied American standard of living is becoming lower daily. Measures adopted during earlier sessions of this Congress have not yet succeeded in halting the rising spiral of living costs. These measures were adopted on the theory that the producers, manufacturers and distributors would voluntarily arrive at arrangements to halt that spiral. From time to time certain sellers have shown leadership along those lines but the vast majority have not taken up the ringing challenge to follow their lead. The situation cries out for a remedy. If those who produce, manufacture, and distribute goods cannot find that remedy through the use of voluntary means, the American people acting through their elected representatives must search for a different and more effective cure. That remedy must not be a breadline depression, which would injure every element of our population and destroy the sinews of American strength, at a time when that strength is needed to keep the flame of democracy alive throughout the world.

Those who sincerely argue for complete freedom of enterprise must remember that unless self-restraint is used in the exercise of that freedom, the end result must be anarchy. I have long deplored the philosophy of those sellers who hold that they have a moral right to charge what the market will bear.

The seller must not lose sight of the other party to the transaction, the buyer. Unless the seller exhausts every effort to keep prices at a reasonable level, he invites the danger that the buyer will of necessity or through choice exercise his privilege to refrain from buying. If buyers in large numbers follow this course, goods will soon pile up in the hands of sellers. This will lead to an abrupt decline in prices and result in considerable loss to the seller. An old maxim states, "Let the buyer beware." For the benefit of producers, manufacturers, and distributors, I would counter with, "Let the seller beware," lest in failing to exercise voluntary restraint in order to bring the sales price of their products within the reach of the mass of people, they cause the economy to collapse about them like a fallen house of cards.

However, in complete fairness, it must be recognized that producers, manufacturers, and distributors, working alone, cannot completely solve the problem of control of inflation. They need the earnest cooperation of other elements of our democracy. Those who perform services which add to the cost of goods to be sold must also exercise restraint in requesting further over-all increases in wages or other compensation received in return for those services.

The solution of the problem in a practical manner is complex and must be proceeded with step by step. Control of consumer credit is an example of one of those steps already taken by the Senate and now awaiting action by the House of Representatives. Other steps to be taken in meeting the problem of inflation remain to be further explored.

As a first step, I invite the producers, manufacturers, and distributors to avail themselves of the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency as a sounding board to state practical plans to curb inflation by voluntary methods. Unless they do so before it is too late, more stringent methods of halting inflation must be adopted for the welfare of the people and the good of the Nation.

A similar invitation is also extended to others who can make a real and sincere contribution to this effort. Working shoulder to shoulder in the past, the American people have found a solution to problems which at times seemed insurmountable. In that same spirit and with divine guidance, we can seek an effective and acceptable solution to this serious problem now confronting the Nation.

Why America Needs Thomas E. Dewey as Next President of the United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, August 7 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement prepared by me entitled "Tom Dewey—Why America Needs Him as Next President of the United States."

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TOM DEWEY—WHY AMERICA NEEDS HIM AS NEXT PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

The American people are eagerly awaiting their opportunity to go to the polls in November in order to elect a new President of the United States. In the next few months, millions of words will be printed in newspapers, in magazines, in leaflets, and will be broadcast over the air regarding the merits of the Republican and Democratic candidates for President and Vice President.

It is not my purpose to take up a lot of my readers' time by presenting any lengthy review of what I regard as the outstanding qualifications of Thomas E. Dewey, of New York, and Earl Warren, of California, to be Chief Executive and Vice President respectively. I believe that our people will be more than familiar with all of the basic facts regarding the careers of these two outstanding Republican leaders.

SUMMARY ON TOM DEWEY

Because I have, however, come to know Tom Dewey, because I have seen him twice nominated for the great office of President of these 48 States, because the people of Wisconsin have become closely familiar with him during several primary and election campaigns, I would like to summarize briefly some of our general conclusions on him:

PLAIN-SPEAKING, SQUARE-SHOOTER

1. Tom Dewey is a plain-speaking, forthright-acting man of the people. There is nothing affected or sham about this straight-shooting, sincere public servant. All of his life, Tom Dewey has lived with plain-speaking, plain-acting folks.

As my readers know, he was born in March of 1902 over a general store in Owosso, Michigan, a town of around 8,000. He grew up in a pleasant, normal atmosphere, of a family of modest income, in a small town. He sold magazines and newspapers, he played football in high school, he worked in a drug store and on a farm. He saved up money for his higher education. He sang in the glee club, he learned the basic truths of life in the "college of hard knocks." He had no silver spoon when he was born, and he has never sought to achieve great wealth. Rather, he has sought to serve the general welfare.

REPRESENTS AMERICA'S YOUTH

2. Tom Dewey represents the force, the vitality, the vigor of America's younger generation. At the start of his prosecuting career, he became a United States attorney—the youngest man ever to hold that post in New York. In his racket-busting and smashing of the crime syndicate in the Empire State, he surrounded himself with young, talented men and women—whose minds were clear, whose approach was new, whose energy was dynamic. The results that they achieved in sending criminals to prison and in cleansing the rats from positions of power, speak for themselves.

America's young generation appreciates such a man, appreciates the fact that here is an individual with no mental cobwebs, with an understanding of youth, with a clear perception that times are changing, and that, as Lincoln said, we must "think anew and act anew."

CLEANSING NATIONAL GOVERNMENT

3. I have referred to racket busting. If there was a tremendous field for cleansing in the city and the State of New York, what a still vaster field is awaiting Tom Dewey in all of these 48 States. For 16 long years the dead hand of New Deal bureaucracy has blighted to some extent private enterprise in every community of this land. The Federal Government is unfortunately filled with many parasites, time chiselers, leftists, alien-minded individuals. What an opportunity for a man of Tom Dewey's personality to cleanse the body politic as he once cleansed New York of its hoodlums and gangsters.

RISING AFTER SET-BACKS

4. Tom Dewey knows what it is to take set-backs and defeats, and yet to come back smiling and bigger in outlook and understanding. In 1944, after making a tremendous campaign for the Presidency, he was defeated, just as he had been defeated in his first bid for the governorship of New York. He lost the latter position by a mere 64,000 votes. He ran behind the Democratic candidate for President but received 46 percent of the total vote. Tom Dewey has arisen from these set-backs, possessing more insight, more determination, finer qualities of leadership than ever before.

WIDELY VARIED BACKGROUND

5. Tom Dewey possesses the background that is needed in the highest position of the land. As an operator of a dairy farm in Pawling, N. Y., as a lawyer, as one who has worked with businessmen and with individuals of all types of organizations and occupations, Tom Dewey has grasped insight into the wide variety of pursuits in this great land of 145,000,000 people.

A TEAM PLAYER

6. The brilliant administration which Tom Dewey has given to the Empire State bespeaks the great team that he mobilized there at Albany. Tom Dewey is a team-worker. He doesn't try to secure mediocrities to work for him in order that he can shine above them. He doesn't ever demote a man simply because a man has made a success in an administrative task, and Dewey might be afraid that he would outshine the Governor himself. On the contrary, Dewey recognizes talent, rewards talent, promotes talent, in the way the American people require if their public service is to be conducted on an ever-higher plane, with ever more fruitful results.

FINE PERSONAL QUALITIES

7. Tom Dewey has the personal qualities for which the Nation is looking in its Chief Executive. His model family is an inspiration to the Nation. Never has the slightest whisper of scandal been heard or spoken or printed about his personal life. He is clean, and honest to the core. He is religious and respects the full freedom of each man to worship according to his own conscience.

REPRESENTS AMERICAN VIRTUES

8. Tom Dewey believes in the traditional virtues of the American way of life—thrift, industry, honesty, efficiency, economy. He has not been tainted by alien ideas or philosophies. His rise to prominence is a classic example of the American way of life in which youths, however humble their beginnings, can rise to the loftiest positions by virtue of their true merit.

REPRESENTS CONSTRUCTIVE CHANGE

9. Tom Dewey represents not only a change, but a change for the better. You and I have heard it said many times that there is a need for a change. Someone has asked "why?"

(a) Well, the first reason for a change is because there is a need for a national audit—an audit of every bureau and agency in the Federal Government; an audit of their operations and personnel. The purpose of that audit is to test their effectiveness and efficiency and advisability on the scales of the public welfare. The purpose, too, is to evaluate our whole national policy in every field of government—to determine where we are going, why, how fast, whether we should change trends or should continue in our present course.

TOO LONG POWER IN FEW HANDS CORRUPTS

(b) The second reason for a national change is the one that was given by Franklin Roosevelt himself when he was campaigning as a candidate against the Republicans in 1932. At that time Mr. Roosevelt quoted President Calvin Coolidge, as follows:

"For one reason or another even a wisely led political party, given a long enough tenure of office, finally fails to express any longer the will of the people, and when it does so fail to express the will of the people, it ceases to be an effective instrument of government. It is far better for such a political party—and certainly better for the State—that it should be relegated to the role of the critic and that the opposing political party should assume the reins of government. This condition appears to have arrived in America."

After quoting that statement by President Coolidge, Mr. Roosevelt said:

"That, my friends, is the sober conclusion of a cautious public man, not long ago President of the United States, Calvin Coolidge. With every word of it I heartily agree."

GIVING OPPORTUNITY TO NEW LEADERSHIP

(c) A third reason for a change in the administration is to give opportunity to the new leadership which has developed in the Nation since 1933. Tom Dewey stands at the head of that new leadership. As everyone knows, for the last 16 years there has been little, if any, opportunity for this new leadership to express itself and make constructive contributions in view of the Democratic monopoly in the administration.

COMBATING RED MENACE

(d) Another reason for a change is to combat the Communist menace in our land. It is obvious that because of administration obstructions, we are not getting anywhere in the drive to cleanse our Government of red espionage agents, Communist-sympathizers, fellow travelers. The recent spy investigations by Congress show the imperative need for a thorough ridding of the Government of these red termites, especially in this atomic age, when national security could be imperiled.

CONSTRUCTIVE RECORD OF CONGRESS

(e) Still another reason for a change is that the Republican record of the Eightieth Congress meets with the overwhelming favor of the American people. We recognize all of the obstacles which the administration has placed in the way of the Republican Congress as the GOP sought to fulfill the mandate given to it in November 1946.

The Eightieth Congress, in spite of the road blocks set up by the administration, has enacted a constructive record, the like of which has not been seen in Washington for many decades. In every field—foreign affairs, veterans' welfare, national defense, more harmonious labor relations, tax reduction, budget reduction, and ending of deficit financing—in these and countless other fields Republican legislators have kept their trust and their faith with the American people.

NEED FOR ECONOMY

(f) Still another reason for change is the urgent necessity for Federal economy. We know that the administration has been adding employees at the rate of 500 a day recently and there seems to be no end to its hunger to add indefinitely to the taxpayers' burden by piling up unnecessary bureaus and bureaucrats. Right now, amazingly enough, the American people are required to spend more out of every dollar they earn in order to pay for Government—Federal, State, and local—than they have to spend for their own food.

ASSURANCE OF WORLD PEACE

(g) Another reason for change is that only through a change can we be assured of America's staying at peace. The headlines of the crisis in Berlin show that the long record of administration failures of attempted appeasement of the Russians, has led us to our present predicament. With a change of the administration along Republican lines, we will be better able to establish a frank and realistic foreign policy with the Russians which will protect our interests at the same time as preserving the peace through the United Nations.

COMBATING HIGH PRICES

(h) We all recognize that there are many issues challenging the country today—high prices and foreign affairs, principally. The Republican Congress has made important beginnings toward the solution of those problems, but it still has much work to do. Inflation is still causing a serious challenge to the Nation. If the American people will give the GOP the opportunity to meet that challenge through a Republican Congress and a Republican administration, our Government will be able to carry on in the mission desired by 145,000,000 Americans.

TOM DEWEY'S MISSION

That is Tom Dewey's great hope—that he may be the instrument, the servant of the American people on this mission. That, I believe, is the hope, too, of the American electorate—that next January President Dewey will undertake this great mission.

No one of us human beings is perfect. I suppose something can be said about the disadvantages of any particular human being. Yet, when you weigh Tom Dewey on the scales of leadership and service, you find him completely adequate in every respect and wanting in little if anything in the characteristics that America seeks.

DEWEY AND WARREN—TRUE TRUSTEES

Tom Dewey and Earl Warren are trustees of the people's values. Men of character at the head of a Nation give character to a nation. To men of simplicity, of clarity, of directness, of earnest sincerity—no national problem, no challenge is too difficult.

The Republican ticket for the Presidency and Vice Presidency is not only a balanced ticket in the sense that it represents the east and the west coasts united. It is balanced in every other respect by which you can analyze it. Tom Dewey and Earl Warren, two different personalities, but both vital, both outstanding, both deeply loyal to the American system of free enterprise, both representing the very best in American traditions.

CONCLUSION

The people will go to the polls in November, I am sure, to vote for Tom Dewey and Earl Warren, men of action, men of character, Americans in the very finest sense of that wonderful word.

They fulfill the words of Josiah G. Holland:

"God give us men
The time demands
Strong minds,
Great hearts,
True faith,
And willing hands."

The Record of the Democratic Party

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ELBERT D. THOMAS

OF UTAH

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, August 7 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an address prepared for delivery before the National Education Association at Cleveland, Ohio, on July 8, 1948. Since the occasion called for extemporaneous remarks rather than a prepared address, I ask also to have inserted in the RECORD a transcript of the remarks which I delivered extemporaneously.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE RECORD OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY

An audience such as this, assembled under the auspices of the National Education Association, is ideally equipped, in its wide and expert knowledge of history, to make a dispassionate appraisal of the contributions which the two major political parties have made to the progress of our country.

I am confident if you examine the creative epochs in the history of this Nation, you will find the affirmative weight definitely on the Democratic Party's side.

From the time of Jefferson, through all of the Democratic administrations down to Wilson, Franklin Roosevelt, and Harry S. Truman, the Democratic Party has provided the political leadership fitted to the tempo of the times.

During our own lifetime and well within the memory of most of us here tonight, the Wilson administration contributed a record of solid achievement in progressive social legislation that defies challenge from any quarter. Any one of the many important measures enacted during that Democratic administration merits detailed study by all students of history and government. The scope of the statesmanship and the inestimable benefits contained in these measures for all the citizens of the Nation, have been universally acknowledged.

The creation of the Federal Reserve System alone has been acclaimed one of the greatest acts of constructive statesmanship in the entire history of the country. Every citizen in the United States—every business and financial interest in it today—enjoys the fruits of Wilson's untiring labor for that legislation. Some of the most bitter Republican opponents of it, at its inception, were forced in later years to regard it as a masterpiece of statecraft.

But there were many other legislative achievements that give us the measure of that great Democratic leader. The accomplishments in social legislation of the Wilson administration constitute one of the brightest pages in the history of the country.

Let's briefly review a few of them:

The Clayton Act put a curb on the increasing and dangerous concentration of wealth and the vicious system of interlocking directorates. The Federal Trade Commission prohibited unscrupulous competition and protected the small businessman from the giantism and monopoly of vast corporations.

The tariff was reduced to realistic proportions and a responsible Tariff Commission was created, despite the organized pressures of high-priced lobbyists hired by selfish interests.

An income-tax law insured a fair distribution of the cost of Government.

Equal suffrage was extended for women.

The election of United States Senators was put in the hands of the people they served rather than at the disposition of a select few who could demand political favors.

Labor was recognized as an honorable segment of human society and raised from the indignity of a mere commodity.

By the creation of the Farm Loan Banks, farming and agriculture were given their proper places as collateral branches with commerce and industry in the economic structure of the nation.

The tragedy of the First World War interrupted the further domestic reforms that the Democratic Party had pledged. It prevented additional progressive legislation to improve the economic conditions of all classes and to maximize the full resources and productivity of the country.

In a military sense the First World War ceased with the armistice of November 1918. Humanity would learn to its poignant sorrow that it was to be only that—an armistice—for little more than twenty years.

We are all familiar now with the Democratic Wilson's inspired efforts to set the foundations for a lasting peace. Never in the history of mankind had the opportunities for building a better world been more favorable. Never in the history of this Nation had it had a better nor more qualified political leader than the Democrat Wilson.

But never were the results of sincere and unselfish devotion to the cause of international peace so bitterly disappointing.

A Second World War far greater in every dimension than the first would ensue before civilized humanity recognized the validity of the principles for which the Democratic Party under Wilson's leadership fought so valiantly. In that second holocaust another Democratic President would endure a studied campaign of rabid vilification.

We are witnessing today the efforts of the Republican reactionaries and isolationists to discredit and nullify the farsighted statesmanship and programs in our own self-interest in international affairs, offered by a Democratic Administration.

The 1920 election campaign of the Republican Party was craftily designed to disgust the American people with their hard-won victory in the war; and to delude them into a belief that they had been tricked into European involvements that violated American principles. The voters were deluded by the notion that a change of party and political leadership would insure a speedy return to normalcy. That fetching slogan of the Republicans was interpreted by many as a promise of a return to the "good old days." Few seemed to think much about how really good they were nor to whom.

For 12 long years the Nation was to endure that kind of normalcy.

Apologists for the Republican administrations of the twenties have been extremely resourceful—even picturesque at times—in finding words and terminology to explain the economic skidding of the country under Republican leadership, from a doubtful 1926–27 business plateau—in the argot of these pseudo-economists—to the dismal abyss in 1929.

Our poor English language has been tortured to find fit phrases to explain the debacle. Orthodox and classical economists have been praised or damned to fit the apology and the temper of the apologists, and the geniuses of "cyclical" and similar theories have had a glorious holiday in occult research.

But I don't think it is an oversimplification to say, although the economic system of the country that prevailed in the closing years of the nineteen twenties was in the hands of a superexpert Republican engineer-President, the very practical thought that the system itself needed some drastic engineering, entirely escaped the experts.

It took 3 years of steadily deepening economic crisis, with no bottom in sight, before the country was ready to accept the Democratic leadership and the New Deal. The so-called economic principles revered so highly by the Republican administrations were exposed as being not only uneconomic but unprincipled as well.

An angry electorate demanded something more than empty phrases and scientific explanations as an answer to a stagnant economy, with smokeless chimneys denoting idle factories, hoards of nearly starving unemployed, a ruined farm population and the whole melancholy catalog of accumulated ills plaguing the people.

Retrospection clearly shows that the economic sickness that had started in 1920 and was climaxed in 1929, was actually the dying paroxysm of an era. The decade that marked its end had packed into it the accumulated evils of a concept of government that would have stifled democracy and reduced the common man to the level of a common clod, had it been allowed to continue unchecked.

Franklin Roosevelt represented a new economic order that common sense and every instinct of self-preservation demanded.

For 12 years the Republican administrations had callously refused to concern themselves with the desperate economic condition of millions of American citizens.

The economically privileged class that dominated and still dominates the Republican Party, stubbornly clung to a theory of economics that had been proved fallacious and had been completely discredited. They sought to escape responsibility for the plight of the people in a blind belief that mass unemployment and the distress resulting from it were mere phenomena of a cycle and would be automatically adjusted in good time without government interference.

The Democratic administration refused to accept such a theory. It held that the starvation of millions of unemployed American citizens was definitely the concern of government. It held that the care of the sick and old, the providing of opportunities for education, for opportunities of work for the able, and above all, the permanent eradication of the specter of insecurity in the lives and homes of every American, were the clear duties of any democratic government.

It was the Democratic Party's brand of economics that Franklin Roosevelt interpreted and vigorously applied to lift this Nation from the worst depression it had ever known. It was the brand that inspired a program of social legislation that restored democratic government to its proper place as the servant of all the people instead of an agent of a few. It was the brand that enabled the United States to mobilize the greatest productive and fighting machine ever envisioned. It was the kind that would rekindle the hope of democracy throughout the world. It was a brand of economics and government that would make a revision of the textbooks necessary.

But it was not really new. Actually it was a badly needed, modernized, streamlined version of the Jeffersonian brand of economics. It was the Democratic Party's realistic interpretation of the mandate in the Preamble of the Constitution of the United States, which summarized the ideals of the founding fathers: "A more perfect union, justice, domestic tranquility, the common defense, the general welfare, and the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity."

Republican leadership, in its rare moments of larger thought, interprets that general-welfare mandate in the Constitution as a static concept; a high and most worthy impulse, to be sure, but only to be considered in the abstract, never to be allowed to interfere with the power, nor disturb the position of the economically privileged few.

Democratic leadership accepts and avows the mandate interpretation of Jefferson, Madison, Jackson, Wilson, Franklin Roosevelt, and Harry S. Truman. All of these Democratic leaders, by their lives and works, have identified it as a dynamic force, sweeping before it any and all repressive privileges, and initiating and perfecting legislation designed to safeguard and extend the interests of all the people.

There is a significant parallel in the "back to normalcy" Republican slogan of the 1920's and the "save what's left" shibboleth being tossed around by the Republicans in this Presidential campaign year 1948. The parallel is the more marked, because their program is the same today as it was in 1920. It lacks even the saving grace of a new look. But one must admit that it is consistent with their policy of reaction.

The record of the Republican Party leaders throughout the Roosevelt and Truman administrations clearly shows that they have consistently spoken and acted in the tradition of the late nineteenth and early twentieth century Republicanism.

They have endeavored by every known strategy in the political book, and some novel inventions of their own devising, to erect effective barriers against the popular social legislation for all the people which the Democratic administrations led and which the Democratic Party will always lead.

I have discussed the Democratic Party's interpretation of the mandate in the Preamble of the Constitution, particularly that portion of it containing the words "general welfare."

The Republicans claim that their control of the Eightieth Congress constituted a mandate from the people of the United States. They do so by erroneously reading into the election returns of 1946 an expression of the will of the majority of American citizens. I think, in the interests of clarity, we should get our definitions clear. The dictionary tells us that a mandate is:

"An authoritative requirement; a command; order; charge."

In a political sense I can't believe that the elections of 1946 fit that definition. I can't believe that an election in which only 39 percent of the eligible voters went to the polls reflects the precise and recorded will of the majority of the people of this Nation. To my mind it was definitely a minority election or an election by default.

In a larger sense it may well prove to be a salutary lesson for the people of this country. It may show the results of political apathy and indifference. Many had become so used to progressive Democratic government that they forgot they had to go to the polls to keep it.

We have had 2 years' experience with a Republican-controlled Congress. The record is a completely negative one. It can be summarized as being more anxious and occupied in opposing, condemning, and obstructing than in creating or even enlightening.

It is a dismal record of stultification, reaction, and retrogression.

I suggest that it be compared with the creative, positive, and dynamic leadership of the Democratic Party.

The hoary arguments of the Republicans against President Truman's requested legislation are, on close examination, only modernized paraphrases of their same arguments of an earlier century against the building of roads and canals, general education, public health, and the many other measures in the interests of all the people.

The pervading negativism of the Republican-controlled Eightieth Congress is to me an unmistakable portent of the callous indifference of Republican leadership to the challenging responsibilities of the United States in world affairs.

In examining the case-history of the European Recovery program, it is difficult to be temperate in condemning the Republican House Appropriations Committee and the little minds comprising the leadership of that important body. By their cavalier action in the committee and in the House on this vital legislation, they undertook to undo the laborious efforts of over a year's study and work. They exposed an appalling evidence of irresponsibility and callous disregard of the expressed will of the people and the Congress of the United States.

The country enthusiastically endorsed President Truman's characterization of the European recovery program as "the greatest venture in constructive statesmanship ever undertaken * * *." During the year following Secretary of State Marshall's first launching of the plan, it had been debated, weighed, balanced, and perfected by 17 national governments, 2 international conferences, several American research commissions, and by the American Congress.

The program as it was finally perfected represented the studies of the Krug committee, the Harriman committee, the President's Council of Economic Advisors, and the House Select Committee. Members of both Houses added their testimony as a result of roaming all over Europe to get first-hand data, independent of the executive studies. The reports of these bodies total thousands of pages of text, charts, and graphs. They were supplemented by the opinion of well-informed and responsible private opinion. The financial burden was not a random guess. It represented the best possible estimate of the real measure of the problem which nearly a full year of intensive study by all branches of government and leaders of public opinion could produce.

Finally we saw the measure passed by a House vote of 318 to 75 with an authorized expenditure of $5,300,000,000 for a 12-month period.

It was hailed as the chief hope of democratic forces everywhere in the world, to hold their own against the ruthless onslaught of eastern totalitarianism.

Regardless of the effect of the saner minds in the Senate in repudiating the puerile jealousy and shallow cynicism of the Republican chairman of the House Appropriations Committee in his attempted action to negate ERP, irreparable damage has already been done to the integrity and honor of the Nation.

I have discussed this matter of ERP at this length because to me, it typifies the distemper of the Republican leadership and the lengths to which it will dare to go in its flagrant disdain of the will of the people.

It shows the extent of the maneuvers of the surviving isolationist faction in the Republican Party against the bipartisan foreign policy hammered out during the war and afterward. It is a fearful echo of that other Republican isolationist group that succeeded in scuttling the League of Nations after World War I.

The aroused sentiment of the American people is more effective this time, because it is not merely the word of an American President that is repudiated, but the pledges made by Congress itself. On these pledges the democratic nations of the world have based economic and foreign policies that have exposed them to Russian vengeance. That involves not only American policy, but American prestige, good faith, honor, and leadership.

Now let's briefly survey the record of Harry S. Truman, the standard bearer of the Democratic Party. The details of his early life, his Missouri background, his service as a soldier in World War I, his Missouri judgeship, his record in the Senate and his leadership of the Truman committee have all been pretty well publicized and are known to all of you. It is unnecessary for me to dwell at length upon them here. But I submit that it is important to recognize the deep influence of the Missouri heritage and environment upon President Truman, because it affords insight to his character. The Missouri upbringing has been important to Harry Truman personally and it is no less important now to the Nation. We have now and shall retain in the White House a man who has transplanted from that background the high ideals of self-sacrifice, simplicity, humility, courage, and deep spiritual consciousness, which are at once the characteristics and product of such surroundings.

The environment and circumstances of Harry Truman's boyhood and early manhood developed his character—they did not create it. His pioneer forebears bred it in his blood. That may account for his courage. That may account for his devotion and his dedication to the principles of democracy, of always putting duty above politics, humanity before material considerations, and his fervor for lasting peace abroad and domestic security at home.

Harry Truman's instinctive response to the summons to the White House on that sad evening of April 12, 1945, reveals his whole character. It is wide in its implications. It was selfless. It demonstrates the basic principle of his entire life. When Mrs. Roosevelt told him that President Roosevelt had died, Harry Truman asked humbly:

"What can I do to help you?"

The man from Missouri had come a long way to prepare himself for the responsibilities of leadership, but in the journey he acquired the knowledge, the experience, the courage, the moral and spiritual fortitude to lead the Nation on the path toward world peace and prosperity.

The peace which the world hailed so eagerly in 1945 was soon replaced by the cold war. On the domestic front, the pent-up emotions and selfish designs that had been successfully held in check during the war years were soon to challenge the economic stability of the Nation just at a time when the aggregate of its strength and energy was needed to be directed to the responsibilities of world leadership.

President Truman presented his appraisal of the situation to the people and to the Congress. It could be summarized as a call for unselfish cooperation of all segments of Americans and an appeal for calm judgment. But a determined Republican bloc, encouraged by selfish groups in business and industry set out to sabotage what remained of wartime price control at any cost.

President Truman's veto of the first punitive labor legislation, the Case bill, was sustained after he had restored an uneasy peace to the labor front.

Promptly the President renewed his request to Congress for workable labor legislation, but the Republican controlled Congress was too busy undoing the OPA. Commodity producers, spurred by record earnings, were demanding a completely free-wheeling economy that would double their profits.

The President put the case before the people:

"The real blame * * * lies at the door of the reckless group of selfish men who, in the hope of gaining political advantage, have encouraged sellers to gamble on the destruction of price controls. This group, today, as in the past, is thinking in terms of millions of dollars instead of millions of people. This same group has opposed every effort of this administration to raise the standard of living and increase the opportunity for the common man."

But despite the selfishness and greed and the blatant political heckling and worse, the wisdom and patience of President Truman's leadership paid substantial dividends in 1946. The Nation enjoyed virtually full employment and its production of goods and services was 50 percent greater than in any year before the war. It had been a year of great trial and hard-won success, but with serious problems to be met almost every hour.

The situation on the foreign front steadily worsened. Russia cast off the disguise of friendly cooperation and emerged on her avowed determination of ruthless expansion.

The sad history of the march of Russian terror in Yugoslavia, Poland, Rumania, and finally Czechoslovakia is recent enough in memory. Turkey and Greece would have been added to that roster had not President Truman taken decisive action to protect both countries by what came to be known as the Truman doctrine.

Throughout all of these trying times, President Truman never wavered in his faith in the United Nations, but he never shrank from the responsibility of the United States as the world spokesman for freedom and the necessary quick action to support our position.

Domestically, the chief problem in 1947 was inflation and the stubborn refusal of the Republican Congress to respond to President Truman's urgings for adequate legislation to curb it. But the GOP Congress was more concerned in the oldest political maneuver known—tax reduction. They disregarded the simple arithmetic of the largest public debt and the largest peacetime rearmament program in history; and, of course, they spurned a Democratic President's warnings.

The Republican-dominated Congress enacted the punitive Taft-Hartley bill, which President Truman promptly vetoed. But it was rammed through over his protest.

Let's see if we can set up a sort of trial balance here.

President Truman recommended a program for labor-management harmony.

The Republican Congress gave him the Taft-Hartley law.

President Truman asked for laws to curb monopolies and aid small business.

The Republican Congress did nothing about that but they did try to extend the monopolies of the utility combines and the railroads.

President Truman asked for continued broad rent controls until the housing shortage eased.

Instead the Republican Congress enacted a "gun-point" 15-percent so-called voluntary increase for the landlords.

President Truman sought to handle the housing shortage by a long-range program under a single responsible head.

A Republican Congress rejected it.

President Truman asked for reduction of public debt and a balanced budget.

The Republicans voted a tax reduction they knew would not stand.

President Truman requested a law to insure adequate medical care for the poor as well as the rich; he asked for continued stabilization of farm prices; he asked for an increase in minimum wages from 40 to 65 cents an hour; he asked for a widening of the social-security base to extend the benefits to millions more Americans entitled to them.

The Republican Congress did nothing.

The Republican record of negativism, obstruction, and retrogression continues.

How that party can possibly rationalize its performance is beyond my comprehension.

In conclusion, it is my firm conviction that an unbiased appraisal of our country's history must convince anyone that the Democratic Party has contributed far more constructive, progressive, liberal social legislation than its opponents. It is also my conviction that the long list of achievements of the Democratic Party for the welfare and betterment of all the people, in the last three decades, important and impressive as it is, will be considered less significant than the high moment of our history in 1932, when Americans were shown that politics could be creative and dynamic—that American democratic Government was not an abstract thing, wrapped in dogma and trammeled in law—but rather that it was composed of people—human beings worried by fear and harassed by frustration, yet possessing the prescription for their own cure in their own hands, if only their political leaders had the courage and foresight to use and apply it.

The phenomenal release of the latent energies of the American people under the leadership of the Democratic Party in the period 1932 through 1948 is an irrefutable challenge to the Splengerian prophets of doom. It is an equal challenge to all reactionaries, defeatists, and obstructionists who would impede the forward progress of America.

The honest appraisal of those three decades will produce compelling proof that the Democratic Party had the talent, the ability, the courage, and wisdom and foresight in its leadership to meet the exacting demands of the times.

The Democratic Party possesses those same attributes in abundance today, and offers to the American people, in the person of Harry S. Truman, that same quality of leadership to carry us forward toward peace and prosperity.

The Honorable ELBERT D. THOMAS (United States Senator from Utah). I have been waiting for this night for something like 50 years, because 50 years ago I read an awfully good joke about political parties, and I have not been able to get it off my chest until tonight, and probably when I get the thing started it will come out the wrong way. At any rate, there was a fine old "windbagger" who was practicing his politics for all he was worth, and he met a young fellow and he said to the young fellow, "Well, my boy, what are you, a Democrat or a Republican?"

He said, "I am a Democrat," and the man then said, "Well, now, how can you be a Democrat, knowing the history of your country as you do, how can you be a Democrat?"

The poor kid said, "Well, because I was born that way, I guess," and then the old political practitioner thought he had a glorious opportunity. He said, "What if you had been born a horse thief?"

The young man said, "Oh, then I would have been a Republican." [Applause.]

I'm awfully glad it came out the right way.

Now, we Democrats have such a tremendous handicap over Senator MORSE and the Republicans that I am going to say something to you which is more important tonight than trying to show you how much better my party is than the opposing party. In the first place, I want to say something about your president, Glenn Snow. He was, I am pretty sure, my first master graduate of political science after I got through with the First World War and settled down to teaching. He has been a young man of whom anyone can be proud, and I know how proud you are of him. [Applause.]

He comes from a little town in Utah, about as far away from every place on earth as you can get, down where it's eternal summer excepting when it turns cold, because it is close to California, and I think for him to have been elected president of the National Education Association is one of the greatest compliments to democratic education in the history of our country, and I rejoice with you over the wonderful administration he has had. He carried the Federal aid to education bill through the Senate, only, of course, to suffer the disappointment that has been all of ours for so many years in the House.

Another thing I want to say to you tonight, and this gives us another splendid opportunity to show just exactly what American political parties are and what they mean and how it happens that we in our country have gained through those political parties a type of stability that the rest of the world has not been able to accomplish.

In the first place, the American political parties are purely sentimental affairs. They are not economic, they are not political and there is no such thing as a complete political party in America as far as the two great parties are concerned. There are 49 Democratic parties and about 38 Republican parties. [Laughter.] Every 4 years they put forth a national candidate for President and he is the only person for whom all the people, if they were entitled to, could vote, and he is the only person that we do vote for—the Vice President does not even count even in that because you cannot vote for him separately, and then we don't vote directly, as you know.

Now, with that preliminary statement, I want to point out to you that you have a rabid Democrat on your program tonight and if Republicans can become rabid, you have a rabid Republican—we will tear one another's hearts out, scratch one another morning, noon, and night, but as far as WAYNE MORSE and ELBERT THOMAS are concerned, you will have to search far and long to find them ever voting against each other. [Applause.] He is the kind of a Republican all Democrats admire and ELBERT THOMAS is the kind of Democrat all Republicans fear and tremble at.

Now that having been said, it becomes of course necessary for me to take another two minutes and explain the differences between our two great parties. First of all, without a single exception, not even making an exception of your speaker, the Democratic party is made up of high-minded, patriotic, self-sacrificing, loyal individuals who have carried this great country of ours to the wonderful place it stands today in the sisterhood of nations. The Republican party, as every school boy knows, even if their teachers do not, is boss-ridden, made up of corruptionists led by those who are too dumb to follow, a combination of "tweedle-dum-ers" and "tweedle-dee-ers', "stratobugs" and, with the exception of WAYNE MORSE of Oregon, they are all of one type. [Applause.] I didn't make that up myself—I got it from reading what the rival candidates say of one another in a Republican party. Each one of those words should be put in quotation marks, each sentence is quoted from someone who leads public opinion in the United States. It almost breaks my heart to have to repeat such truths but out of fairness to this noble assembly, it seems necessary to do it.

George Washington, about three years after we had won the Revolutionary War, made the statement that seems to fit the present time. He said, "Our morning dawned with all the brightness of all time and with full promise of glorious success, and now we find ourselves in the fullness of day covered with clouds and with troubles."

Three years ago, when the war ended, everyone in the United States said something closely akin to the words of Washington about our country. We had won a glorious victory as a result of united action. We have the peace to win and whether we are able to win the peace depends upon keeping our country united in the aim for peace. Now war is a rather simple proposition—it's simple in all of its techniques—all you have to do is get the enemy and kill him and you use every method that you can think of to accompish that purpose, but peace is complex—the management of peoples and the management of states in time of peace when individual feelings run high and when those who live by their wits seem to find various ways of accomplishing their purposes, so that we find ourselves today realizing that a shadow hangs over our heads while the dawn was so bright.

This is the second world war we have won and we find what took place in 1920, in spite of it, in spite of the different laws, and in spite of the different habits of the people of our country we find that the stage today is set for another situation such as we had in 1920, the situation that brought more ill to our country, more heartaches to our country than most wars have done.

In 1920 everyone said, "Let's go back to normalcy, we are done with great minds, we are sorry about reform." The exploiter turned in to make the most of things and he made the most of things to such an extent that in some States there was not a single farm left by 1932–33. Now, sad to relate, the country is open to exploitation again. People saved money, they bought bonds during the war—never in the whole history of mankind have so many or so much money been gathered together that can be exploited by those who want to do it; and while in the twenties the sucker lists were probably only 100 names long, the sucker list for the next few years will carry a list of names 1,000 long. I thought that we were going to avoid that sort of thing.

As a reader of American history and American politics, the saddest thing that came to my heart was the speech made by the Republican candidate for President of the United States, a speech given out thoughtlessly because it was unworthy of him—he is too great to have uttered it, but he did utter it, and he said, "Never in the history of our country will there be such a turn-over of persons as will take place next January in Washington."

Turn-over for what—a turn-over for whom?

Can you get rid of the civil servants—who are going to be invited in? Now, that plea was made to workers, "now is the chance for you to wade in and take what you want and I will help you—come ahead."

I personally would not feel so bad about that if the same thing had not occurred in 1920 and if I had not lived through all of those years to realize that my own friends said, "Well, on March 4, 1921, we can go back to the good old days," and we went back and you know the results.

That plea was not American, it was politically immoral and if it's accomplished it will be so destructive of all that we call fine and secure in our country and 10 years from now you will realize the thoughtless ambition for power, energetic control for office, may bring about all of the ill effects that they have always brought about when there have been governmental turn-overs.

Now, of course, we have different laws today than we had in 1920; there has been a forward-looking administration that has supplemented the reforms of Woodrow Wilson's administration, when the Federal Reserve bank was set up which organization made it possible for us to fight the First World War without resorting to borrowing from abroad as we had always done in previous times, and then with the coming of the Roosevelt administration, due to the fact that people had lost faith in their banks and due to the necessity of restoring that faith if we were going to go forward and as a nation that believed in economic stability we had to bring about a technique which made that change against the will of most banks, mind you, just as the Federal Reserve was adopted against the will of most bankers—the Deposit Insurance Corporation was set up against the will of most bankers in 1933, but since that time men, women, and children are not suspicious of their bankers and we can have that change. War Savings bonds are different because they are built up on a theory which grew up as a result of the experiences of the Liberty bonds in the First World War, but still anyone who holds one of those bonds is free to turn the bond into money and invest it in the best gilt-edged investment that a salesman can present, but there again there is one other thing that has happened. We had enacted "blue sky" laws in most of our States, but in 1933 we did not have a National "blue sky" law. Now we have, the Federal Security Exchange Commission, which is supposed to tell the people about organizations that sell their stock to the people and we are saved from that.

These things have all been done by the Democratic administration, things which probably are necessary to have been done because of the depression and because of the war, but the desire to turn back, and to change and to leave alone, to exploit, is one that springs eternal in the hearts of those people in our country who, when they see a loaf of bread and are asked, "What is this?"—if all Democrats were idealists and all Republicans were idealists, the Democrats would reply, "This is something to eat," and the Republicans would reply, "That is something to sell"; who, when a house is put before them and the experience in the Eightieth Congress proves this to be true, "Here is a house," and a Democrat is asked, "What is this for?" and he answers, "Why, it is a place to live"; the Republican is asked, "What is this for?" and he says, "It is a place to sell."

You say, "That is stretching the point a little too much." You say that one party lacks the ability to exploit better than another party, and that is not true. It is probably not true, but look at the Eightieth Congress and see how it works.

The Senate of the United States passed a bill that had my name on it at one time, just like the Federal aid to education bill had my name on it for so many years, and Senator MORSE's name, but the bill about housing had another great Senator's name on it—TAFT, of Ohio—who saw the light, both as to Federal aid to education and who became converted to the housing proposition, and TAFT reformed because he said, "Every boy and girl in the United States needs an equal opportunity, is entitled to an equal opportunity to an education," and he also said that without public aid and without public endeavor we can never go forward and accomplish what should be accomplished in regard to slum clearance, and the taking of the great fringes which exist in all of our cities and turning that fringe real estate into productive, happy real estate. That takes the public—but the real-estate lobby that admits that a house is something to sell rather than something to live in would not let that pass, and now that brings me in a personal way to this: What is the thing that is facing this country and which makes it so completely right for me to quote those two lines of George Washington, because there are two Martins in the Congress of the United States—one of them a Senator from Pennsylvania; the other, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, a Congressman from Massachusetts. These two Martins, like twin brothers, see eye to eye.

MARTIN of Pennsylvania delivered the strongest, most misinformed speech about Federal aid to education of anyone during the Senate debate and MARTIN of Massachusetts, after the Senate had passed the bill, put the bill into cold storage and saw that it stayed there. Who are these two men? Who was the first man to break from his own delegation and rush to the support of Mr. Dewey? MARTIN of Pennsylvania. Who is the second man, although ambitious himself and hoping beyond hope that the lightning would strike, the Republicans would be tied up in a deadlock, and that he would have a chance—MARTIN of Massachusetts, they made for harmony in the nomination of Governor Dewey.

Now, I suppose when the Democratic convention meets we will have similar situations, but here we have one, and that makes the issue for 1948 so pat and so important that everyone who wants to see the reforms continue must, of course, know how to vote.

We want to bring home to you what the Democratic Party has meant to this country, and the Republicans have meant a lot, too, but since the very beginning—and it's an awfully great compliment to Thomas Jefferson to know that the two great parties take their names from his Republican-Democratic Party, and it was Jefferson who was quoted more than anyone else when Fremont ran for the Presidency in 1856 and when Lincoln came into the leadership and made the Republican Party a living vital thing in our country, but from the very beginning built a philosophy upon the theory of human rights and their development, worked out by such men as Jefferson, Franklin, Madison, and the rest of them, put it into the Declaration of Independence and into the Constitution and developed it throughout the years. Then we come down to the great days of Woodrow Wilson and then the wonderful days of Franklin D. Roosevelt [applause]—each time a progressive step forward so that men might be more secure in their lives and more secure in their property. The essence of democracy works in the United States—we are happy that it does work, we are proud of what has been accomplished and we feel hopeful that more will be accomplished.

America needs as she has never needed before, inspired leadership, that no matter what happens on the 2d of November next I trust that that which does happen happens because of the inspiration of the people. [Applause.]

President SNOW. Thank you, Senator THOMAS.

President SNOW. Now, do you understand why I brought these two men to address you? [Applause.]

It is my privilege to announce that during these last few minutes we are going to have short rebuttals on the part of both of these Senators and we are going to ask that Senator THOMAS address you first and give you whatever he cares to in a short rebuttal. Senator THOMAS.

Senator THOMAS. I hate to ruin, in Senator MORSE's presence, Untermeyer's poem, but his whole speech so satisfied me that so far as democratic principles are concerned I think we ought to let it rest right there. [Applause.]

Now, much time has been given over to the platform. I have written two party platforms in my life; one of them was completely rejected because it didn't make all the terms which this Republican platform has made; the other was partially accepted, but immediately forgotten when once it was presented to the convention. Sad to relate, sweet as the words of that platform are, I can see the voting record not only of the permanent Chairman of the Republican Convention, which allowed the platform to become the will of the convention, but also the voting record of the chairman of the platform committee, and we have once more in the history of our country proved that if politicians read Shakespeare oftener, they would be more careful about their platform. You remember the Midsummer-Night's Dream (laughter) when they were passing out the parts to the play, Pyramus and Thisbe, that one little player spoke up and said, "Have you the lion's part ready? If it be, give it to me, because I am slow studying," and then Bottom spoke up, he says, "Give me the lion's part—I will roar you and I will roar you and I will roar you," and then someone said, "Oh, no; you must not roar that way, because you will frighten the duke and his ladies and that would ruin the whole play."

Then Nick Bottom said, "I will roar you as sweetly, as sweetly as a suckling dove." [Applause.]

Platforms are forgotten almost as quickly as the various candidates for the Vice Presidency.

I liked especially the part on international relations and our foreign affairs that Senator MORSE brought out for us, because I should not be here tonight, I had to get myself excused from one of the greatest international assemblies that now meets, the assembly which considers social justice, an assembly which has tried and has succeeded in raising the standard of living for people, not only in our own country but the world over. I came here directly from there.

I mentioned what I mentioned in the beginning of our talk about our political parties not being professional because the representatives from most of the 58 nations at the meeting in San Francisco were men who could not understand political parties in America, because even in those countries which are strictly democratic, the parties are professional. I hope and I trust that our parties never become professional, that they will never rest upon a purely economic basis and that the leaders of those parties are perpetuated as they are in England regardless of their defeats when they go in front of the people. We have, some way or another, worked out in America a type of democracy which no one, who has not studied American growth and development, or has not been a student of government, would assume is possible, but it is here and it is with us and it is great to talk to the leaders of the world about this thing we call American democracy, and here again I cannot help but say what Senator MORSE had already said—"you are the outstanding pillars upon which that greatest experiment in the development of the world rests—American democracy." Your responsibilites are great beyond words and that you are living up to those responsibilities is something which should not only be of concern to everybody in America but which should make us all so exceedingly happy and grateful.

I wish a program of social justice, such as Senator MORSE has described for us, might be fulfilled in our country. He brought to you tonight one of the best illustrations that I can give to show you how men have to have faith in these democratic processes in order to put them over. The resolution about the World Court with Senator MORSE's name on it fell to me as chairman of the Subcommittee of the Foreign Relations Committee to report it out and I managed that bill on the floor of the Senate when we got it passed, but Senator MORSE remembers that the great stalwarts, some who have been praised here tonight because of their wonderful, world-wide appreciation of what America means to the whole world, went back on us that afternoon. They forced into it two meaningless amendments but, worst of all was that they tried to get me to postpone it. I said, "We have been discussing the World Court issue for over a generation and now we are going to pass that amendment if I have to accept 50 of your type of amendments in order to do it, because you cannot vote against it when once the time comes for voting after the way you have been voting."

What this country needs are men who can stand alone and remain unsullied in a sullied world, and thank goodness you have such a man in Senator MORSE. [Applause.]

It is the extremest of extreme of successful debaters, when they can put forth a program that the opponent will not strike down. The question therefore is, how are we going to unite these persons that are in favor of advancing social justice in our country and making this democratic Government function and work for the benefit of all of the people? I don't know how it can unite them. The politics of our country are such that they seem to be ununitable, but I know we can plug away at it, keep at it, be honest with it, and strive to bring about these situations.

I am happy for the inspiration I received from such men as Newton Baker. I was very close to Baker. I belonged to the crowd that Wendel Willkie belonged to in following his leadership, and Willkie was nice enough to say that I taught him the way to understand the theories behind One World—the greatest compliment ever paid me. Willkie was a great man [applause], and so we can go on—the greatness is in the world just as the path of peace is in the world; the way to peace is surely here, greatness is surely with us. American democracy is the guide and our ideal in regard to world peace is always one of the ways we can follow. Probably the greatness of the office will magnify the man that is given it. Many a man is called to the Presidency over whom the people at first shake their heads, only to mourn and be exceedingly sad when they have passed away, and that I hope will be the case with us always, but with the inspiration given us tonight by Senator MORSE, I am happy to know that there is someone in the Republican Party who is thinking straight [applause] and just as it is on the other side, I could get into so many fields because I was chairman of the Military Affairs Committee and I have my own unification bill which was pretty badly slaughtered by the committee that Senator MORSE is on. They didn't give us unification. They gave us three separate branches instead of two in our defense. Senator MORSE knows it, and he has called attention to it, but we took a step forward anyway and we made some progress. I happen to be, probably more than anyone else, one connected with the committee that dropped out bipartisan consideration of foreign affairs. I made the stand that if we didn't start working for peace during war we would never be able to hold our allies together. We made the point. We got so far that we got a committee of eight of the Foreign Relations Committee appointed to consider our proposals for peace. We met Saturday mornings at the State Department, some of us, going over these various things. I myself said, "The time has come for action," and I forced a vote in our committee of eight. The President of the United States, the Secretary of State, both sent word that it was inadvisable to do anything, but I said, "I want the vote anyway for historical purposes if for nothing else," and we took the vote. Seven of the eight were against doing anything, but one was in favor of doing something, and I know who that one was, but by the time the Connally resolution came out we took the vote again and seven were in favor of doing something and only one was against—Bob La Follette, another great progressive and liberal in everything but international affairs, and now he has seen the light, so that is fine. Bob was the only one that stood out against us then, and we were able to get the Connally resolution over, which marked the beginning of our action in wartime, and by the time the peace came we had a framework of international organization already set up.

Now, I have worked under the leadership of both parties in foreign relations. There was nothing partisan in anything we did in the Military Affairs Committee during the war; there was nothing partisan in anything we did in the Foreign Relations, and I am happy to see that that kind of progress is taking place.

I rejoice over this meeting; I rejoice over the things that have been said; it is hopeful beyond words that members of both political parties at last see the need of putting the welfare of human beings ahead of some of the things which some people will call property rights. [Applause.] With that step taken, you know and I know that our country is destined to be not only a beacon in the world for political freedom but also a beacon to the full world for economic stability, that here we are going to be able to say soon that freemen, free to come, free to go, free to aspire, free to think, free to have, and free to hold constitute the freemen in political society. [Applause.]

American Economics and World Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. ARTHUR CAPPER

OF KANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, August 7 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address on the subject American Economics and World Peace, by Hon. Alf M. Landon, of Kansas, before the World Affairs Institute, Estes Park, Colo., August 6, 1948, which appears in the Appendix.

AMERICAN ECONOMICS AND WORLD PEACE

If the President really wants to bring the cost of living under control he could do it without the passage of a single line of new legislation.

If his purpose is really to stop inflation, the program to be adopted immediately would be:

1. Have the Federal Reserve Board clamp the brakes on bank credit expansion. The Federal Reserve Board—for which the President asks greater authority—has plenty of power, under existing law, to bring credit expansion to a halt. The trouble is that it cannot do that without tightening interest rates, and it doesn't have the courage to take that step.

2. Cut Government expenditures to the bone and use the proceeds to pay off bank-held public debt.

3. Order cessation of all Government buying that is not absolutely necessary and all Government construction that can be postponed.

4. Use the power of his office to make clear to the public that inflation has gone just as far as it is going to be permitted to go.

State in the most positive terms that henceforth he is going to use his influence every way possible to reduce Government support of wages and Government support of food prices.

With that kind of deflationary program no need to worry about high business profits.

All of which is pretty meaningless because the country basically does not want a painful program of that kind. Every group wants deflation for the other fellows but not for itself.

After 16 years of superficial New Deal propaganda, people still believe they can eat their cake and have it, too. Therefore, we are inviting economic and political disaster.

America today is the center of the world's gravity and the fortress of freedom. We must prepare ourselves for the long pull of life in an Army camp. I return to an old theme when I say that, as the strongest Nation in the world, we can hardly hope to lead the way to peace unless we can be sound economically. A stable economy is essential to a sound government. But how can we avoid a bust—or as Marriner Eccles put it a "deflation"—in the United States of America when anyone attempting to use reason in the free spending of public funds internationally, is hysterically denounced as an isolationist and anyone attempting to use reason in the free spending of public funds at home is denounced as a reactionary.

Government is like every business—every farm—every individual. There are many daily questions of expenditures of money and labor. They cannot all be decided at once. Decisions must be reached regarding priority. This is always a difficult choice in family and business life.

That is the question that must be constantly decided by the President and the Congress. There are so many things to be done that if we attempt to do too many of them at once we will break the back of the American taxpayer and ruin our country with a funny money economy. Yet that is the policy we are following.

As powerful, as wealthy, and as productive as the United States of America is, we simply cannot finance European economic recovery—the rebuilding of Europe's military establishments—the rebuilding of our own military security—the rebuilding of the Philippines—and at the same time embark on an expanding field of Government spending at home with additional cost of billions of dollars—without ruining ourselves by inflation. There is a limit to what even Americans can do and we have reached that limit.

I fully realize that there are factors to a strong and sound nation other than a stable economy—a comprehensive educational program—decent racial relations—national health programs—government policies—that will keep economic opportunities circulating throughout the entire blood stream. When nations have limited opportunities to a few chosen groups within a people—those nations have crumbled.

In the final analysis, all social legislation depends on a sound and stable national economy. We cannot do all that is both desirable and essential at once, without weakening the whole structure. Our decisions today are based on the unhappy prospect of being compelled to live, for a time at least, in an armed camp.

The British economy is, temporarily at least, no longer a major factor in the world. France never recovered from the first World War, not to speak of the devastation done by the second.

If America is able to maintain a sound economy for another decade, there is a chance that our influence, our surplus goods and the markets we create for the goods of others, will permit something like a world recovery and a restoration of some sort of balance.

If we fail to do so there will be a general collapse, with the Communists endeavoring to take over and an inevitable war resulting.

I do not believe the country is interested in whether President Truman is trying to put the Republican party on the spot—by calling a special session—or in us Republicans attempting to put the President on a spot.

Americans are concerned lest partisan maneuvering interfere with the welfare of our country. In this critical hour I believe it is worth making the attempt to shift from political maneuvering to a settlement of major points of disagreement.

The President, if he had used a different occasion than his party convention for announcing the special session, if he had not recommended both inflationary and deflationary legislation in the same message—would be in a sounder position to ask for that shift on the part of the Republican Congress.

The attitude and thinking of the next President of the United States is more important on inflation than any party platform declaration. For that matter, that is true of most of the platform statements.

However, political party platforms are not as meaningless as frequently supposed. In the first place, it must be borne in mind that it is extremely difficult, in a country of our size with our variety of interests, to write a platform representing fairly all of the issues involved.

Therefore, party policy, as expressed by the conventions, are generally in such terms that the President can interpret them as he sees fit in the light of developing events. In the final analysis, such legislation as the Congress enacts depends on the courage—the vigor—and the intelligence with which it is administered by the President.

This is a critical hour. The foreign situation is very much in a state of flux, particularly as regards European affairs. We have not had a consistent and cohesive foreign policy—bipartisan or otherwise. It is evident that the western powers, and particularly France, are leery about forcing any show-down over the Berlin situation.

The French, in effect, are saying that the Allied position is untenable in Berlin and they don't see any reason for taking any risks of starting a war over Germany. The British are less outspoken on that, but they, too, apparently feel that Truman and Marshall haven't been too smart or adroit in handling the situation.

Even on the basis of the published notes and statements that have been issued by the administration the last couple of weeks, we have been doing a lot of backing and filling.

First, we say we won't negotiate with the Russians on the whole German problem, and now, according to Secretary of State Marshall's statement on July 21, we are prepared to do that.

Also, our original position in the Berlin controversy with the Russians was based on our obligation to feed the Germans in our zone. Now the Russians come along and say they will feed everybody in Berlin, which certainly left the American people up in the air a few weeks ago. The German heads on the western zones, in effect, supported the Russian position in refusing to go along with our plan for a separate government in western Germany. Now it is announced that some Germans in the western zone are agreeable.

All of this adds up to just one thing: That the administration is constantly acting without sound ground under its feet. It is constantly taking stands and initiating projects without having the people it must depend upon to put these things through fully lined up in favor of them. To me, it just doesn't make sense.

A general just doesn't start off on an operation without being sure that he's got the troops and supplies to execute the operation. But that's what the administration is doing, both on its domestic and foreign policies.

Neither the Western Powers nor the Germans appear to be in accord with what we propose to do. That means either poor diplomatic work or just plain downright bungling and stupidity. It's probably a case of both.

Marshall is plainly inadequate as Secretary of State. We just aren't enjoying diplomacy any more. Our foreign affairs are being run like an army.

We don't deal with people; we issue orders. And that just can't be done in politics, whether domestic or foreign. The Panama fiasco is an illustration.

There is a direct and intimate relation between foreign affairs and the military, but there is also a very distinct difference between the two functions.

Neither Truman nor Marshall, apparently, have any comprehension of that basic and fundamental fact. Secretary Marshall is just a Regular Army soldier who doesn't know any different. In the meantime we and the rest of the world are being wracked and hazed in a welter of war scares and chaotic muddling. Actually, it's nothing new. That has been going on now for several years. The only difference is that things have finally come to a head, and the situation is a lot more sinister and hazardous than ever before.

The lack of confidence in the way our foreign affairs are being run now is a very important factor as far as the western European governments are concerned, and offsets to a considerable extent what we are attempting to do with the European recovery program.

For instance, the American Ambassador to England was having a conference with the British Foreign Minister, when the news was printed of the American Government's note—on disputed questions affecting other countries, including Britain—to Molotov, and neither our Ambassador to England nor Foreign Minister Bevin, knew anything about it until the press dispatches were laid before them. Naturally Ambassador Douglas was indignant almost to the point of resignation.

The western democracies of Europe are on the front lines. If anything happens it will happen to them first and it is natural that they should hesitate to back up an administration that is repeatedly fumbling around like ours.

It is all right for President Truman and Secretary Marshall to talk tough, but those people over there want to know just where that is going to lead before they commit themselves.

We Americans are entitled to demand that the administration lay some cards on the table and tell what it is all about. That is one of the most terrifying aspects of the whole situation. Nobody really knows anything. All we get is rumored hints and a lot of babble.

Our intelligence system is a joke. Hanson Baldwin, an eminent military expert of the New York Times, is taking it apart currently. He makes it very plain that our whole intelligence structure is a shamble of little groups trying to build up little empires of their own.

All that—our steadily accelerating drift to an inflationary bust over a period of 14 years—the pattern of our foreign policies—of course, play squarely into the hands of the Communists.

They are just sitting back and letting us fumble and bumble and hoping that we will continue to scatter our money over so many places that we will be a push-over for them in a few years when our economics are shattered and the morale of our people is wobbly.

If the American foreign policy is to succeed, it must not only be intelligently handled but America must be a sound financial mooring post for the rest of the world to tie to.

The remedies are:

1. Frugal Government spending.

2. Government overhauling its monetary policy—or, more accurately, see to it that the Federal Reserve System stops following policies which are inflationary in the highest degree, while the President is alarmed at that very danger. In 1946 we had an increase in the money supply and bank credit which, measured by peacetime standards, was perfectly fantastic. In 1947—in contrast—it did begin to put on a little deflationary pressure, but it was mighty gentle.

The argument in support of that policy is that unless money rates are continued at an artificially low level through Federal Reserve policy, the interest charge on the public debt will be increased. If there ever was a case of being penny-wise and pound-foolish, that certainly is it. In order to save some dollars on the carrying charges of our public debt, we are endangering the price structure of the whole Nation and thereby undermining the value—the real value—of the entire savings of our people.

3. Some restraint on give-away international spending. It seems to me it is about time the Government got itself straightened out on what it is doing to prices. It comes with ill grace for an administration to complain about the rising costs of food when the administration is contributing to that cost by the way it handles its own purchases. Its lack of an orderly price program has encouraged speculation and driven prices to substantially higher levels. I believe that, in the interest of an honest solution, the administration should let the people know the effect of the so-called bipartisan foreign policy on prices.

The big grain crops of this year would begin leveling off the rise in the cost of living and put a damper on further wage and price rises, if it were not for the give-away policy of pouring foodstuffs into Europe at the very time Europe's crops are good.

Furthermore, both a Republican Congress and a Democratic President cannot continue to support one agricultural price program after another and still expect prices to go down.

4. Impose consumer-credit controls by Presidential proclamation. If our Government—and that means both the President and the Congress—would do all it can in establishing beyond any questions of doubt, a permanent, sound, physical policy—balance the budget—make a substantial payment on the national debt—lower taxes—tighten up on credit—make sensible tariff adjustments—maintain a fixed and sound monetary policy—all that, acting together, would have a corrective influence on the cost of living and would do much to prevent the economic bust that Russia is hoping and waiting for.

Obviously, the more money we pump into circulation through Government spending—regardless of the merits or demerits of the idea—the more we add to inflationary pressure. Obviously we are in a situation more precarious.

The reestablishment of a sound economy in our country calls for statesmanship of the highest order—both in our policies at home and abroad. We watch the unfolding foreign and domestic crises that may mean the deluge for our coveted civilization. I believe that now is the time for that cooperation between the Congress and the President that war itself always crystalizes in all loyal Americans for the sake of our Nation. Now is the time to show the world we can pull together before the storm breaks as well as after it hits.

A sound economy is as vital to our security as planes, tanks, guns, and men.

The whole world today—that is the free world—requires strength and a sound economy in the United States of America. Without it our leadership would fade—the European recovery plan would disappear—world trade would be paralyzed. The Air Corps, the Army, and the Navy—the right arm of the freedom-loving peoples everywhere—would be ineffective. The Kremlin would be afforded propaganda and strength by our failure. Its influence—a menace to us all—would spread.

China Today

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ELBERT D. THOMAS

OF UTAH

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, August 7 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD a short article I prepared for the newspaper PM, dealing with China, and which later appeared therein. PM is now the New York Star.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHINA TODAY

Right after the Washington Conference began in 1922 China came into the discussions. Someone asked the question—what is China? The answer never has been given. A Chinese diplomatist might say: "China is the country I represent." A member of our State Department might say: "China is a country which has a seat in the United Nations." But these answers mean very little.

China is a country of 400,000,000 people attempting to keep body and soul together, united for a moment or two to defeat Japan, but now divided even worse than ever. Yet anyone who knows China will say she is a land of hope and great promise. China, India, and Russia are passing through the greatest social, political, and economic revolutions any people have ever endured in the entire history of the world. The greatest need is to find some stability on which to build. By stability, I mean some element in life which holds people together.

Throughout the ages, China has persisted because she got closer to democracy and private-property economy than any other great civilization. We must find the something in the economic life of China which the Chinaman can call his own—a bit of land, a bit of gold or silver, a priceless jewel or salable piece of art. Even in communistic China they are dividing up the land. A divsion of land which results in individual ownership will, of course, destroy communistic ideas.

China is no longer the great self-sufficing civilization that she was when she deemed all of the rest of the world barbarian. She, too, has become cosmopolitan and her hopes are outside of the old Chinese self-satisfaction. She has gotten pretty well over her disdain of the foreigner. She does not even consider the old exploiting nations of the West her enemy. She now stands free of extraterritoriality restrictions and the United States has negotiated with her a commercial treaty based upon friendship and mutuality which recognizes her as an equal in the sisterhood of nations. She still has a dislike of Japan and a fear of Japanese revival. Strange to relate, there is not among the Chinese people the same fear of Russia that we find almost universal among western nations. Korea is fast becoming an entity. China, contrary to all Chinese ideals, may be in the grip of war lords for some time to come. This may result in another period for China which can be characterized as a period of "contending states." That will be the opposite of political unity.

In contrast, Japan is a unit despite her defeat and loss of much prestige. She has no hangover nor delusion, as Germany did after World War I, that she was not defeated. We shall never see among the Japanese the gathering together of the steel helmets which marked the beginning of Hitler and his regime. Japan, in her heart, was as much antimilitaristic as was China. Her culture and her outlook are both Chinese. Long before she surrendered she had become convinced that her leaders were apostate and were leading Japan to the destruction which came. Her Emperor was taught in the Peers School that a break with America meant the end of Japan. Among the thoughtful Japanese there is almost an I-told-you-so attitude. Japan is happy to be relieved of the military strain. Oh yes, she can be aroused to again unite for war if our leadership teaches her that. If we cannot convince her of the worth of peace and dollar democracy she may pass through a period of civil strife. But if we build upon the unity that is there, if we build upon the hopes that are in the hearts of the Japanese people we can develop a friendly neighbor who can be a guide for a united China and a friend of nonmilitaristic Western thought.

Peace in Asia can no more be built around antagonism between Japan and China than peace in Europe can be built around the developing of antagonisms between European states. We cannot have world peace without peace in Asia. We are liked by the Japanese people today. We are liked by the Chinese until they feel that we may be building a new Japan for selfish nationalistic purposes. Our sincerity and our honesty in standing for peace in the sisterhood of nations and in using our private property, dollar democracy to develop wealth and trade and individual dealings between people—in other words, making the spirit of our trade in friendship one of mutuality—may be the key to overcoming the deadly antagonisms between the Chinese and the Japanese which are the bane of peace in Asia. As a result of our victory in Japan, we stand as Asia's hope. Never in the history of mankind has a nation had imposed upon it the responsibility which we face in Asia.

Supply of Anhydrous Ammonia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HERBERT R. O'CONOR
OF MARYLAND
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, August 7 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. O'CONOR. Mr. President, I believe Members of the Senate will be interested in the communication from one of Maryland's oldest and foremost fertilizer companies, with regard to provisions in the Foreign Aid Appropriation Act of 1949, Public Law 793, section 205, concerning preference given to certain manufacturers of sulfate of ammonia for fertilizers.

The net effect of the setting aside of 10 percent anhydrous ammonia for domestic usage, it is stated, is that in certain areas of the West more nitrogenous fertilizer materials will be available to farmers than they can either purchase or use, while farmers in the South and East are lacking required amounts of such materials.

I ask unanimous consent that the letter be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE BAUGH & SONS CO.,
Baltimore, Md., July 30, 1948.

Hon. HERBERT R. O'CONOR,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR O'CONOR: In the closing session of the Congress an amendment (No. 39) was tacked on to the Foreign Aid Appropriation Act, 1949 (H. R. 6801), by Senator MORSE which directed the Department of the Army to set aside 10 percent of its anhydrous ammonia for domestic usage under the administration of the Department of Commerce with preference given to certain manufacturers of sulphate of ammonia for fertilizers. The amendment passed and has now become section 205 of Public Law 793.

It is this 10 percent for domestic use with which we are concerned and invite your particular attention. In volume this 10 percent amounts to around 30,000 tons of anhydrous ammonia, which is equivalent to about 120,000 tons of sulphate of ammonia, which is quite a sizable and very important tonnage of fertilizer material.

By way of background information the material furnished by the Army in the form of anhydrous ammonia will be shipped from Army production points at Etters, Tex.; West Henderson, Ky.; and Morgantown, W. Va., for conversion into sulphate of ammonia at certain locations in the far West and the South, with preference given to certain producers referred to as emergency cases.

From remarks printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, it seems that Senators who questioned the amendment, Senator RUSSELL in particular, were of the opinion that it was for the benefit of American farmers in general. It seems that the conferees on the part of the Senate (BRIDGES, GURNEY, BROOKS, REED, HAYDEN, and THOMAS) also were of that opinion.

However, actually, it appears that in effect the amendment is designed and being administered to relieve certain manufacturers of synthetic ammonium sulphate on the west coast, rather than farmers in general. Under Distribution Order D-1, as published in the Federal Register for Saturday, July 24, 1948, page 4253, the bulk of the Army material will go to converting plants at Salem, Oreg. (Columbia Metals Co.), and at Berkeley, Calif. (Best Fertilizer Co.). The end result will be to make available to farmers in that area more nitrogenous fertilizer materials than they can either purchase or use, while farmers in the South and East are lacking essential quantities of such materials for top-dressing purposes.

The territory served from our various factories embraces the States of Maryland, Delaware, Virginia, West Virginia, North Carolina, Ohio, New York, and New Jersey, where large quantities of nitrogen materials are used by the farmers in these States, and our direct concern is to see that their best interests are protected in the allocation and distribution of these materials.

Therefore, we would appreciate your careful consideration of any discussions or further legislation affecting these bills, as other sections of the country will also be interested in the distribution of these materials and it is very important that the farmers in our area should not be discriminated against.

We believe something should be done to emphasize congressional intent that the benefits accruing from that amendment were for all our farmers according to need rather than to satisfy a few high-cost, uneconomic fertilizer manufacturing operations. Even though farmers from the South and East might be allowed to purchase some of the west coast production, the high cost added to the enormous transportation charges would result in exhorbitant charges to the consumers who actually need the material.

We understand that the Department of Agriculture is very much interested in this matter and is working with the Department of Commerce for the purpose of getting the best possible allocation and distribution of this material.

If you desire further information or any additional essential facts we shall be pleased to hear from you and will appreciate any assistance you may be in a position to render.

Very truly yours,
THE BAUGH & SONS CO.,
W. S. RUPP,
Vice President.

The Eightieth Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ARTHUR CAPPER
OF KANSAS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, August 7 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article on the Eightieth Congress by Dr. Clinton N. Howard, to be published in Progress magazine, the official publication of the International Reform Federation for August.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE EIGHTIETH CONGRESS—"THE WORST CONGRESS SINCE WASHINGTON"

That is the judgment expressed by the President, and disputed by his opponents. Today the book is closed, and tomorrow history will record its answer: "Weighed in the balances and found wanting."

There are, however, component parts of the Eightieth Congress which may well be charged with being worse than the whole, both in the Senate and in the House. Take, for example, the Senate Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and its inaction on the bill to prohibit the transportation in interstate commerce of advertisements of alcoholic beverages introduced in the Senate by Senator CAPPER, of Kansas.

Here was a bill which was accorded two of the most outstanding hearings in the history of the Senate, filling the great caucus room of the Senate with the representatives of 25 national organizations and a majority of the Protestant Church organizations in the United States, if not all of them. It was computed that its sponsors represented 50,000,000 of the adult population. The hearing was magnificently marshaled by Bishop Wilbur Hammaker, the big giant of Methodism.

This bill was introduced by Senator CAPPER, one of the most outstanding members in years of service and representing in a peculiar way the great agricultural interests of the Nation over a long period of years, and chairman of the Agricultural Committee. He is without a doubt the best known and one of the most capable Senators that august body has had in this generation. In addition to representing the great State of Kansas for 30 years in the Senate, he is one of the greatest businessmen in the field of journalism that the country has ever known.

TOP MAN IN BUSINESS WORLD

Despite his phenomenal financial success without the aid of liquor advertising, and his refusal throughout his long career to accept any of the more than $100,000,000 annually spent by the distillers in advertising, in any of nine daily papers, farm journals, and magazines, he sought to crown his career in the Senate by the introduction of a bill that would forbid the transportation of liquor advertising in interstate commerce, leaving the entire 48 States to the exploitation by the distillers and brewers, who are now collecting from the American people, by the estimate of the Department of Commerce, the vast sum of $9,000,000,000 plus, every year, with tragic results to the social, moral, and financial life of the people.

After long delay, as the result of high pressure and countless petitions, the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, composed of 12 members representing both political parties, granted hearings on this Capper bill, on May 12 and 13, 1947, when a total of 64 witnesses were heard.

GOVERNMENT BY COMMITTEE

Attending this grand opening was a single one of the 12 members, the chairman of the subcommittee, who was violently opposed to the bill. Many of the witnesses who had come from distant parts of the country to testify in favor of the bill, and the hundreds who filled the mammoth caucus room, were amazed at the seeming indifference of the committee with two or three others coming in for a few minutes during the course of the 2 days' hearing.

This was followed by a second hearing, with a similar result, the chairman of the full committee graciously coming in just before the close of the hearing on the last day.

MOUNTAIN AND MOUSE

All of this testimony, printed in two reports of nearly 400 pages, was printed at Government expense and given wide distribution among the organizations represented, and petitions continued to come in from all parts of the country from church, social, educational or reform organizations as well as long lists of individuals. This activity was urged upon them by their official publications week after week.

What happened? So far as we have been able to learn the Capper bill was not even considered by the committee or a vote thereon taken. A subcommittee was appointed to draft a substitute, which the two members composing it did. This bill, introduced by Senator CLYDE REED, was a miserable compromise, not asked for by the dry forces or seriously opposed by the wet witnesses. In fact that second hearing gave almost its entire attention to the Capper bill.

ASHCAN POLITICS

The subcommittee reported this substitute favorably, with no organization or individual asking for it, and it was defeated by a vote of the committee, and the whole proposal thrown into the ashcan, with all of the work of the organizations in urging its passage, all the prepared arguments presented, all of the cost in transportation and hotels incurred by the witnesses, all the cost of printing the testimony by the Government counting for naught. It was a complete surrender to the liquor power of the Nation, who may now continue their $100,000,000 (distilled liquors only) campaign, and send their flaming and misleading ads across the State lines into territory both wet and dry.

The infamous imposition upon the church and abstinent population, even in States where the vast proportion of the population are living in territory voted dry by the people, is a part of the record of what the President has called "the worst Congress since Washington."

THE 12 SPIES

We will let the President support his own impeachment of the Congress as a whole, but we submit that the worst record made by a committee since Joshua sent the 12 spies into the land of Canaan, is the record of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee in the Senate, and the record of the Committee on Banking and Currency, of which JESSE P. WOLCOTT is chairman, in the House. The record of these two committees does not represent democracy, they represent despotism of the most reactionary, dangerous, and rank kind. While we are straining at the gnat of communism abroad we are swallowing the camel of committee despotism at home. Hitler and Stalin represent despotic government at its worst abroad, the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee in the Senate, and the Banking and Currency Committee in the House are the worst example of despotism in a democratic form of government since the fall of Adam.

The majority of both of these committees and their chairmen are Republicans and their constituents would render their country a distinct service if they were left at home, particularly JESSE WOLCOTT, who comes from a group of rural counties in the Seventh Congressional District of Michigan. The defeat of the housing bill, lying dormant in the committee of which he, WOLCOTT, is chairman, can be charged to this one man. The defeat of the Flanders bill, passed by the Senate and asked for by the President, to place a limitation on the food grains destroyed by the liquor interest for the benefit of the starving millions in Europe can be laid at the door of the same JESSE WOLCOTT who has denied his Banking and Currency Committee the democratic right to vote upon it.

"Hang Jeff Davis on a sour-apple tree, as we go marching on!"

Growth of Idea of a Federated Europe

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. WILLIAM FULBRIGHT

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, August 7 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD a newspaper article entitled "Idea of Federated Europe Continues To Gain Support," by DeWitt Mackenzie, published in the August 5, 1948, issue of the Arkansas Democrat, together with an editorial entitled "ERP and European Unity," published in the August 7, 1948, issue of the New York Times. They both concern European unity, which I consider to be one of the most important questions at this time.

There being no objection, the matters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Arkansas Democrat of August 5, 1948]

IDEA OF FEDERATED EUROPE CONTINUES TO GAIN SUPPORT

(By DeWitt Mackenzie)

For close to 150 years idealistic statesmen have dreamed of and labored for a United States of Europe, but ironically enough it has taken the frightful menace of communism to start this vision on its way to partial materialization.

That seems like a queer twist of fate, but maybe it's not so strange after all. Atheists turn to prayer in extremities, and men of many minds band together for mutual defense in time of danger. Anyway, western Europe has started a swing toward a confederation of democracies which are making concessions in sovereignty for the common welfare.

We were given two further notable indications of this trend yesterday. Italy's free thinking, outspoken Foreign Minister, Count Carlo Sforza, stated that in order to effect a European union his country is ready to take the lead in accepting "curtailment of its political sovereignty, even in the most unexpected aspects." About the same time French Foreign Minister Paul Reynaud said he hoped Britain would come out in full support of a United States of Europe next autumn, after the dominions conference in London.

There is no indication of whether these two statements were coincidental or concerted. It would be interesting to know. In any event, they aim at the same objective.

Of course these pronouncements aren't the first positive development along this line. There was the sensational formation of the five-nation western European union some 5 months ago, when Britain, France, Belgium, Holland, and Luxemburg formed an alliance which was haled by many observers as giving a decided filip to the idea of a union for the whole of western Europe, and received the blessings of the United States.

This western European combine neatly complemented the union of 16 European countries which had banded together in support of the Marshall plan. Indeed, time may demonstrate that America's European recovery project provided the nucleus for a United States of western Europe—and perhaps finally of all Europe in the happy days when communism had had its run and the Continent has returned to freedom.

Italy's adherence to the western European bloc so openly is a striking development in view of her powerful Communist Party which at one time seemed about to deliver her into the hands of Moscow; Count Sforza yesterday urged union now as the only cure for the Continent's economic and political ills and as the sole hope of peace. His stand for unity was strengthened last week when the Italian Senate, in approving the Marshall plan accords, urged their early development into effective union. Only Communists and fellow-travelers Socialists offered opposition.

The 74-year-old Sforza, still square shouldered and vigorous despite his years—is a blue-blood aristocrat of great wealth who is a liberal, pursues Republican politics, and long has been advocate of European unity. After Mussolini came to power Sforza went into voluntary exile, traveling about Europe, Asia, South America, and the United States writing and lecturing. He was a critic of both fascism and monarchy.

Reynaud has some encouragement in expressing hope that Britain will give full support to a United States of Europe. While the British Government has been cautious about committing itself in this matter, Prime Minister Attlee has said that he personally favors a federated Europe. Foreign Secretary Bevin has gone so far as to point out that the Western European Union (which he fathered) is the hard core of western Europe and that other nations are free to join.

And one cannot stop without recalling that England's famous Winston Churchill long has been going up and down the land, lending his powerful voice to the idea of a United States of Europe.

[From the New York Times of August 7, 1948]

ERP AND EUROPEAN UNITY

Three diplomats spending 3 hours in the Kremlin, as the representatives of the United States, Great Britain, and France did yesterday, may reflect a turning in the tide of Europe's and the world's affairs. Let us hope so. But we must not overlook less dramatic incidents. When Foreign Minister Carlo Sforza stated a few days ago that Italy was ready to take the lead in surrendering national sovereignty for European unity the future may have been in these words as well as in the ones uttered in the Kremlin. For Sforza spoke not for himself alone, but for the country. The Italian Senate's vote of approval of the ERP accords was accompanied by a strong recommendation that the program should be made the basis of an effective union among the participating states. This official action gives weight to Count Sforza's statement that there is no cure for the ills of Europe save the abolition of customs frontiers and customs duties.

Unless competition, anti-economic distribution of tasks and functions, restraints on trade and movement—these are the "autarchies," Count Sforza says, that cause the misery of Europe. It is fitting and significant that the nation that invented and tried out the ruinous autarchy called fascism should now aspire to lead the movement to break down national frontiers. Italians know better than most people the crushing cost of inflated nationalism and make-believe self-sufficiency. They beat the drums for European unity because they are returning to their old tradition and because they need to belong to a large free-trade area. But so do their neighbors. It is this necessity, plus a sense of common weakness and common danger, that cuts through the fibroid growths that divide them and makes the idea of federation the most magnetic idea in western Europe today.

One reason for this, of course, is the European recovery program. In the American view, as Mr. Paul Hoffman emphasized in his recent discussions with the European directors, the cooperative aspects of this great enterprise are more important than the benefits to any one country. We have made it very clear that on the economic side, at least, the participating countries are expected to work out over-all rather than separate plans for recovery, the fact that aid is available for projects of multilateral scope in preference to narrowly national developments is slowly laying the foundation for an integrated structure.

Even more important, perhaps, is the effect of the ERP on the nations outside the direct beneficiaries. The Marshall plan was not originally intended to apply to western Europe alone. After Mr. Molotov had rejected it for Russia and the states within the Soviet orbit, the European committee representing the cooperating nations was the first to point out that their task was rendered doubly difficult by this artificial division. Proceeding on the assumption that it had to be broken down, they went too far, in the opinion of some economists, in basing their calculations on the resumption of trade between east and west.

But if western recovery is difficult without commerce with the east, eastern recovery is impossible without trade outlets in the west. This is why the Economic Commission for Europe, at the suggestion of Russia, was ordered last week to map out a plan for economic cooperation and an expansion of trade among all the continental countries. The resolution to this effect was worked out by France and Poland, in itself an unusual sign of east-west collaboration, and adopted unanimously by the 18 nations of the United Nations Economic and Social Council.

This is a remarkable development. To say that it is the first step toward the economic organization of Europe as a whole may be wishful thinking, but it can be hailed as the first open recognition on the part of all the nations concerned that one-half of Europe cannot live without the other. And certainly it proves the irresistible attraction of ERP and therefore the soundness of the policy on which it is based.

Moscow is finding it difficult to unify eastern Europe by force, and nobody imagines it will be easy to draw the free nations of the west into a voluntary working partnership. To bring all of the continental states together, even into the loose economic pattern of prewar days, will be a labor of Hercules. But the point is that a western movement toward some form of unity is already started, and the magnetism of this movement begins to be felt in the east. The impetus given to this process by ERP may well turn out to be the most lasting byproduct of the Marshall plan.

Contributions of the Democratic Party to the West

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ELBERT D. THOMAS

OF UTAH

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, August 7 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an outstanding address entitled "Contributions of the Democratic Party to the West," delivered by Gov. Herbert B. Maw, of Utah, at the concluding session of the Democratic National Convention in Philadelphia, July 14, 1948.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I have been asked to represent the West in my address to this convention and to point out the contributions of our party in meeting western problems. We who live in the States where from 50 to 85 percent of the land is owned by the Federal Government are vitally affected by the political philosophy of that Government. As we have witnessed our progress being threatened by a Republican Congress during the past 2 years we have come more and more to realize how great have been the contributions of the Democratic Party to that great section of our Nation which lies beyond the Rockies. During 14 years we learned what it means to a people living in an area of inadequate rainfall to have a government that will bring water to the land, a government that will save our soil from erosion, a government that will rehabilitate our ranges and forests, a government that will help us to help ourselves. We discovered that such benefits have not always been enjoyed by western peoples, but they were a part of a program that was promised by a great man who was running for President in 1932; a man who said, "Elect me and I'll give you a New Deal," and were provided by a Congress which believed in the fundamental doctrines of the political party that nominated that man. We were therefore profoundly shocked when we sat at our radios and heard the leadership of the Republican Party declare from this very platform in the midst of loud applause that they considered those years when Franklin D. Roosevelt was President—the years during which the Government was doing so much for the West—to be a period of national stagnation. Most westerners did not expect them to go so far as to declare that the Republican leadership intended to destroy all that the New Deal stood for—the New Deal which gave to the West its greatest period of prosperity. Even members of their own party did not think that they would glorify the political doctrines of Herbert Hoover and point to them as the epitome of Republican achievement. Even they expected that their leaders had learned something during the past 20 years. Before the curtain was run down in their convention, tens of thousands of western Republicans had made up their minds that if the Republican Party had no more to offer than the outmoded doctrines that threw us into a depression the only hope for the West was a Democratic victory.

The western States are in the main sparsely settled, though population increases along the Pacific coast in recent years have been tremendous. Individually, they have not carried too much political or congressional weight, and have been unable to numerically hold their own against other areas of like size who might oppose their expansion. The only hope of large sections of the West is in a President and a Congress that will deal with it on merit and not according to the dictates of strong groups who would rather exploit it than develop it. Never since the pioneers turned their faces to the setting sun and plodded with ox teams across the plains and mountains to settle a new section were we accorded sympathetic understanding by Washington until Franklin D. Roosevelt became President of the United States. It was then that the West came into its own. Congress working closely with the President caught the vision of the great possibilities for all Americans out there. They decided that the natural resources of that western empire should be developed for the national good—that the forests, the vineyards, and orchards, the rich mines, and the cattle ranges should thereafter enjoy the sustaining influence of the Federal Government. Overnight new hope came to a discouraged population which had been struggling to survive the onslaught of a Republican depression.

It was the Democratic Party that agreed with us that water and cheap power were prerequisites to western development, so a Democratic administration built for us the Bonneville, Grand Coulee, and other great dams. On each dam was constructed hydroelectric power plants, and the stored water was carried through canals to parched deserts. Thus there was started an expansion of western reclamation. New farms and new industries sprang up. Prosperity was in the making. Our Democratic leadership in Washington visualized the value of soil conservation and decided to stop erosion and the wasting of good public lands. They discovered that not less than 100,000,000 acres of cultivated lands in the United States—enough to sustain 33,000,000 people had been ruined beyond recovery by the elements and so they proceeded to rehabilitate the soil. They set up a Soil Conservation Service, worked to control erosion and to increase productivity of the soil, and to get water to the land. They developed new methods to control forest fires, reseed grazing lands, and destroy pests and obnoxious weeds. They made ranges and deserts productive and profitable. Act after act to help the West was passed by Democratic Congresses and signed by a Democratic President during the 14 years following 1933.

They saw the struggle of the western farm to survive, and became concerned when they learned that often prices for farm products were so low that it was cheaper for the farmer to let his crops rot in the ground than to harvest them. Suddenly there came forth from Congress a parity program that guaranteed to the farmer just prices for what he raised, and a Farm Mortgage Act which enabled him to refinance his obligations and save his lands and a Commodity Exchange Act that improved his marketing conditions. To the farmer living in remote areas were taken the conveniences of modern living through the rural electrification program. These and many other projects were provided so that the farmers of the West were lifted from a state of depression and discouragement to one of security and prosperity the like of which they had never experienced before.

When the Democrats came into office people in every State of the West were unemployed and destitute. Heads of families could not provide for their children. Banks were daily closing wiping out the life's savings of many loyal Americans. Distress was universal. Instantly our party met that emergency. A social-security program was enacted giving food, clothing, and shelter to the aged and needy. A bank holiday saved the banks and a Federal Deposit Insurance Act protected the savings of the people. The Democratic Party, which believes that Government should help those who cannot help themselves, thus gave hope and security to the Nation. It gave to labor a 40-hour week and a minimum-wage law, and better working conditions and higher salaries and recognized the principle of collective bargaining. It established health programs for all the people and old-age retirement and social security for most of them. The helping hand of Government was extended to all classes of society in the Nation.

During a period of 14 years our party gave to the West and its people prosperity and security and put it in a position for large-scale industrial expansion.

Yet these are the things that the Republican Party has pledged itself to destroy, for these are plainly and simply New Deal projects, conceived and enacted into law by a New Deal Congress and proposed or approved by a New Deal President. Before they have finished with this campaign they'll discover that they bit off more than they could chew when they got the whole New Deal program into their mouth. It seems to me that they are in for a severe attack of indigestion.

Most all of the legislation referred to above—public power, aid to farmers, protection for the wage earner and social security were opposed by the men who are now the leaders in Congress. How cleverly are these congressional leaders maneuvering to carry out their threat to deprive the people of the benefits of the New Deal, without letting the people know what they are doing. Under the guise of economy they are squeezing the life blood out of reclamation in the West, even though they know that the cost of western reclamation is paid back to the Government in full and that hydroelectric power costs are paid back with interest. The legislative record of the Eightieth Congress reveals a studied effort to abrogate basic tenets of the Nation's public power policies through crippling efficient operation of the Bonneville Power Administration, seriously curtailing essential customer service, and what is most shocking of all, limiting construction facilities on public power projects to those that are approved by private utilities. Under the Republican program future public power expansion in the Northwest will be determined, not by what the people want and need but by what the private utility monopolies decide they shall have. A 40-percent cut in appropriations to the Bonneville Power Administration during the first session of the Eightieth Congress followed by a 16-percent cut during the second session together with restrictive regulations imposed by Congress has proved to be an effective first step toward destroying the public power phase of the New Deal program in the Pacific Northwest. With its demise would vanish the dream of an industrial empire in Oregon and Washington.

The working people were always close to the heart of President Roosevelt so labor was singled out by his enemies who now control Congress as one of the first groups to feel the sting of the Republican attack on the New Deal. Under a pretense that they wanted to help the workingman they clamped down on him. The Taft-Hartley Act will be followed by other measures, if the announced intentions of the Republican Party are carried through, and all of the many advantages and benefits given to labor by the New Deal will be taken from them.

Bill after bill which was written to cripple and handicap service after service that was created by the Democratic administration to lift this country out of the mire of depression was introduced at the Eightieth Congress. Of course only a few of them were passed. It would not have been wise for them to go too far just prior to an election. But their intentions have been clearly announced—their course of action definitely prescribed.

Where will they strike next? Will it be at the Federal Depositors Insurance Act that stopped the runs on banks during the dark days of the depression and has since guaranteed to the small depositors of the Nation that their money shall remain secure in local banks for their use? Or will they attack the soil conservation legislation that has meant so much to the agricultural and livestock industries of the West? Or could it be that the former will be the next victim? How much longer will he be permitted to enjoy the benefits of a parity program and the marketing act and the other New Deal advantages which have lifted his state from one of poverty to independence? When will they remove minimum wages and health services? How long will old-age security legislation and farm loans be allowed to stand? These are each a part of the Democratic program and are included in that group of accomplishments which have been referred to by Republican leaders as stagnating.

Ladies and gentlemen have you ever considered the extent to which your own life, your security and your prosperity would be affected if the Republican Party should be successful in their announced plan to invalidate the New Deal? If you have not, I suggest that you do so before election day. Otherwise it might be too late. Speakers at the Republican Convention repeatedly apologized for not having gone further with their scuttling of President Roosevelt's program, and explained that the reason why they were held back was because a Democratic President time after time vetoed their legislation. But even as they spoke millions of Americans thanked their God that there was in the White House a man who had the courage and integrity to veto their bills and check them in their mad endeavor.

In view of what has happened in Washington during the past 2 years, does any veteran really believe that a Republican Congress will give to him low-cost housing over the protest of the well-organized builders' lobby? Does any teacher or parent or school official think that such a Republican Congress will ever appropriate money to subsidize education? Could any small-business man contend that he has any future under a Congress that would remove over a Presidential veto the railroads from the provisions of the antitrust laws and thereby open the door for monopolies to stifle competition?

I do not know what Americans in other areas believe, but in the West we are not being deceived. We can see the handwriting on the wall. We appreciate what Democratic Presidents and Democratic Congresses have done for us. Our living conditions and opportunities have been so much improved because of them that we will not forget. We will be ready at the next election and we will do our part to put an end to the destructive objectives of the Republican Party by electing a Democratic President and Democratic Members of Congress who will sustain the Democratic Party doctrine that government shall serve all of the people and help all classes to help themselves.

Federal Aid to Education

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HERBERT R. O'CONOR
OF MARYLAND
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, August 7 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. O'CONOR. Mr. President, with reference to the controversial question of Federal aid to education, the viewpoint of many Marylanders is presented in an editorial published in the Maryland Tax Digest, published by the Maryland Public Expenditure Council, of which J. L. Stanton is executive director and A. Chesley Wilson is editor. Their statement gives in a brief but clear manner some financial aspects of the proposals which are pertinent, and I ask that it be published in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FEDERAL AID TO EDUCATION

When President Truman announced in Philadelphia that he was calling a special midsummer session of the Congress, the Federal aid-to-education proposal was among the emergency measures listed for presentation to the lawmakers.

Probably no single proposal of recent years better illustrates the fallacy of aid from the Federal Government as far as Maryland is concerned.

Briefly, this measure calls for the appropriation of $300,000,000 for the first year to launch a Federal program aimed at the equalization of educational opportunities for children throughout the country. This is to be accomplished by providing funds for State and local governments unable to properly finance adequate educational programs with local funds. It is also to aid teachers. This is to be carried out without any Federal control or interference in the operation of schools by State and local bodies.

Under the elaborate set-up for the distribution of the aid, Maryland is classed among the wealthier States and would receive minimum assistance. This would amount to $5 per pupil per year, or a total of $2,135,000. The State's contribution in taxes toward the $300,000,000 fund would be $3,424,000.

A certain measure of control of the State's educational system is carried in the regulations proposed for distributing the fund. Grounds for the growth and expansion of that initial control are furnished by a recent opinion of the United States Supreme Court: "The Government has the right to regulate that which it subsidizes."

The people of Maryland have demonstrated clearly their willingness and ability to take care of the educational needs of the children of this State. A recent compilation shows that 35 percent of Maryland's revenue, or more than $23,000,000 will be spent for educational purposes this year. A better perspective of the increasing importance on education here is obtained when it is pointed out that less than $7,000,000 was spent on education in the school year 1939–40, which was 19 percent of the State's revenue for that period.

Nationally, the story is somewhat different, but it is significant that among the poorer States the Federal plan has been received with little enthusiasm. The Mississippi Legislature has gone so far as to pass a resolution opposing the Federal plan. It is also somewhat contradictory that the so-called poorer States for the most part have surpluses in their State treasuries which they have not seen fit to expend on improving their educational systems.

It would seem that the Federal Government, with huge commitments abroad, the greatest peacetime military program in our history, and a debt in excess of $250,000,000,000 could safely let the educational program remain with the State and local governments.

Col. Edward Rickenbacker

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. BRICKER

OF OHIO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, August 7 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. BRICKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the remarks made by George E. Stringfellow at the commencement exercises at the College of South Jersey, at Camden, N. J., on June 11, 1948, in presenting Col. Edward V. Rickenbacker on the occasion of his citation for the degree of doctor of laws, the citation read by Dr. Arthur E. Armitage on the same occasion, and the address by Colonel Rickenbacker accepting the degree.

There being no objection, the remarks and citation were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REMARKS BY GEORGE E. STRINGFELLOW IN PRESENTING COL. EDWARD VERNON RICKENBACKER

Dr. Armitage, members of your distinguished faculty, ladies and gentlemen, I'm happy to present Col. Eddie Rickenbacker to you and in doing so I could present him as a noted mechanical engineer, a designer of airplanes and automobiles, the ace of World War I, the hero of World War II, a person who has been honored by his own and many foreign governments, as president of one of the largest air transport companies in the world, as a lecturer, author, and philosopher, as a man who has been honored by the leading educational institutions of the world. However, I prefer to present him as a good citizen for I can think of no greater compliment one can pay to another than to say that he is a good citizen, for that embodies all that's honorable and decent.

One of the reasons why Eddie Rickenbacker is a good citizen is that he has granite in his character which inspires him to do the right thing even though it might not be popular at the time, and he has steel in his backbone which gives him the courage to carry on.

It is, therefore, my pleasure to present Col. Eddie Rickenbacker—a good citizen.

CITATION BY DR. ARTHUR E. ARMITAGE IN PRESENTING HON. EDWARD VERNON RICKENBACKER FOR THE DEGREE OF DOCTOR OF LAWS

Edward Vernon Rickenbacker stands before us as one who rose with two infant industries, those of the automobile and of the airplane, and played a heroic and major role in each. In the realm of the automobile, he was recognized as the greatest racer of his day; in the realm of the air, he became in World War I America's ace of aces, whose name will be remembered as long as the narrative of history is recorded and as long as men thrill to the deeds of the brave.

But the College of South Jersey is honoring him not solely because of what the world has already recognized in him and not because greatness was thrust upon him, but rather because he rose to greatness the hard way, through his own effort; because he has shown to those who have the will to learn what knowledge, even of technical subjects like mechanical engineering and drafting, can be acquired through a correspondence course and long hours of study when the rest of the world is at sleep or at play; because, when he was in England in 1917 organizing the famous Sunbeam racing team, within the month he rushed, as an enlisted man, to his country's defense; because, when his fame as a racer thrust a staff sergeant's job upon him as driver for General Pershing, he sought less comfortable and less safe duty by transferring to the Air Force, when merely to leave the ground in what planes America had was a venture and a gamble; because within a few months, although he became the chief engineering officer of the Ninety-fourth Aero Squadron and could have sought comparatively safe haven on the ground, he flew at the head of his men and won the world's highest honor, the Congressional Medal, for courage and daring beyond the line of duty, so that as a result, the feats of Immelmann and Von Richtofen were for the nonce somewhat dimmed; because his name will ever rank among the Allies with those of Lieutenant Colonel Bishop and Georges Guynemer; because the feats of his Ninety-fourth were as famous as the Charge of the Light Brigade, though less celebrated in story; because unheralded and unsung until he was reported lost in the Pacific, he flew on special missions to all the combat fronts of the Second World War; because he had become so legendary a hero to his fellow countrymen that news of his rescue filled them with joy and thanksgiving as did Guadalcanal and Surabachi; and because by his deeds, his self-sacrifice, and his devotion he has shown that a man can become a part of every one of us and engage our love and gratitude—because of all these—the intangible things—the College of South Jersey has chosen him as the one whom at this time it most wishes to honor and to present to its graduates about to set forth into a world of action where often "ignorant armies clash by night."

It is, therefore, my honor and privilege, to present Edward Vernon Rickenbacker for the conferring upon him of the honorary degree of doctor of laws.

BRIDGES TO PROGRESS

(Address by Capt. Eddie Rickenbacker, president and general manager, Eastern Air Lines, Inc.)

I am indeed happy to be with you tonight, principally because it is such an eventful occasion in the lives of many of you, and also it gives me the opportunity to lay stress on one of my first recollections of Camden. This dates back to 1926 when I learned about the dedication and opening of the Delaware River Bridge which, at that time, was the longest suspension bridge in the world.

Many of you older people will recall that President Coolidge was there. He did not have much to say, which was not unusual.

My old friend, Will Rogers, was also present. He had a great deal to say, and that, too, was not unusual. During his remarks he jokingly said, "Now that we have a bridge, we can get out of Camden when we want to."

Throughout the years that remark has remained alive in my memory. And for the simple reason that ever since my boyhood days in Columbus, Ohio, I have had a deep respect for bridge builders, and a keen appreciation of bridges.

You see, in a small way, my father was a bridge builder. In fact, he was killed in a bridge-building accident when I was about 12 years old.

You may wonder why I, at this time and place, talk to you about bridge dedications and bridge builders of long ago. But if you will bear with me, I shall shortly make my reasons very plain.

Let me first take you back to an evening more than two-score years ago in my childhood home in Columbus. It was just after supper time. I was working with my father's tools in the small woodshed back of our home. In fact, I was trying to build a perpetual-motion machine.

With boy-like simplicity, I thought I had the problem solved to build a machine that would win me enduring fame and fortune.

Even my father, who worked nights driving piles on a bridge-construction job, did not know about my invention. But one night he came into the toolshed before he went to work and found me tinkering with the machine.

He asked me what I was doing. And I told him—proudly—that I was building a perpetual-motion machine.

But instead of sharing my pride—as I thought he would—my father wanted to know what the machine was intended to do—what its purpose was.

When I told him that it had no purpose, only to run on and on forever in perpetual motion, he threw an arm around my shoulder and said that, to him, I was building a machine backward.

He explained that the first thing a builder of machines has to figure out is what kind of work he wants his machine to do, and then go ahead and design a machine to do that specific job.

Then my father described the pile driver he ran—a simple mechanism. All a pile driver does is to lift a weight up and drop it down on the top of long, stout lengths of lumber. "But," he said, "that weight drives pilings into the river bed, and on top of those pilings men build bridges."

As long as I live, I will remember the thoughts my father left with me that night. This is what he said:

"There's no mystery, no magic, no perpetual motion in a pile driver, but simple as it is, a pile driver helps to make perpetual motion because it builds supports for a bridge to stand on.

"People will cross that bridge—all kinds of people—farmers, mechanics, and children on their way to work, going to school, or to play.

"Wagons will cross the bridge—remember there were no automobiles in those days—carrying food and merchandise to the railroad trains. Trains will carry the freight to the seaports. Ships will cross the oceans and carry food and merchandise to the far corners of the earth.

"Then the ships will come back from across the ocean and they will bring cargoes of merchandise to the trains. The trains will unload it into the wagons, and the wagons will come back across the bridges—the important bridges my simple pile driver helped to build.

"You see how it makes a complete cycle—an endless chain—and all because somebody invented a machine that does nothing but lift a weight and drop it down, to drive pilings into waterways so that bridges can stand on them."

Bridges, ladies and gentlemen, are two-direction thoroughfares. Things go over them, true. But things also come over them. And, in the decades that have passed since it was thrown open to traffic, the Delaware River Bridge, has been a means to help Camden contribute to the growth of the rest of the world, as well as being instrumental in its expansion, the same as all other bridges have been to the immediate centers which they serve.

But there are different kinds of bridges. Man builds bridges that carry things, but he also builds bridges that carry thoughts.

One kind carries the merchandise of men—cars, cargoes, and passengers. The other kind carries the products of the minds of men—ideas, knowledge, and inspiration.

In 1926, the same year the new Camden bridge was opened, another kind of bridge to learning was established here, namely the South Jersey Law School.

And, over the years, it is difficult to say which has done the most for the community, the Nation, and the world—the visible bridge for transporting merchandise across the river, or the invisible bridge for the education of men that leads both out and up in terms of human time, as well as global space. Both are bridges to progress.

The builder of this second bridge—the man who kept hammering until he had established a vitally needed bridge—head of local learning and education is none other than your own Dr. Arthur E. Armitage.

It was through coordinating his head, his hands, and his heart that he was able to build out of a mere dream this college, which, year by year, enhances its prestige among the young and growing seats of learning in the United States.

During the many years, President Armitage served as secretary of the Young Men's Christian Association, he was in close touch with the aims and ambitions of the young people of Camden to make their way in the world.

He was thus aware of the fact that, excepting the Glassboro State Normal School, there was no institution of higher learning in New Jersey south of Trenton.

The outcome was that hundreds of South Jersey boys and girls, because of economic pressures at home, were unable to obtain education above a high-school level, because they could not have the toll-fare to cross the long bridges to distant learning.

In due course, the school was granted the right to confer the degree of bachelor of laws. Dr. Armitage thought he had accomplished his aim, only to find that in the building of mental bridges educators propose, while officials dispose, because in the fall of 1927 the New Jersey State Board of Education decreed that 2 years of college were required as a prerequisite to law-school entrance.

Thus, the college department of the law school was born. During the next few years the courses in the college department were limited to prelegal work, but in 1933 the college expanded to include in its curriculum the subjects both required and elective for a liberal arts education.

Then, in the year 1937, the College of South Jersey was incorporated and the law school was absorbed as a department of the college.

I mention this record progress and expansion—a success story known to most of you—because it reveals our good friend, Dr. Armitage, as expert, untiring, and efficient in driving the piling on which this bridge to learning and to progress stands.

He has had a generous measure of assistance and support, of course. But, at the same time—when we today look at the expanding groups of buildings and the splendid campus—let us not forget that the foundation for this great institution was created by Dr. Armitage, who, two short decades ago, began the building of a bridge to carry the life-giving traffic of thoughts, ideas, and inspiration.

Since its early days almost 2,000 students have crossed this bridge to learning and progress, and the significant fact is that if it had not been for Dr. Armitage's work the great majority of them might never have had a college education.

If you want to make a true evaluation of the worth of this institution, just remember that many of the leaders of the New Jersey bar and bench, as well as State lawmakers and other State and local officials, might never have reached their opportunity to serve if it had not been for the realization of Dr. Armitage's dream to fill a need for higher education in this part of the State.

I say with deep sincerity that institutions of this kind—the more the better, the larger the better—are needed to explain and expand the American way of life. This means the system of free enterprise and freedom of opportunity.

Some observers believe that a large number of the men and women of this Nation are trying to make up their minds as to whether they want to modify the American economic system or not, and what steps, if any, they will take in that direction.

Unfortunately, the voters have never had a chance to cast their vote directly for or against the American way of life.

We have had all kinds of referendums and proposals for or against specific issues.

All too often, people have thought that they were voting for or against planned production, keeping prices down, the ever-normal granary, encouraging new industry, redistribute the wealth, spreading jobs, protecting home industry, and other issues that melted into high-sounding campaign slogans but meant nothing in the ballot box, legislative halls, or executive policies.

I believe that one of the healthiest things that could happen in this country would be an out and out specific referendum on the continuation of the American way of free enterprise, free markets, fair competition, the right of owning and keeping your property, and limited Government regulation as against Government control.

Such a campaign—such a vote—with no other issues involved—nothing before the voter but the question, Do you want the American way of life?—could not help but open all avenues for a thorough discussion of all the pros and cons.

When the voters went to the polls we would have an electorate that would understand its proper position of partnership.

Every man and woman of voting age would have a chance to understand their shares of interest in free enterprise, unlimited—to decide if they want to be free American shareholders or enslaved Communist share croppers.

We need a campaign of education—a mass campaign—to reach the millions, for our problems of creating an understanding of this country are numerous.

This is a vast country and we have a rapidly increasing population. Not only that but, during the past generation, the migration of people to large cities where they have no roots, no ties, and no sense of belonging to the community, has increased these problems greatly.

And people who are confused are more inclined to listen to the promises of a demagogue than to the logic of a thinker, unless the lesson is driven home with ABC simplicity.

For instance, right here in Camden, you have a bristling industrial center in a setting of extensive rural and agricultural activity.

You also have a large number of small independent business men. Now, when it comes to the worth of the American way, you usually find that farmers, and small independent merchants, have pretty good conceptions of American economics—the way our free market functions, the benefits of competition, and so on. They see them operating every day. Consequently, the system continually sells itself to them.

But that is not enough. For, there is the industrial worker, as well as a large segment of the so-called white-collar people, who have become so immersed in their own specialized mode of living that they no longer have this daily contact.

The truth is that most of them cannot even see the way our economic system affects the business which gives them a living.

Now, you ask, and rightly so, why do these conditions exist? The chief reason is that our system has no inherent machinery within itself for dramatizing, depicting and evaluating itself to the general public.

The American economic system—in contrast with most of its European or Asiatic competitors—has neither a public relations department nor a propaganda bureau.

Communists in this country have so-called educators to teach the blessings of communism but beyond old-time textbooks in poorly equipped schools, Uncle Sam has no mass spokesman.

In brief, there has been no organized effort to answer the people's questions about free enterprise and to present the positive side of the argument.

We have had nothing but a great super-vacuum. And, remember, the major reason subversive propaganda has been so effective in America is because nature hates a vacuum.

As J. Edgar Hoover says: "for every Communist Party member there are 10 others ready to do the party's work. These include their satellites, their fellow-travelers and their so-called progressive and phony liberal allies."

You need not go to college or to law school to learn that, on controversial issues, if the affirmative side refuses to speak, the negative side will fill the void.

That is why the Communists have been able to inflict damage upon this country—in planting lies, in promoting class warfare, in fomenting dissension and strife.

Many honest Americans—with only one side of the evidence on which to form their opinions—have fallen victim to Communist propaganda and trick reasoning. This raises the question, "Is there any danger to the welfare of the American way of life and to American people in this situation?"

Yes, there is this danger. With the confusion that exists today, it is possible that we may unwittingly modify our economic system—little by little, law by law, decree by decree, until the American way is no longer free, but a political toll pike.

Stop, look, and think. A real war goes on throughout the world today between political and economic slave-raiders and defenders of the freedom of the individual.

It is not a cold war—on the part of the Communists at least—but an active, aggressive annihilation of our freedom.

Since our land is the world's great stronghold of free economy and freemen, you can take it for granted that the decisive battle of the world-wide struggle will be settled here.

The result may depend as much on economic events and educational strength as on political issues.

It may depend, ultimately, on whether or not the American people are educated to understand and fight for the American way and its privileges.

That is the principle that we have to hammer home. You cannot be part free and part chained.

American men and women understand the problems that lie ahead.

They must be given adequate information, understanding, and knowledge to preserve their free economy and their freedom.

The best way, the most decisive way to air the issues is to throw them into an open campaign with complete discussion of all the points involved.

And when the campaign is over, let millions of voters go to the polls to register whether they would rather be shareholders in America or share croppers under communism.

I have no doubt what the outcome would be. I am confident that an overwhelming majority of Americans will support the American way of life of material production, spiritual security, and educational expansion.

If we of America are strong, energetic, wise, and productive—if we set an example by creating peace, unity, and prosperity, it will create in the other peoples of the world the desire to follow our example.

In this manner, and this alone, can we help them to recover their stability and productiveness, and save ourselves from being reduced to their standard of living through our inability to continue to give our all-out support to them, for our own resources cannot last forever.

Through our will to do—our will to swing constructive piledrivers—we can build the piers for a bridge of freedom and faith that will span the world.

We will help to create the era of progress and international good will my father visualized that night in Columbus some two-score years ago.

You have two great bridges to progress here in Camden. One bridge carries the merchandise of men—cars, cargoes, and passengers. The other bridge carries the products of the minds of men—ideas, knowledge, and inspiration.

It is impossible to say which type of bridge is the most important in the peaceful progress of local, State, National, and world affairs—but I want to assure you, that if either fails, nothing can save us from disintegrating as so many other countries have throughout the world.

In closing, may I urge those of you who are leaving this great institution of learning to remember that no matter how deep the ditches you may encounter—and you cannot escape them—they will never be so great that you cannot span them by building the right kind of bridges.

With the opportunities that you have before you—and they are still unlimited in this great land of ours—never lose sight of the heritage of freedom handed down to you by your forefathers, and through your efforts and intelligence as the leaders of tomorrow, not only maintain and preserve these opportunities, but create more and greater ones for the generations to come.

United Nations Delegates at Lake Success Should Be on Guard Against Consideration of Arab Refugees as Separate Problem Without Consideration of Economic and Military Security of Israel

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EMANUEL CELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, the British are shedding crocodile tears over the Arab refugees who deliberately uprooted themselves from their homes in Palestine and fled to Transjordan, Syria, and other Arab countries. Their plight is directly due to Britain, who officered, supplied, and financed the Arab troops which invaded Palestine. Britain, as much as the Arabs, is responsible for the suffering. Now, Britain asks that Israel readmit these Arab refugees. Britain plays the game of heads I win and tails you lose.

Her sudden solicitude for the Arabs fools no one. During her quarter of a century of mandatory power over them, she kept them in the abysmal depths of ignorance, poverty, and disease.

Any mass readmission of Arabs would introduce a dangerous fifth column into Israel. The economic responsibility for these unfortunates should fall primarily on those who were responsible for their plight—namely, Great Britain and the Arab nations. Secondly, relief should come on a Red Cross level from the Arab Red Crescent societies, or other appropriate organizations. During World War II the Red Cross helped the enemy, but the Allies, including the United States, did not return any prisoners of war, and did not return those in flight to the enemy countries from which they fled, during the war's duration.

Israel is fighting a war. She should not be asked to return these refugees until peace has been declared and her position as a nation has been accepted and respected by the Arabs, and until she can with economic safety accept them without loss of military advantage.

There is presently only an interruption of the war in the Holy Land. Peace between the warring nations has not been declared. Humane repatriation is fine and high sounding, but the Israelis cannot at present disregard the military effect. The return of these Arabs would put the Israelis at a decided military disadvantage. Israel is still beset by Arab armies. Their guns are poised and aimed at the Jews. The Arab Legion shelled Jewish positions on Mount Zion in Jerusalem on August 4, while Egyptians opened fire south of the city. On August 5, the Arab Legion blazed away at Jews on the road, west of Jerusalem. Arab guns sprayed Jewish quarters at the Jaffa gate. Iraq forces, from reports of August 6, violated the truce in the Beesan Valley and in the Gilboa mountains by firing not only upon Jews but also on United Nations observers. The United Nations Commission has protested the Arabs' act of war in their refusal to permit the flow of sweet water into Jerusalem by way of the Latrun pumping station. And in the meantime, Britain transferred to Egypt considerable military equipment from British stores at Rafa on the Egyptian-Palestine frontier. At the same time, the British are guilty of the unwarranted detention of 11,000 Jewish refugees on the island fortress of Cypress. With one breath, Britain prates on humane terms of the plight of the Arab DP's, while refusing to consider the plight of the Jewish refugees.

Arab countries are perplexed with the problem of sheltering their own people. They have created a disadvantage for themselves which Britain now asks Israel to dissipate. The Arab refugees contain many men of military age, and Britain expects Israel to welcome back those who would fight her.

In the meanwhile, hundreds of Jews are being killed and maimed in Cairo riots and the police look on complacently. Rabbis have been dragged to slaughterhouses, strung up on beams and butchered. A number of Jews have had their eyes pierced. All Jews living in the vicinity of King Farouk's palace and government buildings were ordered to vacate their homes in 48 hours. They have disappeared and nothing has been heard from them. They are either in concentration camps or have been killed.

The situation of the Jews in the Middle East is highly alarming. Pogroms and anti-Jewish terrorism are encouraged by Arab officials by a do-nothing attitude.

In addition, there is the question of reparations. The British-inspired Arabs have looted, burned, maimed, and killed. The damage to property and limb are incalculable. Shall the knaves go unpunished? Reparations must be exacted.

All facets of this problem must be considered as a whole. The mass exodus of Arabs from Palestine is only one facet. Count Bernadotte, abetted by the British, would raise the question of these homeless Arabs at Lake Success as a separate issue. I demand that our United States delegates be on their guard and not fall into the British trap. The British are smarting under their military defeat. They seek to bolster their prestige by a political victory. Also, Britain would like to place an impossible military and economic burden on Israel, by the return of these Arabs. Britain could more easily curb a weakened Israel.

Certainly, our United Nations delegates should refuse to discuss the Arab refugee problem as a separate issue, detached from the Arab-Jewish problem as a whole.

The return of these refugees must be conditioned upon:

First. Economic stability and military security of Israel.

Second. Establishment of long-range peace between Arabs and Jews, by and among themselves.

Third. Guaranteed security of Jewish minorities in Middle East countries.

Fourth. Reparations for Arab-British aggression.

The Man Who Built Idlewild

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RALPH A. GAMBLE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the attached editorial from the Daily Times, published in Mamaroneck, N. Y., Friday, July 30, 1948, entitled "The Man Who Built Idlewild":

THE MAN WHO BUILT IDLEWILD

New York City, as a highlighted feature of its golden jubilee, will tomorrow formally dedicate its new international airport, better known to the flying fraternity as Idlewild. The field will be the largest and the best equipped in the world. Important personages, including the President of the United States and the Governor of New York State, will share in the dedication ceremonies.

But one man who should be there will not be present. And yet he is the person who had more to do with the actual development of the large Long Island area as the world's foremost airport than any other single individual. We refer to Jay Downer, of Larchmont, former chief engineer of the Westchester County Park Commission, whose illness necessitates representation of himself at tomorrow's dedication exercises by his wife.

Westchester may take vicarious pride in this new project of the metropolis because it was constructed by one who had much of his training in this county. As far back as 1912 Mr. Downer was named as chief engineer of the Bronx River Parkway Commission, building the pioneer parkway of America, pattern for thousands of such modern thoroughfares. For years, in fact, commissions and engineers came from abroad to study the Bronx River Parkway design and construction, and that of the Westchester County Parkway System, the logical expansion which followed construction of the original parkway.

Except for World War I service, Mr. Downer was connected with Westchester's parkways and parks until 1935, serving also for a period as our county engineer. Later he became highway consultant for the National Resources Committee, engineer member of the Board of Design of the New York World's Fair in 1939, and a director of Rockefeller Center.

It was in 1942 that the then Mayor F. H. LaGuardia and Park Commissioner Robert Moses of New York City reached out to pick the Westchester man to design and supervise the construction of the huge Idlewild Airport. Novel engineering problems had to be overcome, there were varied and highly controversial labor issues to be met, changing aeronautical standards required almost monthly shifts in planning.

Through almost 6 years full personal responsibility for construction of Idlewild during wartime restrictions rested upon Mr. Downer's shoulders, but so efficient did he prove that at one time Mayor LaGuardia suggested seriously that the new project bear the name of "Downer Airport."

So, it is regrettable that tomorrow as the glamour and the spotlights dwell upon many who participate in the dedication ceremonies, the man who built Idlewild will not be among those present. Yet while his actual presence will be missed, something greater will be there for all to see. For it is what man accomplishes, it is in this case in the extension of vision and spirit into brick and stone and broad 2-mile-long runways, that one's genius and personality is best recalled. Thus it is that Jay Downer has perpetuated his skill for the benefit of mankind.

Address by William C. Walsh, President of the Maryland State Bar Association

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HERBERT R. O'CONOR
OF MARYLAND
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, August 7 (legislative day of Thursday, August 5), 1948

Mr. O'CONOR. Mr. President, at the recent convention of the Maryland State Bar Association in Atlantic City, N. J., the Honorable William C. Walsh, former attorney general of Maryland and former member of our court of appeals, was honored by his fellow practitioners by election to the presidency of the Maryland State Bar Association.

Because of this deserved honor to one who has served his State so well, and because, also, of the high personal esteem in which General Walsh is held by myself and his fellow attorneys generally, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD excerpts from his first official address to the members of the bar association, dealing with vital problems in the field of jurisprudence and affecting the general public as well as the legal profession.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXCERPTS FROM ADDRESS OF HON. WILLIAM C. WALSH, PRESIDENT, MARYLAND STATE BAR ASSOCIATION

Our association is pledged to promote reform in the law, to facilitate the administration of justice and to uphold the standards of the legal profession. I suggest that we should also exercise such influence as we can in public affairs. No doubt every age faces a crisis of some sort or other, but it is certainly no exaggeration to say that at the present time this country and the world at large are facing the most critical situation which has existed in modern times, or perhaps at any time in history.

The minds of men are full of strange theories and new ideologies, and change is the order of the day. Despite the fact that the United States has, in less than 165 years, become the most powerful and prosperous country in the world, and that its population enjoys the greatest freedom and the highest standard of living the world has ever seen, there are some in our midst who want to radically change the system under which this has been accomplished.

We face a contest between communism and democracy and we hear on every side that the way to fight communism and its theories, is to make democracy work. And we are told that the way to make democracy work is to undermine the reliance of the people by making them more and more dependent upon the Government and to substitute unbridled license and selfishness and disregard of the public welfare for ordered liberty under the law.

I think it is time someone began to tell the American people that democracy has worked in this country, and to point out that under our system we have more liberty and more widespread prosperity than the citizens of any other nation have ever enjoyed. What we have already accomplished is a complete answer to communism, which offers the people nothing save slavery and poverty, and the thing to do is to advise the people of this country and of other countries that our system has worked and should be followed and not that we should try to improve our system by adopting any of the errors of communism or socialism.

Let us continue to meet changing conditions and to seek improvements as we have done in the past, but let us also keep these changes and improvements within the fundamental framework of the American Constitution. Let us carry on our efforts to increase and broaden the blessings of liberty and prosperity, but let us not permit these efforts to destroy the very things which have made this country and its people the greatest nation in history.

There was a time when the lawyers of the country exercised a potent influence in public affairs. I believe the time to renew that influence has arrived. We are, by training and education, better versed than is any other class of our citizens in the Constitution of our country and in the principles on which that Constitution is based, and I urge this Association to lift up its voice whenever the occasion offers in defense of the liberties and opportunities which that document guarantees to the American people.

Congress Makes a Come-Back

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT F. RICH
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by George S. Benson, president of Harding College:

LOOKING AHEAD

CONGRESS MAKES A COME-BACK

(By George S. Benson, president, Harding College, Searcy, Ark.)

The Eightieth Congress was our first postwar Congress, and it faced mountains of problems. Moreover it was a Congress of a different party from that of the President. Thus handicapped, the Eightieth Congress worked hard to get as far as it did. By working hard, sometimes despite disagreement with President Truman, the Congress that recently adjourned ran an independent course and made a great record.

During depression days a bewildered Congress took orders straight from the strong man. This was approved by many as the best kind of unity for the Nation. Unity is a fine thing. When purposes are sound and methods are right, unified action can benefit the people. But the United States Congress was not created by the founding fathers to always say "Yes" to the Nation's President.

No rubber stamp

The whim and fancy of a political leader, no matter how great the leader, may not be to the best interest of our people. That is perhaps why the founding fathers created the three branches of our Government as they did: the legislative to pass the laws, the executive to carry them out, and the judicial to provide justice. Knowing these things, many persons wondered whether Congress would ever regain its rightful place.

The Eightieth Congress has done just that. If ever a Congress denied the rubber stamp process, this one did so. The stature and dignity of Congress appears to be returning. It would hardly be possible for Congress in a nation like our own to please everyone. But every one of us can be thankful that the Eightieth Congress has done much to restore the integrity and strength that our national legislature should have.

The people's safeguard

This Congress did not always say "Yes" to the President. There were times when it said "No." At least four major bills were passed over the veto of the President. Congress did not do this just to nettle Mr. Truman. The Eightieth Congress was doing things upon its own conviction, following its own best judgment. Doing this, Congress showed that the ultimate welfare of the Nation was its objective.

There was no vindictiveness, but instead a determination to rely upon its own judgment rather than upon that of the Executive alone. Our people can find no quarrel with this, once they think about it. It is only that kind of Congress which will continue to safeguard the welfare of our Nation under the Constitution. We can never afford to forget the importance of Congress as the people's will in this Republic.

More than 1,000 bills

The hard work of the Eightieth Congress is shown by the fact that it passed more than 1,000 bills and conducted numerous investigations. It studied and acted upon nearly 30 major pieces of legislation. Among these was the Taft-Hartley bill—called the "slave labor bill"—which has not enslaved but has already shown its workability. Of great significance too was the leadership that Congress showed in world affairs.

The Eightieth Congress led the Nation out of isolationism and into the leadership of freedom-loving nations of the world. Congress did much to retrieve lost prestige for America in the realm of international affairs. I believe every citizen should appreciate the great job the Eightieth Congress did in bringing back the integrity of a legislature which was set up to represent the people. I am grateful to our hard-working legislators.

NO IRON CURTAIN

The communistic attitude is getting to be pretty well known to Americans. Even the iron curtain has not been able to hold behind its barriers the ideas and thoughts of men. We have come to understand what the Russian Communists think by watching the actions of their American comrades. Everybody knows the Communist Party in this country watches Moscow closely. We can believe that Moscow keeps them in line, too.

Everybody knows also that the Communist Party in the United States is not very powerful. In terms of what it can do legally as a party, the average American gives it very little attention. However, what the party would do if it thought it could get away with it—that is another thing. In this respect, homegrown Communist opinion is very enlightening.

Outside the law

Recently, William Z. Foster, top man for the Communists in America, told the Senate his party would not support the Nation in event of war with Russia. He was testifying before the Judiciary Committee on the Mundt-Nixon bill, which would put strict controls on Communists. Foster defiantly told the committee that if the bill should become law the party would not register with the Department of Justice as required.

Foster shouted that Russia would never attack the United States. His reason: Russia is not an imperialistic nation. At the same time, he said that America has embarked upon an imperialistic program, the greatest in history. (Imperialism means the practice of seeking control or dominion over other lands and peoples.) The way the American Communists have the situation sized up bears no kinship to the plain truth in international affairs.

Who's imperialistic?

Any school boy knows that America has no ambitions for the control and domination of other countries. On the other hand, what Russia is doing in eastern Europe looks like the most obvious kind of "taking over." It is this same William Z. Foster who once wrote that the Communist Party would take over the United States Government and liquidate the free-enterprise system, along with the Republican and Democratic Parties and our religious institutions.

The rankest kind of imperialism known today may be seen in the Communist International, to which all world Communists are responsible. This world organization exists for the purpose of satisfying the imperialistic ambitions of Russia's political rulers. It works by boring from within. It uses Communists wherever they are. It plots the overthrow of other governments by force. It incites revolutions wherever Communists stand to gain.

Watch their tactics

What would the Communist Party in this country do in event of war? It would cause as much dissension and create as much friction as it could. In fact, it has done this already, both in peace and in war. Communists will continue to do everything possible, by whatever methods, to hamper domestic peace and prosperity. They seek to set worker against employer, to create costly strikes and walk-outs that cost the American public and workers billions of dollars.

The Communists did these during the recent war. No good may be expected from them, either in time of war or peace. As good American citizens we must study their tactics, so that when we see the fruits of communistic skulduggery we can identify the tree from whence it came. As Communist tactics and ideas are made clear, every one of us will have more appreciation for our own way of life.

HOW TO LOSE OUT

The Government lost $2,000,000 a day while running the Nation's railroads in World War I. That's not hay! The Government operators got rid of that money even though they found it necessary to jump the freight rates 110 percent. This sad experience gives you a real-life picture of what happens in America under Government management of an industry. Every time we try it in America, the Nation as a whole is the loser.

Compare that record with the railroad management's record in World War II. This time we kept private operation and management. There was no increase in freight rates, and the railroads paid $4,000,000 a day to the Federal Government in taxes. This means that under private management, our people were ahead at least $6,000,000 a day.

That's over $2,000,000,000 a year!

To suffer most

Not long ago 21 railroad unions came out with a proposal that the Government take over the railroads permanently. Surely, somebody is terribly misguided or misinformed. If our union people will study the records of Government management in this and other countries, they will make no such demands. Actually, the railroad unions themselves would be the groups to suffer most under Government management.

They call it nationalization in England. No matter what you would call it in America, Government ownership of the railroads would mean the beginning of the end for the system of free and private enterprise. Our workers have a huge stake in the American way. If private ownership of industry is worth saving, then we must do everything we can to stave off these tendencies toward socialism and communism.

Best service, more pay

Railroads in the United States and one Canadian line are the only railroads in the world that are not government owned or government controlled. Where do you have the best railroads and the best service? In America. Our railroads offer better service at lower cost than you'll find in any other nation in the world. This is true even though the pay envelope of the American railroad worker is far greater than that of railroad workers in other nations.

It would be much wiser for our unions to call for less Government strangulation in the form of taxes, not for more control. It is quite possible for a slow strangulation process to bring on complete Government control of railroads. We must not permit that. Our workers must continue to receive the good wages and benefits that come from railroads controlled by the railroad industry, not by an agency of the Government.

Experience, not folly

Operating expenses of railroads have soared during the past 30 years. Yet, the railroads under private ownership have increased their efficiency, to serve the public better at lower cost. Two things have resulted from this efficiency: higher wages and lower costs to the shipping and traveling public. Nobody would expect Government-managed railroads to do these things. And they wouldn't.

Under Government operation there is no call for initiative. Competition is not allowed to play its part in keeping us on our toes. We have high standards of living in America simply because we have freedom to act and to look opportunities in the face. We invest savings and earnings, not tax money, for better tools and modernization. Our ways have paid off. A look at nations around us shows the folly of government ownership.

AN AMERICAN'S FAITH

This year at the commencement exercises of Harding College a notable address was delivered. It was no ordinary speech. The burden of its message was so significant, and the appeal so earnest, that I wish the audience had been many times larger. I am therefore taking this method of passing to you a portion of this solid and thoughtful address. It was made by Mr. Lamar Fleming, Jr., of Houston, Tex.

"This historic responsibility is new to us. * * * But those who view accomplishments in the atomic laboratories and the development of other terrible means of destruction must recognize that no one on earth longer has the power to decide whether he will live alone. That power of decision has passed to those who are evil enough to * * * use terrible new weapons for their evil designs—unless mankind combines to prevent them from so doing.

Our call from destiny

"If we accept that, being sons of God, we are brothers to all mankind, and that we are the only nation strong enough to lead mankind to combine for suppression of violence and recovery of peace, we cannot reject the role to which our destiny calls us. We will cherish the memory of more placid days, when this responsibility was not upon us, but we cannot reject our destiny.

"We must enter this role in humility, conscious of our shortcomings and determined to overcome them to the best of our ability. We must search our souls. We must do more than conquer the resistance to truth which springs from our animal instincts. We must chastise all who seek to inflame and prey upon our group grievances, greeds, and hatreds. We must remind ourselves constantly that our duty of human brotherhood is no less to distant peoples * * * than to our neighbors in our home towns.

Men of good will

"We must realize that peace and well-being will not return to them nor remain with us unless we achieve the ability to work together in a brotherly and mutually helpful company, each placing the common good above the greeds and ambitions of any person, group, or nation. We must include peoples temporarily prevented from cooperation toward the common good and must pray for the day when their chains will be removed, and they will be free to join our company.

"Above all, we must require of this great undertaking that it function by the standards of millions of individual consciences, which are the communion of sons and daughters with their Spiritual Father—not by group, party, or national ethics, in which conscience gives way to animal instincts, fears, and passions of the herd, and responsibility is spread so thin that no one feels it as his own. This calls for a profound spiritual revival, in us and in all men and women of good will.

Well of goodness

"The years we approach hold for us great uncertainties, great responsibilities, great sacrifices. The men and women of this class cannot expect your lives to be of ease and security, nor can you want such lives. Your lives will be lives of great adventure, great responsibility, and great opportunity to serve mankind. What your generation can do with this opportunity rests with you and with God.

"I have faith that all men and women everywhere have something in common between them, that is fundamentally good, and that time and great effort and patience will restore the mutual flow of this goodness and understanding between them, not merely in your lifetimes but also in mine. I have great faith that the well of goodness in the Americans of your generation will be full enough to start the mutual flow."

Democrats Opposed Truman, Too

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RALPH A. GAMBLE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 5, 1948

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the attached editorial from the Daily Times, published in Mamaroneck, N. Y., Wednesday, July 28, 1948, entitled "Democrats Opposed Truman, Too":

DEMOCRATS OPPOSED TRUMAN TOO

If President Truman can in his political campaign indict the Eightieth Congress for errors of omission and of commission, as he has plainly indicated will be his strategy, how can he at the same time urge reelection of members of his party to Congress? For the fact is that many of his own party in Congress have voted with the Republicans. Does he want these Democrats retired to private life?

Consider, for example, the law barring outside salesmen and similar employees from social-security coverage. Mr. Truman thought this a bad law and vetoed it. But 56 percent of the Democrats in the House and 74 percent of the Democrats in the Senate voted to override his veto.

Consider the tax reduction bill of 1948. President Truman thought this was bad and vetoed it. But 27 of the 37 Democratic Senators and 82 of the 166 Democratic Representatives voted to override the veto.

Consider the administration-opposed bill to give to the States title to off-shore oil. On that 80 percent of the Democrats in the House voted in favor.

Consider the bill which admits displaced persons to this country, along restrictive lines which President Truman opposed. Nearly half of the Democrat Senators voted against a change in the restrictions which the President suggested.

Consider the Taft-Hartley Labor-Management law. The President vetoed that. But more than 60 percent of the Democrats in the House and more than 45 percent of the Democrats in the Senate voted to override that veto.

Consider the anti-poll-tax bill passed by the House after public recommendation of the law had come from President Truman. More than 55 percent of the Democrats in the House voted against that bill.

Consider the Taft price-control formula in 1946 which President Truman denounced. Two out of every five Democratic Senators voted for that formula.

Consider the OPA extension bill of June 1946, which President Truman vetoed because of restrictions. Two out of every five Democratic Representatives voted to override the veto.

These are merely highlights, but they should offer sufficient evidence that the record of the Eightieth Congress which President Truman attacks is borne in large part by the Democratic Members in both Senate and House. How, then, can President Truman in his own candidacy for office dissociate his campaign from that of these Senators and Representatives who seek reelection on the same Democratic ticket?

Are we to be told that there are two kinds of Democrats and that we must vote for one kind and against the other? In that case who draws the line of demarcation between the sheep and the goats?

Inflation—Exports Are Not the Cause of High Prices

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HELEN GAHAGAN DOUGLAS
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 7, 1948

Mrs. DOUGLAS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to call to the attention of the Members the fallacies in the argument that exports are the cause of high prices.

The Republicans say that if it weren't for exports, we wouldn't have high prices.

This is not true because 1947 exports were only 4.1 percent of our national product. The first quarter of 1948, they had fallen to 2.5 percent of our national product, and for the whole of this year, they will average only 3 percent of our national product. This includes our natural business with South America and the rest of the world, our foreign-aid exports, interim aid, and everything else.

Our net exports, that is the amount we export more than we import, have been decreasing. In dollar figures, with rising prices, in terms of commodities, our exports abroad are going down even more rapidly. I point out to the Republicans who have refused in this special session to enact a comprehensive program to control inflation that while exports have been declining, prices have been rising rapidly and benefits that we sought in the ERP have been undermined by these rising prices.

When the Republicans claim that our exports exert an inflationary influence on our 250,000,000,000 gross national product, they are trying to prove that a 3-inch tail can wag an 8-foot dog.

They attempt to blame foreign-aid exports for our current high-price situation when these exports are only a fraction of our total exports and when total exports are only a fraction of our gross national product.

RELATION OF UNITED STATES EXPORTS TO DOMESTIC PRICE TRENDS

To measure the impact of foreign aid on the domestic economy we must examine the relation of the export surplus to the total gross national product, that is, we want to see what our net exports are in relation to all goods and services produced. By export surplus we mean the difference between the total shipments of goods from this country and total imports. Total gross national product represents the total value of all goods and services produced. This relationship is summarized below:

United States gross national product, exports including reexports, general imports of merchandise, and the net export-import balance in relation to gross national product, 1936–38, 1946, 1947, and first quarter 1948, at annual rate

[In billions of dollars]

	Gross national product	Exports	Imports	Net export-import balance	Ratio of net export-import surplus to gross national product
1936–38	85.8	3.0	2.5	+0.5	0.58
1946	203.7	10.2	4.9	+5.3	2.6
1947	231.8	[1] 15.3	5.7	+9.6	4.1
First quarter 1948	244.3	[1] 13.3	7.2	+6.1	2.5
1948, estimated	250	14.2	7.0	+7.4	3.0

[1] Including civilian supplies to our armed forces overseas for distribution in the occupied areas.

As will be noted, there has been a sharp decline in the first quarter of this year in the ratio of the export surplus to the gross national product due to the significant decline in our exports and a substantial increase in imports. This means that while production has been increasing, our net exports have been decreasing; this has meant a significant decline in any inflationary impact which can be ascribed to exports. And while exports have been declining, prices have been rising rapidly.

	1947			1948
	June	September	December	January	March	June
Consumer price index (1935–39=100)	157.1	163.8	167.0	168.8	166.9	171.7
Wholesale price index (1926=100)	147.7	157.4	163.2	165.7	161.4	166.2

These price increases are not the result of exports when exports represent a small percentage of total production and when they have been declining rapidly.

Exports in April and May of this year remained at about the same level as during the first quarter. With the passage of the foreign aid appropriation bill, it is expected that in the third and fourth quarters of this year exports will rise somewhat, but there is every indication that for the year as a whole exports may be as much as 5 to 10 percent below 1947 levels. Imports, on the other hand, are expected to increase by more than 10 percent. Gross national product is currently running at about an annual rate of $250,000,000,000. Assuming that figure to represent the expected 1948 rate and that the export surplus will be approximately $7,400,000,000, the expected ratio of export surplus to gross national product may be roughly about 3 percent for the year. This represents a very considerable decline from the ratio of 4 percent which obtained during 1947.

While our net exports represent something of the order of 3 percent of the value of all goods and services produced since the war the volume of goods available for domestic consumption has made extraordinary gains. We are consuming approximately 20 percent more food than before the war on a per capita basis. More than twice the amount of steel is available today for the domestic market than before the war. Domestic production as a whole is nearly doubled in volume.

For figures showing United States production, exports, and amounts available for domestic consumption of leading commodities, see pages 515–517 of the hearings before the subcommittee, House of Representatives, on the foreign aid appropriations bill for 1949. This table covers nonagricultural commodities. A similar table is available on pages 385–387 for agricultural commodities.

Some months ago the Council of Economic Advisers, in its report on the impact of foreign aid on the domestic economy, had the following to say about the impact of the export surplus on domestic prices:

After the war physical reconversion of the American economy to a peacetime basis proceeded, in the main, with smoothness and rapidity. Employment ran at practically maximum levels throughout 1946, and the gross national product exceeded any previous peacetime year. Yet there were many production bottlenecks and commodity shortages. On the other hand, deferred demands were great, and the financial resources to support them were ample. As a result, there was a threat of serious price inflation, and, when price controls lapsed in the middle of 1946, the threat became a reality.

While the total exports of goods and services and the export surplus were high during the second half of 1946, it is clear that these export factors exerted a minor and secondary influence upon the upward surge of prices. With a gross national product of $204,000,000,000 in 1946, the fact that the export surplus for that year was $1,600,000,000 higher than in 1945 could not have been very appreciably responsible for what happened to prices in the second half of 1946.

By the second quarter of 1947 the gross national product was at an annual rate of more than $226,000,000,000, and the export surplus was at an annual rate of $13,000,000,000, or about $5,000,000,000 a year higher than in 1946. In spite of the increase in the export surplus, prices remained relatively stable from March to June 1947. The increase in exports undoubtedly affected the price level during this period, but mainly by way of preventing a decline which might otherwise have occurred in many prices.
